In another development, the United States ambassador to Israel, Richard H. Jones, brokered a Sunday night meeting in which Israel and the Palestinians reached a deal to allow food and other essential supplies to go into the Gaza Strip beginning Monday.

Citing security concerns, Israel has kept the Karni crossing, the main commercial goods terminal on Gaza's border, closed for most of the past two months. Palestinian and United Nations officials say Gaza is facing shortages of bread and other basic foods because the crossing has been closed.

Mr. Jones brought Israeli and Palestinian negotiators to his residence near Tel Aviv, and an agreement was reached to open the Kerem Shalom terminal, near where the borders of Israel, Gaza and Egypt converge.

Israel's Agriculture Ministry on Sunday was supervising the destruction of hundreds of thousands of chickens and turkeys in southern and central Israel in response to the discovery of the A(H5N1) strain of bird flu.

"It is important to emphasize that at this stage, we are talking only about bird flu," the acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, said at the regular cabinet meeting on Sunday.

Mr. Olmert and other government officials have said there is no evidence that any people in Israel have been infected. Four farmworkers were hospitalized Friday, but health officials said tests showed they did not have the disease, which can be deadly to humans.

Hamas Party Dominates Palestinian Cabinet Picks (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Prime Minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh announced a Palestinian Cabinet dominated by his Hamas party yesterday as the U.S. diplomats pressed Palestinian and Israeli officials to head off a potential humanitarian crisis in the Gaza Strip.

The key posts went to Mahmoud Zahar, a trained physician who was tapped as foreign minister; Said Siam, a reputed former leader of the Hamas military wing who was nominated as interior minister; and Omar Abdul Razeq, an economics professor tapped as finance minister.

The 24-member Cabinet includes one woman and one Christian.

Despite the Islamic militant group's failure to persuade the defeated Fatah party to join the government, Mr. Haniyeh and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas appeared upbeat after a meeting in Gaza City to discuss the Cabinet and its policy guidelines.

Observers saw the atmosphere as a sign that Mr. Abbas will approve the first Palestinian government run by Islamists, even though Hamas rejected a demand by the president that the new government recognize international agreements reached by the outgoing Fatah-led administration.

"The meeting was positive," said Mr. Abbas, who told reporters that he plans to seek approval from the Palestine Liberation Organization for the new government within 48 hours. "There are obstacles and difficulties, but with good will we can overcome them."

Hours earlier, Israeli, Palestinian and U.S. negotiators agreed on a new crossing arrangement for the Israel-Gaza Strip border, averting the threat of food shortages. Israel has kept Gaza's only commercial crossing closed for much of the past two months because of security concerns.

During a meeting at the residence of the U.S. ambassador to Israel, Palestinians and Israelis agreed to open a second crossing, Kerem Shalom, to the limited passage of goods. Hamas was not a party to the negotiations, but the agreement will boost stability among Palestinians as the new government gets under way.

Hamas' failure to find a coalition partner means that the inexperienced Islamic militants will have to manage the Palestinian government on their own. Observers said a political conflict between Mr. Abbas and Hamas will be unavoidable if Mr. Haniyeh's government fails to establish domestic stability and maintain international support.

"Crises are expected unless Hamas is a surprise," said Sliman Shafi, a Palestinian affairs expert on Israel's Channel 2 television news. "If, within a month, nothing is progressing internally and externally, [Mr. Abbas] will say, 'Guys, get to work.' "

The choice of Mr. Zahar as foreign minister could complicate that effort. Mr. Zahar -- perhaps the most senior Hamas leader in Gaza alive after an Israeli assassination campaign two years ago -- speaks English but is known to be a blunt hard-liner.

Mr. Siam, a relatively unknown political figure, will get control of most of the Palestinian security services and will be expected to address effective anarchy in the Gaza Strip.

Abdul Razeq, who recently was released from an Israeli jail, is an economics professor at An Najah University in Nablus, and will be responsible for coping with a looming budgetary crisis created by the cutoff of financial aid from the United States and Europe.

Mr. Haniyeh reportedly nominated a deputy, Nasser A-Din, to handle West Bank affairs because the Israelis refuse to allow the prime minister to travel between his Gaza Strip home and the West Bank.

If Mr. Abbas confirms the nominations, the Cabinet will be brought before the Hamas-dominated Palestinian parliament for what is expected to be routine approval.

Israeli Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said the presentation of the Cabinet was a "moment of truth" for Mr. Abbas because he will have to decide whether to work with the Islamic militants or confront them.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni called for the international community to send a clear message to the new Palestinian lawmakers that they must come to terms with Israel.

Israel has said that it will not deal with a Palestinian government run by Hamas.

Hamas Is Alone In Cabinet Plan (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 19 -- Hamas finalized a proposed cabinet Sunday that would place several key ministries in the hands of senior leaders but not include any other Palestinian faction, precisely the narrowly partisan government that the radical Islamic movement had hoped to avoid.

Ismail Haniyeh, the designated prime minister, submitted the list to Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, whose secular Fatah party declined to join the cabinet. The cabinet's makeup is likely to complicate efforts to persuade international donors to continue funding the government once Hamas, designated a terrorist organization by the United States and European Union, assumes control of the ministries.

"Their task was to have as wide a government as possible with Fatah, other factions and independents," said Ali Jarbawi, a political science professor at Beir Zeit University in the West Bank. "The cabinet they have proposed will be, in effect, all Hamas. They are facing a deep problem."

Also Sunday, the U.S. ambassador to Israel assembled Israeli and Palestinian delegations to discuss mounting humanitarian problems in the Gaza Strip resulting from closures of the main cargo passage with Israel. The Karni crossing has been shut for most of the year because of Israeli security concerns, but shortages of food and medicine are beginning to threaten the welfare of Gaza's 1.3 million residents.

Richard Jones, the U.S. ambassador, called the meeting in Tel Aviv on a few hours' notice to salvage a U.S.-brokered deal setting out the terms of operation at Karni following Israel's withdrawal from Gaza last fall. In recent weeks, Israeli officials have made clear they want the Palestinians to use a southern passage at the intersection of Gaza, Israel and Egypt, far from the strip's economic center in the north, rather than Karni.

Palestinian officials had refused, citing terms of the deal. But the delegations decided Sunday to open the southern passage, known as Kerem Shalom, on Monday for humanitarian deliveries from Egypt.

"The ambassador took the initiative to bring the parties together to find a way to move humanitarian assistance into Gaza in a way that addressed security concerns on both sides," said Stewart Tuttle, the U.S. Embassy spokesman.

Haniyeh's proposed cabinet, which was due by the end of the month, could change in the weeks ahead. Hamas will probably continue seeking partners to broaden its domestic support and assuage international donors, who supply nearly half of the Palestinian Authority's roughly $2 billion annual budget.

Abbas has demanded that Hamas accept several signed agreements backed by his Fatah party that would, in effect, amount to a recognition of Israel. Although Palestinian law does not give him the authority to veto the proposed cabinet, Abbas could fire Haniyeh immediately after it is sworn in by the Hamas-dominated legislature elected in January.

Hamas leaders so far have rejected Abbas's demands and pledged to continue confronting Israel "by all means." Abbas's aides have indicated in recent days that he will give Hamas a chance to run the ministries while working to persuade its leaders to endorse a negotiated two-state solution to the conflict.

Abbas will likely wait a few weeks to forward the proposed cabinet to parliament, the Palestinian Legislative Council. The delay would allow Israeli elections on March 28 to conclude before Hamas takes control of the ministries, a transition that could otherwise boost the showing of Israel's most hawkish parties. It would also give Haniyeh more time to recruit another Palestinian party for the cabinet, ideally Fatah, which controls the second-largest parliamentary bloc.

Haniyeh came close to bringing in the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a Marxist party that, like Hamas, appears on the U.S. list of foreign terrorist organizations. But the leaders of the party, which holds three of parliament's 132 seats, announced Sunday that they would not participate.

The Palestinian Authority is already in severe financial straits. International donors are considering ways of financing humanitarian programs for the Palestinians outside channels controlled by Hamas, whose charter calls for Israel's destruction.

Israel has frozen the monthly transfer of about $55 million in tax and customs revenue it collects on behalf of the Palestinian Authority under an arrangement established by the 1993 Oslo accords. Those transfers amount to roughly half of the authority's $115 million monthly payroll for 150,000 civil servants and trainees, nearly half of them in the security services.

Hamas officials said Haniyeh's cabinet, which was not made public, gives the interior and foreign ministries to members of the party, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement. But many of those nominated to run the 24 ministries are technocrats from outside the movement, although they have strong ideological connections to it.

Saed Siyam, a former teacher who won the most votes on the Hamas list in Gaza, has been nominated as interior minister with control of several Palestinian security services. Mahmoud Zahar, a thyroid surgeon and hard-liner, would run the Foreign Ministry, although Haniyeh has signaled that Abbas will be given wide latitude in dealing with foreign governments.

Haniyeh, considered a pragmatic figure within the movement, has been working since soon after the party's parliamentary victory to form a broad cabinet. But some Palestinian analysts say Hamas would have had a better chance of building a national unity government if it had selected a figure from outside the movement as prime minister.

A New Landscape: Hamas Digs In (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 19 — When the radical Islamic group Hamas presented a cabinet it dominates to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, on Sunday, Yossi Alpher was reminded of an earlier revolution.

Mr. Alpher was an Israeli intelligence analyst on Iran from 1978 to 1980, and for him, the Hamas victory has the paradigm-shifting quality of the Iranian revolution that brought the mullahs of Shiite Islam to power. Today, he recognizes the same kind of dislocation.

The "old Iran hands" were confident that the revolution could not last, he said, and that the mullahs would be tamed by the merchants of the Iranian bazaar, or the country's youth or the experience of power. "These people knew a very different Iran, and their analysis was not just useless but diversionary," he added.

"I have an incredible sense of déjà vu now when I talk to Palestinians about Hamas," said Mr. Alpher, co-director of a Web site dedicated to Israeli-Palestinian dialogue. "Secular Palestinians don't understand what's happened. They don't know what the Muslim Brotherhood is all about. They're in a state of denial."

After Hamas's victory in the Palestinian legislative elections, analysts and diplomats suggested that nothing fundamental would change: Hamas's win was not so resounding, some said, and its convictions would be moderated by power, keeping foreign aid and the peace effort continuing roughly as before.

After all, the job of diplomacy, like antacids, is to try to make the inedible digestible. But as Hamas completes its cabinet, there is a sense that the landscape has changed for some time to come.

The Hamas victory is not just a little local difficulty. Hamas is the Palestinian part of the Muslim Brotherhood and the first to win an election; its victory has enormous resonance for radical Islam. It is a defeat for secular nationalism, Nasserite corporatism and for Fatah, the chosen partner of Washington and Israel.

Many Muslims wish for Hamas to succeed, and some will give it money. The anxious Arab governments nearby — especially Jordan, with its many Palestinians, and Egypt, with its active Muslim Brotherhood, but also fragile Syria — will feel that they cannot set higher public hurdles for Hamas than, say, Russia or the European Union.

Palestinian and Sunni, Hamas legislators say they are wary of further dependency on Iran and reject Al Qaeda. They say they prefer a period of quiet; how they will deal with Islamic Jihad, Iran's proxy in the Palestinian territories, remains unclear.

New elections are not scheduled for four years. That gives Hamas's leaders, whom Mr. Alpher calls "pragmatic ideologues," time for their long-view strategy: softly, softly; slowly, slowly.

Hamas calls for national unity. It is likely to push a domestic agenda of reform and social welfare. It seems unlikely that it will fire the Fatah security commanders. When new legislators have talked of Islamicizing education or imposing Shariah law, Hamas has silenced them.

The indications are that Hamas will continue to talk tough toward Israel but maintain a cease-fire that has lasted roughly a year. It will give Israel no sufficient pretext to reinvade Gaza, where Hamas's army of 6,000 men can operate openly; will appeal to the world's Muslims for support; and will blame Israel and Washington for every deprivation.

While many international officials want Hamas to be a partner, its leaders may have other ideas.

On Jan. 30, five days after the election, the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — known as the quartet — warned that a Hamas-led government must recognize Israel, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Given what even a partial reduction of aid will mean for Palestinians, the quartet is looking for ways to soften those demands.

The quartet has pushed Mr. Abbas to postpone H-Day, when a Hamas government takes over, until after Israeli elections on March 28. Now the European Union and the United Nations say that a Hamas government should be given time to prepare a program before any aid cutoff.

Some diplomats suggest that if Hamas supports a moribund 2002 Saudi peace initiative, it will somehow "recognize" Israel without having to say so; some suggest that a Hamas offer of another cease-fire may be enough to "forswear violence."

But so far, Hamas is not playing along. It sees the agreements with Israel as a honey trap and recognition of Israel as impossible. In the meantime, Hamas is working on the heartstrings and sense of justice of the West, to keep aid flowing.

Hamas's victory also signaled the death of the "peace process" as it has been practiced.

The diplomatic assumptions of recent years — a peace treaty after a territorial compromise, or "land for peace" — have been blown apart. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel tried to redefine the bargain as "a state for security" — an independent Palestinian state in return for dismantling all armed "terrorist" groups, including Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades. That was a commitment undertaken in the "road map" by Yasir Arafat and reconfirmed by Mr. Abbas.

But it seems unlikely that Hamas will dismantle itself. Nor, its leaders say, will it abandon "the right of resistance to occupation." Its religious conviction is that all of Palestine, including the current state of Israel, is Islamic waqf land, land belonging irrevocably to the world's Muslims.

Hamas talks of a long-term armistice with Israel, so long as Israel returns to its 1967 boundaries, unannexes East Jerusalem and lets all refugees and their descendants return to their pre-1948 homes. The state of Israel itself, they insist, has no right to exist on waqf land.

So with Hamas, the argument has moved from nationalism and territorial compromise, which can be negotiated, to religious conviction and a temporary Israeli lease on its sovereignty. In that light, the quartet seems to have given Israel a free pass for unilateral action.

Israel, which has done little to support Mr. Abbas, now says it has no partner. Hamas gives Israel more freedom in the West Bank, creating borders, thickening settlements, or dismantling them, as it pleases. Last Tuesday, as troops crushed a Jericho prison to extract wanted men, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Israel would keep the settlement bloc of Ariel in the West Bank. Washington did not complain.

U.S. Brokers Compromise On Gaza Crossing (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 20, 2006

With Palestinians facing severe shortages of bread, milk and other foods in Gaza, U.S. officials called an emergency meeting Sunday and brokered a compromise with Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in a two-month-old border standoff.

Ambassador Richard Jones said cargo traffic might start flowing as soon as Monday at one crossing, and a Palestinian official said a second crossing would be discussed at meetings Monday.

But Palestinian economic misery might take another hit after Hamas militants sworn to Israel's destruction presented their new Cabinet to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Sunday. The Islamic group's failure to bring moderate forces into its government is likely to strengthen Western resolve to cut off desperately needed aid.

The vital Karni cargo crossing between Israel and Gaza has been closed for most of the past two months, shutting off almost all exports and imports for the poverty-stricken seaside territory. Palestinians charge Israel is punishing them for Hamas' election victory, but Israel insists it is keeping the crossing shut because of warnings of terror attacks.

The lengthy closure has led to shortages of flour, milk and other goods, and bakeries are closing, United Nations workers said.

Jones invited Israeli and Palestinian negotiators to his residence Sunday to find a way to avert a humanitarian crisis in Gaza. He said later there was an agreement to open another crossing, Kerem Shalom at the convergence of Gaza, Israel and Egypt.

"We have agreed that the crossing from Kerem Shalom will open tomorrow for imports of food and other essential humanitarian products from Egypt," and details would be worked out Monday, Jones told reporters.

Jones did not mention Karni, but Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said a solution also was emerging for activating that crossing and he was hopeful it could be resolved in two meetings scheduled for Monday.

"I hope they will succeed in allowing goods to come into Gaza as of tomorrow to alleviate the dire humanitarian situation in Gaza," he told The Associated Press. He said Egyptian trucks were already lining up across from Kerem Shalom.

Israeli negotiator Amos Gilad demanded that Palestinians arrest militants before the Karni crossing is reopened, Israeli officials said.

Under an agreement brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in November, Israel and the Palestinians agreed to boost cargo traffic through the crossing. The accord was meant to give momentum to peace efforts and economic recovery programs after Israel's summer pullout from Gaza.

But the Karni deal was never implemented, and Israel has closed the crossing for long periods, citing security concerns.

During Karni's closure, Israel offered to open Kerem Shalom, 25 miles south of Karni, as an alternative crossing. But the Palestinians had rejected that up to now, saying it is too small and is completely inside Israeli territory.

"We'd like Karni to be fully functioning as soon as possible ... The only reason Karni is closed is the definite terror warnings," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said. "We don't understand why the Palestinians refuse to have the Kerem Shalom crossing open to bring in required and needed produce into Gaza."

On Sunday evening, incoming Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh met Abbas to present his new Cabinet, which includes one woman and one Christian.

Speaking to reporters after the meeting, Haniyeh said the Cabinet would have 24 members, 10 from Gaza and 14 from the West Bank. Fellow Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar will be the new foreign minister, he said.

Abbas said he would submit the list to the PLO executive committee and then to parliament if it approves. Before the meeting, he said he would review the names but would not decide immediately whether to accept the list. As president, he has the authority to demand changes.

Haniyeh was optimistic his Cabinet would win approval. "I can say that the indications are positive toward constitutional stability on the Palestinian platform," he said.

Abbas, who favors negotiating a final peace settlement with Israel, has urged Hamas to moderate its violent ideology but likely will approve the Cabinet, his aides say. He will, however, warn Hamas that its refusal to soften its positions could hurt the Palestinians' international standing.

Hamas failed to form a coalition with more moderate parties that could have helped soften its hardline image.

The United States and European Union have threatened to cut off hundreds of millions of dollars of aid to the Palestinians if Hamas does not renounce violence, recognize Israel and promise to honor existing peace agreements.

The group, which has killed hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings, has rejected those conditions.

Last week a World Bank report warned of economic disaster in Gaza if aid is cut off.

Haniyeh, a top Hamas official in Gaza, had not announced his Cabinet lineup. But Hamas officials said privately the group would keep the top three posts — foreign affairs, finance and interior, which oversees some security forces. Professionals would fill some of the other posts.

Abbas was elected separately last year to a four-year term and wields considerable authority. He cannot impose his own Cabinet lineup on Hamas, however, because it controls an absolute majority in the legislature.

Emirates Aided Kin Of Palestinian Militants (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

In the last four years the United Arab Emirates has provided substantial financial support, through its Red Crescent Society, to families of Palestinians, militants as well as civilians, who have been wounded or killed by Israeli forces, according to Red Crescent documents.

The United Arab Emirates is a federation of seven small states including Dubai, where a government-owned company was due to take over some American port operations. Facing intense Congressional opposition, the company said recently that it would sell its operations in the United States to an unrelated American company within six months.

In 2002 and 2003, the United Arab Emirates Red Crescent Society, a quasi-governmental organization, made donations to Palestinian charities that included social groups associated with Hamas, the radical Islamic organization that won Palestinian parliamentary elections and has long been designated a terrorist organization by the United States.

A glimpse inside the Emirates aid programs comes from documents provided to The New York Times by Gary M. Osen, an American lawyer litigating cases in the United States federal courts on behalf of American victims of Palestinian terror attacks. The documents include unclassified materials seized by Israeli forces from Palestinian organizations in the West Bank.

Mr. Osen, of Oradell, N.J., said researchers in Israel who were helping him gather evidence for the lawsuits had found the documents there in archives of materials captured in Israeli military operations.

The records include international financial transfers from the Emirates Red Crescent Society as well as budget and program reports from its Jerusalem branch, which handles programs in the Palestinian territories. They show differences between American and Emirate views of Palestinian violence, although President Bush has said the countries see eye to eye on fighting terrorism.

In 2002, according to a spreadsheet of the annual budget, the U.A.E. Friends Society in Jerusalem, the local branch of the Red Crescent, designated $100,000 to pay 50 annual stipends of $2,000 under a "martyrs' families sponsorship" program.

Officials from the government and the Red Crescent Society said "martyrs" referred to any Palestinian who had died in the conflict with Israel, including civilians and armed fighters. In a news release on May 5, 2002, Mohammed Hamad Saif, a representative accompanying a 40-ton shipment of Red Crescent relief supplies, said "the priority" of that aid would be "the needy and families of the wounded and martyrs."

In one case, the documents show, the Emirates Red Crescent provided cash payments to the wife and two children of Anwar Awni Mustafa Abdel Ghani, who was identified in a news release on Feb. 15, 2002, from Palestinian Islamic Jihad, a militant organization, as a mujahid, or fighter, for the group. The news release, and news reports from that date, indicate that Mr. Abdel Ghani was killed in a clash that day with Israeli forces in a village near Tulkarm in the West Bank.

Emirates government and Red Crescent officials confirmed that the martyrs' family support continues, including payments for at least one of Mr. Abdel Ghani's children.

There are sharp differences between American and Emirates officials over assistance to "martyrs." United States officials say payments to families of violent militants constitute direct support for their cause and encourage others to join.

Officials of the Emirates government and the Red Crescent Society said the payments helped create possibilities for younger Palestinians. They said most of the beneficiaries were relatives of civilians who had been killed, and that the society handed out cash payments only for Palestinians under 18. Spouses and older children receive coupons for food, medicine and housing materials.

"What is the fault of the orphans?" a government official said, referring to children in the martyrs' program. "By helping them, you are pulling them away from extremism."

Daniel Glaser, a deputy assistant Treasury secretary, said the Emirates was "one of our primary partners" in the Middle East in combating financing of terrorist groups. He said the Treasury had a close working relationship with the Emirates central bank, and that financial officials there had provided concrete cooperation in recent investigations.

Mr. Glaser said he was not familiar with the details of Red Crescent programs. But as a general matter, he said, "Charities that are supporting terrorist activities, including by supporting family members and orphans — we consider that to be terrorist financing."

The documents contain no evidence that the Emirates provided direct aid to armed militant groups.

In the ports controversy, President Bush hailed the Emirates as a like-minded ally in fighting terrorism. He cited support from the sheiks who lead the Emirates for American efforts in Iraq, including a United States military air base there.

But in Israel, some Palestinians regarded as terrorists by the United States are viewed as resistance fighters and martyrs by the Emirates officials.

The Emirates government condemns suicide bombings and terrorist attacks on civilians, and officials said the Red Crescent Society had taken increasingly strict precautions to avoid providing relief to Palestinian groups engaging in such attacks, or to social groups linked to them or to bombers' families.

After "bad experiences" during the mayhem of 2002 and 2003, when some Emirates Red Crescent money ended up in militants' hands, the organization has used modern controls to track its donations and vet its staff, the government official said.

The official said there was no direct cooperation between the Emirates Red Crescent Society and Hamas. He requested anonymity, saying he did not want to awaken new controversy between the Emirates and the United States.

Documents from before 2004 show that the Red Crescent made donations through the Tulkarm Zakat Committee, identified at that time by American officials as a Hamas front. A top administrator at the Red Crescent's Jerusalem offices was Najih Bakirat, whom Israel has identified repeatedly as a Hamas member.

But the Emirates officials said they had stopped sending money to the Zakat Committee and had cut ties with Mr. Bakirat when questions arose about his political activities.

The secretary general of the Emirates Red Crescent, Sanaa Darwish al-Kitbe, said the goal of its Palestinian programs was to "influence the negative atmosphere" to build peace. "By building homes and helping people to have a better life," she said, responding to written questions with a statement sent by e-mail, "you are creating some hope in the middle of all this suffering," allowing young Palestinians to "concentrate on the positive and move away from extremist views and actions."

In Egyptian Movies, Curses! We're The Heavies (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

CAIRO -- When Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited this city last month, Egyptians had an unusual choice: watch her on TV as she expounded on issues of war and peace in the Middle East, or go to a neighborhood movie theater and see her portrayed by a look-alike actress belly-dancing and placed in "adult" situations.

The film in question is "The Night Baghdad Fell," which depicts Egyptian obsessions with war, sex and the United States. Wildly anti-American, it has done a brisk business for two months, a long screen life for Egyptian-made films. In "Night," Egyptians fret about an American invasion of Egypt and the potential destruction of their capital. Americans are bullies, rapists and mindless killers.

By the way, "The Night Baghdad Fell" is a comedy.

The film is only the latest bit of Egyptian pop culture to display deep unease about Americans. Beginning two years ago, Yanks emerged as bad guys on Cairo stages. In one play, "Messing With the Mind," the audience was ordered around by wild-eyed ushers dressed as Marines. In another, a Statue of Liberty was blown up in the lobby.

Ugly Americans began to emerge on-screen last year. In "Alexandria, New York," director Yusef Chahine rebuked U.S. attitudes toward Arabs. "No Problem, We're Getting Screwed," a black comedy, told the tale of an Egyptian who sends his son to Iraq to deliver mangoes and then must travel there to get him out of an American jail. Along the way, the father tumbles into the hole where Saddam Hussein was hiding, gets caught in insurgent crossfire, is arrested by the Americans and is taken to President Bush. Bush forces him to wear a beard and confess to bombing the American Embassy. Somehow, the Egyptian escapes, outwits his captors, sells his mangoes and gets his son back home.

Egyptians are not the only ones depicting villainous Americans on screen. "Valley of the Wolves: Iraq" debuted in Turkey last year and featured a Turkish hero who takes revenge on U.S. forces that detain Turkish troops in northern Iraq. The on-screen Americans shoot up civilians at a wedding, firebomb a mosque and carry out summary executions. Torture at Abu Ghraib prison makes a cameo appearance.

"These movies show that there is paranoia everywhere," says Nabil Shawkat, a humor columnist at the Daily Star newspaper. "In Egypt's case, the feeling of impotence in regards to the Americans is a common feeling."

Not everyone considers the anti-U.S. theme of "Night" valid. Many critics regarded it as sophomoric and a typical Egyptian effort to blame its problems on outsiders. A critic in the al-Ahram newspaper called it "a puerile comedy expressing the views of an enthusiastic teenager with little political knowledge."

Egypt is officially one of Washington's closest allies in the Middle East. By and large, workaday Egyptians are solicitous toward visiting Americans and endlessly reassure them they are loved here. Americans-as-heavies are a departure in Egyptian film. In the distant past, British colonialists were targets of negative portrayals. Later, unlabeled foreigners appeared on-screen to exploit Egyptian wealth. Americans, if portrayed at all, were cast as unwitting victims of crafty Egyptian tour guides or as people with charming if incomprehensible customs, like wearing shorts in public.

One old satire, called "The Visit of Mr. President," portrayed a village mayor who was comically eager to show his enthusiasm for Anwar Sadat's friendship for the United States -- funny because the mayor is at a loss to explain how, only a few years before, the U.S. was Egypt's enemy. The movie was banned in Egypt for many years.

Israelis have been the most common screen menace, even in comedy. In a film last year called "The Embassy Is in the Building," an Egyptian emigre returns home, wants to engage in sexual affairs in his old apartment, but can't because Israel's embassy is next door. Missiles fly in through windows and security guards block the exits and entrances. All the neighbors have moved away. When the harried man sues the Israelis, he becomes a national hero.

In "Night," a schoolteacher tries to recruit a brilliant former student to create a weapon for use in case the Americans invade Egypt. The student is strung out on hashish, but partly because of his admiration for the teacher's radical peacenik daughter, he takes up the project. The teacher even arranges for the daughter to marry the boy. "Do it for the nation," he urges her.

The men in the film have sexual problems. The student fails to get aroused on his wedding night, fantasizes in bed about Rice and also about a Marine named Jack. The teacher and his friends are impotent. All these conundrums are resolved when wives and lovers await in bed while dressed up in U.S. desert fatigues.

Reports of U.S. atrocities in Iraq pile up and the Egyptians form a rag-tag militia to confront a possible invasion. When a test of the new defense weapon fails, the teacher has a nightmare about his daughter being raped at Abu Ghraib. Near "Night's" climax, an Egyptian who goes out to greet invading Americans is shot dead by a U.S. soldier.

"I felt that an event like the fall of Baghdad could not pass without some sort of comment," director Mohammed Amin says. "All we Arabs could do was sit and watch it on TV. So I decided to make a movie about impotence. That is what it is all about."

The film is Amin's second comic outing. Last year, he made "Cultural Film," which told the tale of a group of young Egyptians trying in vain to find a place where they could be alone to watch pornographic videos.

In "Night," he satirizes Egyptian life and politics, too, though not through the kind of shocking imagery he uses on the Americans. When the teacher wants to boost the morale of his militia, he produces a video of Egyptian achievement since the 1973 war with Israel. It is composed of a single goal in a soccer game in which Egypt tied its adversary. He approaches a general to ask about developing weapons, but the officer says military industry is engaged in producing umbrellas. An acquaintance says Egypt already possesses weapons of mass destruction -- he knows it's so because, once, the entire country suffered a blackout when all energy was diverted to enriching uranium.

The Condoleezza Rice fantasy sex scenes received a lot of negative commentary in Egypt, but Amin defends them on the grounds that a weak character naturally fantasizes about possessing someone more powerful. "The student hates U.S. officials, so he defeats them in bed in the form of Rice. Rice is always coming to Egypt to lecture us. It is like fantasizing about your sixth-grade teacher."

He insists he is not reflexively anti-American. His next project, he says, is a movie both about the horrors of Iraq but also the good some American doctors did recently in separating conjoined Egyptian twins. "I want to investigate how a country can do so much good and bad at the same time," he says.

Mexico Urged To Act On Border Tunnels (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

A bipartisan group of U.S. senators has asked the Mexican government to enact legislation to criminalize the construction or financing of border tunnels between the United States and Mexico.

In letters to Mexican President Vicente Fox and members of the Mexican Congress, the senators -- led by Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat -- said 40 tunnels into the United States have been discovered since 2001 and urged the Mexican officials to enact legislation to crack down on those involved.

"Our countries must continue to work together to address this problem by discovering and shutting down those who build, finance or use border tunnels for illegal purposes," the senators said, urging Mexico to enact legislation similar to a bill offered March 2 by Mrs. Feinstein to criminalize the construction or financing of border tunnels.

In addition to Mrs. Feinstein, the letter was signed by Republican Sens. Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico, Conrad Burns of Montana, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Jim Talent of Missouri, and Democratic Sens. Barbara Boxer of California and Maria Cantwell of Washington.

The Department of Homeland Security has said tunnels typically have been built to smuggle drugs, but have quickly transitioned into passages for smuggling illegal aliens. The senators said they were concerned they could also be used to smuggle weapons and terrorists into the United States.

The Feinstein legislation was prompted by the discovery in January of a sophisticated tunnel between the United States and Mexico that could have been used to traffic drugs, humans, guns or terrorists between the two countries. The tunnel, which is more than 2,000 feet long and connected warehouses in Tijuana to San Diego, was the largest and most sophisticated illegal cross-border underpass Mexican and U.S. authorities said they had ever found.

Equipped with a pulley and ventilation system, the tunnel was six feet wide and 12 feet high. It had a cement floor and lights. Authorities said they were unsure how long the tunnel had been in operation.

That tunnel originated under a warehouse 150 yards south of the border, near the Tijuana airport, and surfaced about a half-mile north of the border in an abandoned warehouse in Otay Mesa, a community within the city of San Diego developed as an industrial area in 1985. Otay Mesa is California's largest commercial land-border port and one of the busiest commercial land-border crossings in the United States.

Mrs. Feinstein's bill, known as the Border Tunnel Prevention Act, would impose up to 20 years' imprisonment for constructing or financing a tunnel crossing the border into the United States and up to 10 years for anyone who negligently permits others to construct or use an unauthorized tunnel on their land.

It also would punish any person who uses a tunnel to smuggle aliens, weapons, drugs, terrorists or illegal goods by doubling the sentence for the underlying offense if convicted; calls for the forfeiture of the assets of those involved; and authorizes and funds homeland security efforts to fill in tunnels.

The bill is pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Thousands In Belarus Protest Against Poll 'fraud' (FT)

By Stefan Wagstyl And Neil Buckley In Minsk

Financial Times, March 20, 2006

Up to 5,000 opposition supporters braved blizzards and threats of violence from the Belarus authorities to protest on Sunday in central Minsk against what they called a fraudulent election victory by President Alexander Lukashenko.

Initial returns showed Mr Lukashenko, denounced by the US as Europe's last dictator, winning more than 90 per cent of the vote. But supporters of the two opposition candidates, Alexander Milinkevich and Alexander Kozulin, converged on the central October Square to claim that the president's true share of the vote was less than 50 per cent and call for a rerun.

"We don't recognise these elections. They were a farce," said Mr Milinkevich, the main opposition candidate, whose aides claimed he had won 30 per cent of the vote. "They said we want revolution, but what we want is freedom and justice. We have already achieved a colossal victory. People have overcome their fear."

Protesters later laid flowers on a war memorial in the centre of Minsk. The two opposition candidates called on protesters to return to the streets tonight, once official results are known and observers from the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe have delivered what is expected to be a critical verdict on the election.

The European Union and the US, which have repeatedly pressed Mr Lukashenko to ease his repressive policies, are likely to consider further sanctions on Belarus.

The scale of the demonstration was a success for the opposition. The KGB secret police had promised to suppress any protests and treat as terrorism any attempt to stage a popular revolt on the lines of the 2004 Orange Revolution in Ukraine, which brought Viktor Yushchenko to power. Mr Lukashenko himself had threatened to "wring the necks" of anyone threatening public order.However, the protest is unlikely to be enough to overturn Mr Lukashenko's victory. The former collective farm boss has remained popular since gaining office in 1994 by promoting political stability and presiding over strong economic growth, partly supported by subsidised oil and gas from his most important ally, Russia.

Belarus President Expected To Win Reelection Amid Protests (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, March 20, 2006

MINSK, Belarus — Police were preparing to mobilize in the city center here today in an attempt to control election-day protests as President Alexander Lukashenko appeared headed for an overwhelming victory, but opposition leaders vowed to challenge the balloting in the streets.

Election officials said early returns had given Lukashenko 89% of the vote and his main challenger, Alexander Milinkevich, less than 4%.

In an echo of recent pro-democracy protests that have rocked authoritarian regimes across the former Soviet space, supporters of Milinkevich gathered in large numbers in the heart of the capital. They demanded a new vote and protested against a campaign they said was fraught with violations intended to preserve the reign of the 51-year-old Lukashenko, whom the Bush administration calls Europe's last dictator.

"I will be grateful to every person who comes out and says, 'We are human, we have dignity, and we no longer want to live on our knees,'." said Milinkevich, a pro-Western physicist who was chosen by a coalition of pro-democracy parties to challenge the authoritarian regime that has governed this small former Soviet republic since 1994.

"Today, the impression is that we're not holding elections, but preparing for war," added his campaign manager, Sergei Kalyakin, as authorities vowed they would not tolerate foreign-backed attempts to destabilize the government. "The psychosis has reached a crescendo in this country," he said.

An anonymous text message apparently delivered to every cell phone in Minsk warned of possible violence. "On the night of March 19, 2006, provocateurs are preparing a bloodshed. Protect your life and health," it said.

Lukashenko, a former collective farm manager who has raised salaries and pensions and fostered robust economic growth even while maintaining state control over 80% of the economy, appeared confident as he cast his own ballot this morning. He scoffed at the Bush administration's allegations that he has amassed what may be billions of dollars through corruption and sold equipment to Iran that could be used to create weapons of mass destruction.

"Bush…is terrorist #1 on our planet, openly destroying states in different parts of the world and then killing presidents," he said, in a possible reference to former Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic.

"If someone thinks I'm a dictator, good luck to him. But it's impossible to have a dictator in Europe. Only stupid people would think that," he said.

The balloting unfolded without incident throughout the day, with many polling stations featuring folk dancers and concerts.

"We voted only for our father," said Yadviga Stashkevich, a 58-year-old pensioner who cast her ballot for the president at a suburban school. "He pays our pensions on time, and we have stability," she said.

But a group of young men said they had voted for Milinkevich.

"Why does one man have to rule a country for 15 years?" said Andrei Shimanets, a 23-year-old foundry worker. "But however we vote, Lukashenko wins."

Independent exit polling has been banned, but just four hours after the polls opened, the pro-government EcooM Center forecast an 84.2% victory for the president. Milinkevich was said to have polled 2%.

A later exit poll by the independent Levada Center of Moscow gave Lukashenko 47% and Milinkevich 25.6%. The remaining vote was split among two other candidates, according to the poll.

One of those, former university rector Alexander Kozulin, accused Lukashenko of secretly disposing of at least $12 billion in revenue from weapons sales through a parallel presidential budget not subject to public disclosure.

"Where is the money? Show me at least one civilized state with two or three budgets," he said in an interview.

Foreign Minister Sergei Martinov in an interview earlier this week denied that Belarus had improperly sold weapons material to Iran. "Belarus never ever in its arms trade violated UN sanctions. Iran is not under sanctions," he said.

"Iran is a friendly country and an important market for us, and we don't see why we would stop working in the Iranian market," he added.

A fourth candidate, Sergei Gaidukevich, is a Lukashenko ally and head of the Liberal Democratic Party. He has done little campaigning.

Opposition leaders accused Lukashenko of closing down independent newspapers, blocking legal campaign rallies, arresting opposition activists and encouraging large numbers of voters to cast ballots early in the days preceding the election in what opponents believed was an attempt to manipulate the vote tally.

"The legal [restrictive] provisions on campaigning, the manner in which they are being interpreted and actions of state bodies have limited the scope for a vibrant election campaign," the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which is monitoring the election, said in a statement before the balloting.

Milinkevich said the alleged campaign violations included the arrest of more than 450 campaign activists, with more than 160 of them subjected to substantial fines, and the seizure of 260,000 campaign leaflets paid for with state funding allocated to presidential candidates.

Milinkevich supporters in outlying regions, including the towns of Baranovichi and Bovruysk, said they were prevented from leaving town to join public protests in Minsk when authorities turned back buses or asserted there were no bus tickets.

Still, thousands of opposition supporters were allowed to stage a rally and rock concert "For Freedom" in the capital Saturday, with supporters waving European Union and Belarus nationalist flags and dissident bands singing songs critical of the regime.

"President, go home!" one musician sang.

"I was born in the Soviet Union," said another. "I don't want to go back to it."

Both Milinkevich and Kozulin said their supporters would be committed to nonviolence.

"If you have decided to take to the streets and defend your right to a worthy life in a free state, go with flowers, candies and presents. Belarus is a peaceful country and the Belarusians are peaceful people. Do not give the authorities cause to shed blood today and use force against peaceful citizens," Kozulin said in a message to his backers.

But Lukashenko's campaign spokesman, Dmitry Kostin, said those who are encouraging street protests are working against the interests of the country.

"After they called on the people to come out to the square with their children at night, I understood that these politicians are worth nothing. Why should mothers and fathers want to bring children out to a mass rally? These calls are a provocation," he said.

He said if demonstrators attempt to block roads or railway stations, "the authorities will be obliged to use force against the violators."

President Wins Big In Belarus Vote; Thousands Protest Results (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 20 -- Thousands of people poured onto a snow-blown central square Sunday night to protest the results of a presidential election in which incumbent Alexander Lukashenko was heading to the kind of overwhelming victory that his opponents charge lacks any credibility.

With nearly all of the ballots counted, Lukashenko, 51, had won 82.6 percent of the vote, far ahead of three other candidates, the country's Central Election Commission reported early Monday.

Alexander Milinkevich, the favorite of the country's youthful opposition, had won 6 percent, followed by another opposition candidate, Alexander Kozulin, a former university rector. The fourth candidate was Syarhey Haydukevich, an ally of Lukashenko who analysts said was on the ballot to create a sheen of competition.

The protest, which drew at least 10,000 people at its peak, was peaceful. Hundreds of riot police who had massed in vans near the square stayed away from the crowd. The mostly youthful protesters chanted "Mil-in-kev-ich," "Long live Belarus" and, periodically, "Shame" when an image of Lukashenko flashed on a large TV screen on the square.

But the weather did not smile on the crowd, which began to dissipate after a blinding blizzard swept in. The rally was not sanctioned by the government, and for many in the crowd it was difficult to hear Milinkevich, who used a bullhorn because the government would not allow a public address system.

Milinkevich called on his supporters to return to the square Monday evening to continue to contest the results. "We demand new, honest elections," he told the crowd. "This was a complete farce."

But in a country where Lukashenko controls nearly all of the news media, which portray members of the opposition as criminal revolutionaries, it will be difficult to disseminate Milinkevich's desire to challenge the vote. State media all but ignored the rally Sunday night.

Absent in Belarus are many of the elements that recently helped enable popular protests to topple governments in Ukraine and Georgia after fraudulent elections. There is no independent broadcast media, the opposition is not well-financed and Milinkevich, a former physics professor, was virtually unknown three months ago.

Moreover, Lukashenko, seeking a third term after 12 years in power, remains popular with a large segment of Belarusan society that appreciates the political and economic stability of the former Soviet republic, which has been scarred by world wars and environmental disaster.

"He's the best in the world," said Nicolai Shebeka, a 33-year-old factory worker, after voting Sunday on the edge of Minsk, the capital. "The place where I work was awful before he came to power."

Many in the crowd on October Square recognize the limits of what they can achieve, but said the fact that thousands were still willing to protest in a climate of fear gave them hope. Before the vote, Lukashenko and the country's security service, which is still known as the KGB, had promised to crush any protests.

"We are dreaming about a free and independent country," said Snezhana Lisovskaya, a 22-year-old student. "We're here and we have the feeling that something will change -- if not tonight, then soon."

Lukashenko has ruled Belarus, which borders Russia and the European Union, since 1994. In 2004, in a referendum that outside observers condemned as rigged, a two-term limit for the president was lifted, essentially allowing Lukashenko to run indefinitely.

Sunday's election was monitored by 400 observers from the 55-nation Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which is to issue a report Monday. Based on the group's interim reports leading up to the vote, the election is likely to be condemned as falling far short of democratic standards.

The head of the Belarusan Central Election Commission said she expected the report to be not just bad, but "very bad," because of what she said was the organization's Western bias. Both the United States and the E.U. have accused Lukashenko of dictatorial rule and threatened some kind of sanction if the presidential election was deemed fraudulent.

Lukashenko dismissed the anticipated criticism when he voted Sunday at a college in Minsk.

"We in Belarus are conducting the election for ourselves," he said. "What is important is that elections take place in accordance with Belarusan legislation. As for sweeping accusations, I've been hearing them for 10 years. I've already gotten used to them."

Lukashenko Wins Election; Opposition Calls For New Election (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

MINSK, Belarus -- Incumbent President Alexander Lukashenko handily won Belarus' presidential election, according to an incomplete tally released early Monday, and the main opposition candidate called for a new election as thousands of his supporters jammed a main square in central Minsk.

With 72.2% of the ballots counted from Sunday's balloting, Mr. Lukashenko had 82.3% of the vote compared to 5.8% for Alexander Milinkevich, the Central Election Commission said, pointing to a third term for the authoritarian leader, who has ruled the ex-Soviet republic since 1994. Turnout was 92.6%, it said.

Several thousand people heeded opposition candidate Mr. Milinkevich's persistent calls for a peaceful protest after polls closed across the nation of 10 million, defying a ban on election day rallies and massing in a bitter wind on Oktyabrskaya Square with shouts of "Freedom!" and "Milinkevich!" Some waved colorful light wands or flags.

"We demand new, honest elections," Mr. Milinkevich told the crowd through a small bullhorn, shouting to the snow-dusted crowd on Oktyabrskaya Square. "This was a complete farce."

Although snow had fallen sporadically all day, a squall that kicked up during the rally was suspected by many of being a police action: the snow was of a different texture than the previous flakes and it began blowing suddenly from a different direction, ending as abruptly as it began after about 10 minutes.

Mr. Milinkevich called on his supporters to return to the square Monday evening to continue their protest -- signaling a bid to hold a sustained protest of the sort that have brought opposition leaders to power in former Soviet republics including Ukraine and Georgia in recent years.

Fears of violent confrontation had mounted, with Mr. Milinkevich calling for the protests and officials saying they were banned on election day. But the authorities held back.

The crowd was the biggest the opposition had mustered in years, reaching at least 10,000, according to AP reporters' estimates, before it started thinning out. After about three hours, a smaller group marched to nearby Victory Square, some laying red, blue and white carnations at a monument there before dispersing around midnight.

"Tomorrow we will show the world our might!" said Alexander Kozulin, another opposition candidate.

He demanded authorities release what he said were hundreds of opposition activists detained during the campaign.

At Oktyabrskaya Square, demonstrators waved a national flag that Mr. Lukashenko scrapped in favor of a Soviet-style replacement, as well as EU flags. At one point, a trolley bus went by with a young man riding on the roof. He pumped his fist in a victory sign, and the crowd roared when he rode off carrying a national flag someone thrust into his hands.

People blew horns and shouted "Mi-lin-ke-vich!" -- echoing the much larger crowds on Kiev's Independence Square in Ukraine's 2004 Orange Revolution, which has inspired the opposition in neighboring Belarus.

Police made no move to disperse the crowd, though they closely guarded the building facing the square that temporarily houses the election commission. About a dozen identical unmarked white buses, filled with riot police behind draw curtains, idled on a nearby side-street.

Mr. Lukashenko has vowed to prevent the kind of mass rallies that helped bring opposition leaders to power in Ukraine, Georgia and Kyrgyzstan following disputed elections, raising the threat of a forceful government response.

The use or threat of force neutralized opposition efforts to protest vote results in Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan last year, and a bloody government crackdown in Uzbekistan left hundreds dead.

Ahead of the vote, the government mounted a campaign of threats and allegations of violent, foreign-backed overthrow plots that its opponents said was aimed at frightening people off the streets and justifying the potential use of force against protesters.

"These elections will be recognized neither by us nor by democratic countries," Mr. Milinkevich told a news conference earlier in the day, after two groups authorized by the state to conduct exit polls released results just hours into the voting giving Mr. Lukashenko more than 80%.

"In Poland, people began laughing at communist authorities and this is when Solidarity won. We are getting there," he said. "I won't be surprised if someone allows himself to claim 120%."

Western countries have forged close ties with the opposition and made no secret of their contempt for the ruler of what Washington calls an outpost of tyranny in Europe. It condemned the campaign as "seriously flawed and tainted."

While Russia's relations with Belarus are sometimes strained, the Kremlin is wary of losing its only ally between its western border and NATO countries, and has signaled approval of a Lukashenko victory.

Mr. Lukashenko dismissed international criticism. "We in Belarus are conducting the election for ourselves," he said. "As for sweeping accusations, I've been hearing them for 10 years. I've already gotten used to them."

A dictator to his critics, many Belarusians see the 51-year-old former collective farm manager as having brought stability after the uncertainty that followed the 1991 Soviet collapse.

Even independent opinion polls suggested Mr. Lukashenko, who has pushed through a referendum scrapping term limits and hinted he plans to stay in office indefinitely, would win a majority and avoid a runoff.

Protesters Charge Fraud In Belarus Presidential Election (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers And C. J. Chivers

MINSK, Belarus, Monday, March 20 — An expected landslide for President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko drew several thousand Belarussians into the streets on Sunday, as protesters ignored swirling snow and official threats of arrest to denounce the election as a clumsily orchestrated sham.

With nearly all votes counted, Mr. Lukashenko, a former collective farm boss who has been in office 12 years, won 82.6 percent of the total, the chief of the Central Election Commission, Lidiya Yermoshina, said Monday morning, according to The Associated Press. That figure exceeded even the state's own surveys of voters leaving the polls.

Early indications that Mr. Lukashenko would be the easy winner had, though, already hardened his opponents' assertions that the results were fraudulent.

"They say we want a revolution," the leading opposition candidate, Aleksandr Milinkevich, told thousands of protesters who gathered peacefully in October Square, the central square in Minsk, as the polls closed at 8 p.m. Sunday. "No. We want only free and fair elections. What happened here was a farce. We do not recognize this election."

The election commission said Monday that Mr. Milinkevich trailed in a distant second place, with 6 percent.

The protest, drawing several thousand despite the snow and bitter cold, was the largest in years against Mr. Lukashenko, who is often denounced here and abroad as the last dictator in Europe. The protesters waved flags — including the former national flag, now banned, and that of the European Union, officially scorned — and chanted slogans demanding freedom.

"All they are saying is lies," Tatyana Agechich, an engineer who lost her job for disloyalty to Mr. Lukashenko's government, said as official statements were being broadcast on a large-screen television in the square, accompanied by jeers.

Although the authorities banned election day rallies and the country's security service — still known as the K.G.B. — warned that anyone causing disturbances could face charges of terrorism, the protest passed without the violent crackdown that many had feared.

Scores of police officers and security troops assembled in buses on side streets, but did not intervene. At times the protesters — estimated at 5,000 to 10,000 — broke into chants of "The police are with us."

Mr. Milinkevich addressed the crowd from the steps of the neo-classical Palace of Trade Unions, near the building where officials were announcing the results. A second opposition candidate, Aleksandr V. Kazulin, joined him in ridiculing the outcome.

Acknowledging the genuine popularity that Mr. Lukashenko has, however, Mr. Kazulin demanded only a second round of voting, which is required if no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote.

"There is only one God," he said. "All others are servants of the people."

Although Mr. Lukashenko's opponents have modeled their campaign after the popular uprising that overturned a rigged presidential vote in Ukraine in 2004, the protesters in Minsk did not block traffic or try to set up camp, as the Ukrainians did in Kiev.

After three hours, they heeded a call to march half a mile down Independence Prospect to Victory Square. By early Monday, the crowd dispersed. The two opposition candidates called on the protesters to return Monday night once, as they expect, the final results are called into doubt by observers from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

Sunday's vote has become a new conflict between Belarus, the United States and the European Union. Both Europe and the United States have threatened penalties if the election is determined to be undemocratic. It is also likely to become a fresh source of tension between the West and Russia, which has supported Mr. Lukashenko's rule, openly at times. Russia and other former Soviet republics have sent their own election observers, who said in preliminary statements that the election was fair.

Mr. Lukashenko, after voting at a sports complex in Minsk, dismissed the chorus of American and European criticism that coincided with the end of the campaign, which was marred by dozens of arrests, restrictions on campaign events and harassment of independent organizations.

"We are holding elections for ourselves," Mr. Lukashenko said in remarks broadcast live on state television.

The transmission was abruptly stopped when he was questioned about the accusations of vote-rigging. In response to questions about whether Belarus under his rule has become a dictatorship, he denounced President Bush.

He called Mr. Bush "terrorist No. 1 on our planet" and ridiculed a White House report released last week that accused Mr. Lukashenko of amassing a personal fortune from arms sales and corruption. "He is not even capable of calculating his own incomes, gained from the oil and the war," Mr. Lukashenko said of Mr. Bush, according to the Interfax news agency.

Election day, like the campaign, was divided into parallel worlds. Mr. Milinkevich's supporters reported instances of harassment and expulsions of observers sent to monitor the voting at polling places across the country.

State television, meanwhile, offered a series of interviews with analysts and observers, including a few Westerners, who praised the election. Mr. Lukashenko, elected in 1994 in what has been called the last free election in Belarus, has since orchestrated not only presidential and parliamentary elections, but also a constitutional referendum in 2004 that lifted the limits of him seeking a third term.

"What is going on today is the seizure of power by unconstitutional means," Mr. Milinkevich said in an interview in a cramped apartment that served as his campaign headquarters.

He noted that 10 of his 30 campaign managers had been arrested and remained in jail on election day. "What kind of election are we having if my campaign managers are in jail?" he said.

Many voters who were interviewed declined to state their names or their choices, but in Minsk and especially outside of it, Mr. Lukashenko's supporters praised his leadership over the last 12 years.

"I came to vote for our batka," Zoya A. Popkovskaya said loudly as she entered a polling station in Samokhvalovichi, a village south of Minsk, using a nickname for father that Mr. Lukashenko favors. "I want him to be elected for life — at least until he is a pensioner."

Ms. Popkovskaya, 69, explained her support for Mr. Lukashenko in ways often heard, especially in rural towns and among the elderly. "He has raised us," she said. "When he became president, he gave us our pensions and our children jobs."

It remains to be seen whether the protests will have any effect. Some in the crowd on Sunday expressed disappointment at the turnout.

"We would like more," Dmitry Yakovuk, 23, said, "but maybe people are not ready yet."

Incumbent Remains Popular In Heartland's Rural Villages (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

KRUPITSA, Belarus, March 19 — Vladimir M. Grom pulled out of a case a bagpipe known here as a duda, assembled it and demonstrated its deep, resonant music.

"There is nothing like natural sound," he said. He explained that as a young man in the Soviet Union he played electric guitar and that electronics create even more music these days. "It is like synthetic clothes," he said, shaking the lapel of his suit.

Upstairs on this election day morning, a quartet of women played cimbaloms, a version of the dulcimer, practicing for their part in Sunday's election day concert at the House of Culture here, which doubled as the village polling place. "This is our tradition," the chairwoman of the local election commission, Lyudmilla Polichik, said of the concert.

"Please, come watch," she said, inviting unexpected foreign visitors to join in Krupitsa's celebration of an election that would return to power the man who, in her view, made all this possible, President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko.

"People have already felt the change in their lives," she said, describing a heightened sense of excitement for Mr. Lukashenko's third presidential election. "And they thank the president for it."

In the capital, Minsk, 20 miles to the north, Sunday's vote took place in an atmosphere of fear and anticipation of clashes between the security forces and Mr. Lukashenko's democratic opponents, who have accused the government of orchestrating a preordained victory.

Villages like Krupitsa, by contrast, offer a window into Mr. Lukashenko's popular support.

Everyone cites the evidence. The House of Culture recently underwent a complete renovation, after 20 years without repair. The old kolkhoz, or collective farm, recently merged with a production company to become a joint venture, owned by the state and called Raps, for the rapeseed it grows and the oil made from it. A clinic was built with money raised by performances of a folk music and dance ensemble, Krupitskaya Musika, which Mr. Grom directs.

The group has toured throughout Europe and even went to Japan in 1995, though the foreign trips tapered off after 2000, when Mr. Lukashenko's government became increasingly ostracized by its European neighbors.

"It is not window dressing, like we used to do in the old times," Mr. Grom said of the clinic, a stadium and the Raps headquarters. Most of all, of course, he praises the renaissance of a musical education program that teaches the village's children the traditions of Belarussian folk culture with the instruments that he collects.

"They are not professionals," he said of the women playing the cimbalom, "but they do not grow rape any more."

Mr. Grom, 55, earns roughly $500 a month, twice the national average. He does not agree with everything Mr. Lukashenko has done, including a system of contracts for state workers, almost everyone in Belarus, that critics say allows the government to punish the disloyal, politically or otherwise. Still, he said, "The people here are happy — we have reached a certain level."

Asked about limits on democratic freedoms, including artistic expression, he said he had experienced none. He had not heard of The Free Theater in Minsk, whose performances have gone underground because its repertory is not deemed sufficiently patriotic by cultural commissars.

"You see the other republics, where they broke down the old system," he said, referring to the 14 other nations that emerged from the Soviet wreckage. "We feel sorry for them."

On stage in the House of Culture, Yevgeniya Yakovleva, 8, played Rachmaninoff's "Italian Polka" on the dulcimer. Those in the auditorium, perhaps two-thirds full, clapped along with a girl who, in her own small way, represents the future of Belarus.

"We have simply chosen our own way," Mr. Grom said.

Europe's Last Dictator (WSJ)

By Matthew Kaminski

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Who will cry, after yesterday's fiasco of a presidential election, for Belarus? More to the point, who can find this nation of 10 million (mostly delightful) Slavic souls without a peek at a map? Safe to say, not many, which is good news for Alexander Lukashenko's career plans.

In the club of democracy's enemies, Mr. Lukashenko is an elder statesman, a Hugo Chavez of the steppes. He is a clever populist who cultivates other pariahs and holds an old Bolshevik's contempt for opposition and political compromise. The 51-year-old collective farmer is widely known, thanks to Condi Rice, as "Europe's last dictator," though that nickname sells Vladimir Putin and other recent arrivals short.

This election will likely even the score, so to speak, in the democracy battles of the former U.S.S.R. After Georgia, Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan tossed out authoritarian regimes, the Kazakh and Azeri strongmen last year held on after their own rigged polls. Mr. Lukashenko, with Russia cheering him on, looks to make it three apiece. Official exit polls released two hours after voting started yesterday -- it was that sort of election -- gave Mr. Lukashenko over 80% in his bid for a third term, while his leading challenger Alexander Milinkevich, who'd scored up to 25% in opinion polls, got around 5%.

Mr. Milinkevich, a bearded physicist with a soft voice and pleasant manner, last night called the outcome a "farce" and his people onto the streets. He talks of a peaceful "denim revolution" to match Ukraine's orange or Georgia's rose. Jeans are still the symbol of youth, freedom and the West out East. Don't hold your breath. The riot police usually outnumber anti-Lukashenko demonstrators at opposition rallies. This time, taking no chances, the regime threatened to execute, on terrorism charges, anyone who dares take their grievances to the streets.

For promoters of democracy, Mr. Lukashenko is a reality check. Twelve years ago, he came out of nowhere to win nearly three in four votes in the country's first and last free elections. The young country's institutions were too weak to resist his frontal attack -- and the populace too scarred by decades of Soviet repression to care. Charismatic, to a Belarusan peasant at least, Mr. Lukashenko made wild allegations of corruption against the post-Soviet rulers. In power, he repressed in the name of fighting graft, proving a point I recently heard made by the Venezuelan editor of Foreign Policy magazine, Moisés Naím, that "anti-corruption campaigns" often end up subverting democracy in developing countries.

In addition to his KGB (the Soviet anthem and flag stayed the same, too) and selective murder of opponents, President Lukashenko used a series of popular votes -- the very symbol of suffrage -- to short-circuit democracy. In 1995 and 1996, the regime rammed through referendums that neutered parliament and boosted presidential powers. Independent polls show him to be the country's most popular leader, who has delivered strong economic growth, powered by Russian subsidies, while playing to nostalgia for Soviet days. With no independent press or TV widely available, most people don't know any better.

So things will stay as they are? Naturally Mr. Lukashenko, like a Milosevic or Saddam, wants nothing more than for the world to resign itself to a few more decades of him. A tyrant's best ally is fatalism.

Mr. Milinkevich at least recognizes the terms of the fight. "A majority of Belarusans want a change and want democracy," he said over dinner in Brussels recently. "People must start to believe that change is possible."

The Milinkevich candidacy was in itself a step forward. Last October, the opposition -- small except for the egos -- for the first time backed a single man to lead them. (Nothing moved in authoritarian Croatia, Serbia or Slovakia of the 1990s until the fractious democrats united.) Mr. Milinkevich surprised everyone by shooting up from nowhere in credible polls. He had no national media exposure, but word spread by mouth and blog, largely thanks to a lively student movement, Zubr. He went door to door to win votes, a first for a politician in Belarus. "Half the doors remained closed to him," said Vintsyuk Vyachorka, who leads the largest opposition party. "The main problem is the fear of the people. To overcome it, we must show this hesitant majority that there is a responsible leader who has no fear himself." A fortnight ago, Mr. Vyachorka, a key Milinkevich campaign aide, was jailed for 15 days for organizing "unauthorized rallies." Supporters fear for his life.

Belarus is as fallow ground for democracy as exists anywhere today, the Arab world included. Support from abroad helps make the playing field slightly less skewed against the opposition. The U.S. this year provided $21 million for democracy in Belarus. This money is best spent on media, Mr. Milinkevich told me, to better inform people about their own country. But foreign cash didn't bring the bodies out on the streets in Ukraine or Georgia, and can't do so here. That's up to Belarusans themselves.

In discussions of democracy-promotion today, it's fashionable to say, "Forget Poland." By that, skeptics mean that the experience of 1980s Poland, the first European Soviet satellite to fall, doesn't apply to "non-Western" cultures -- Arab or Russian or Central Asian. Try telling that to the Belarusans, who are the Poles' eastern neighbors and once shared a state with them. On hearing the early results, Mr. Milinkevich yesterday said that "People will laugh at those figures. In Poland people began laughing at communist authorities and this is when Solidarity won. We are getting there."

It may take longer than Mr. Milinkevich might wish. Democracy isn't inevitable in Belarus, Europe or anywhere else. But nor is another 12 years of rulers like Mr. Lukashenko. "We are not romantics," Mr. Vyachorka told me before his arrest. "We are pragmatics."

Furor Over French Employment Law Rages On (USAT)

By Claudia Sanchez And Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, March 20, 2006

PARIS — Growing protests by students and unions opposed to labor laws that will make it easier to fire young workers are testing France's government. (Related: Jobs law means little in poor suburb)

Crowds estimated by the French Interior Ministry at more than 500,000 turned out in about 150 cities Saturday in the largest of six weeks of anti-government protests. Labor leaders warned President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, the architect of the labor-law change, that the government had until tonight to back off or face more demonstrations and possibly a general strike.

"It is obviously an ultimatum," said Réné Valladon, confederal secretary of the Force Ouvriere union, which represents civil servants and workers at state-owned companies. "The government and the president of the republic have indeed 48 hours to decide," he said in a statement on the union's website.

Saturday's biggest protest, in the southeastern part of Paris, had the air of a street festival. Young and old turned out on a sunny day. However, the march turned violent for the second time in three days.

Police fired tear gas at rock-throwing youths at the Place de la Nation at the end of the march. Later, police fired a water cannon to disperse students who tried to storm blockades at the Sorbonne University in the Latin Quarter. The blockades were put up after police on March 11 removed 300 students who had occupied France's oldest university. The Sorbonne was the starting point of a May 1968 leftist student revolt against the French establishment. Those protests spread into general strikes across France and eventually led to the resignation of President Charles de Gaulle.

Clashes spread throughout country

Paris police said seven police officers were injured, four cars were set on fire, and 167 people were arrested Saturday. The Associated Press reported similar skirmishes in Marseille, Rennes and Lille.

Tens of thousands of high school and university students converged Thursday on Paris for a daylong, nationwide student protest. Up to 58 of France's 84 public universities were closed or partly closed during the week, according to the Ministry of National Education.

The point of controversy is a new law that allows employers to fire new workers younger than 26 during their first two years on the job without giving a reason. The change was proposed Jan. 16 by Villepin and approved March 9 by Parliament after being rushed through with little debate. It is aimed at attacking France's high youth unemployment rate.

The jobless rate is 22.8% for workers age 18 through 26. That is more than double the 9.6% overall unemployment rate. The jobless rate for youth in some suburbs in major cities, where many African immigrants and their French-born children live, is as high as 50%, the Interior Ministry says.

Villepin, who oversees France's economy, advocated the change partly in response to youth riots that began in the Paris suburbs in October and spread to other cities. The rampaging youths complained that they couldn't find jobs or places to live because they were Muslim or did not have French names.

The new law was designed to give employers greater flexibility in firing so that they would be less wary of taking on new workers, become more productive and create more jobs. It takes effect next month.

Many of Saturday's protesters in Paris, such as Johanna Etchecopar, 22, an arts student at the University of Evry, say the change in the law undermines job security. "The law will increase the precarious situation," Etchecopar says.

Celine Bureau, 17, a high school student, says, "The law will make us go from employed to unemployed very easily and very often. We want the government to prepare solutions for our future."

Images of students battling police at the barricades at the Sorbonne in Paris' Left Bank evoked memories of May 1968, when utopia-minded students protested a bourgeois university system and demanded change in society. As the clashes grew, unions joined to protest police brutality. The unions also demanded a wage increase and launched a nationwide strike. In April 1969, de Gaulle resigned after a no-confidence vote on a referendum to restructure French government.

While the protests by students and unions against unpopular government policies appear similar, the issues are far different now. "It looks like '68. It smells like '68. It sounds like '68. But it's not," says Dominique Moisi, deputy director of the French Institute of International Relations in Paris, who was a student in 1968.

"In 1968, after 30 years of full employment and economic growth, students were bored to death," Moisi says. "Today, after 20 years of unemployment, the students of 2006 are looking for security."

The change in the law evokes such hostility because of the relationship that the French feel that they have with employers, says Iain Begg, an economist with the London School of Economics' European Institute.

Prime minister not backing down

While American and British workers may view their jobs as economic contracts, Begg says, the French see them as social contracts in which employers are obliged to provide stable employment. If the French are going to solve their high unemployment, he says, they must take more steps like this one to make companies more competitive and productive.

The prime minister has not backed away from the new law. Chiraq has stood behind him. In an interview published Sunday in Citato, a monthly for high school students, Villepin said he is convinced the law will work. What happens this week could determine not only the fate of the law, but Villepin's political future. He hopes to replace Chiraq as president next year.

The president of the Sorbonne, Jean-Robert Pitte, speaking in a telephone interview from his office behind the barricades on Friday, said he saw a comparison between the student revolt of 1968 and now. "We change by revolution. It is how we have done it over the last 200 years."

Sanchez reported from Paris, Stinson from London.

French Unions Threaten To Strike (NYT)

By James Kanter, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, March 20, 2006

PARIS, March 19 — Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin of France on Sunday faced an ultimatum from union leaders to withdraw the employment law that set off huge nationwide demonstrations and sporadic violence over the weekend, or face a general strike.

After the protests ended in outbreaks of violence late Saturday, union leaders gave Mr. de Villepin a deadline of Monday evening to withdraw the law, known as the First Employment Contract, which was intended to make it easier for businesses to hire and fire young people.

"If nothing moves, we will propose preparing a day of general work stoppages in the coming days," said Bernard Thibault, secretary general of the powerful C.G.T. labor union.

A front-page editorial in the Sunday newspaper Le Journal du Dimanche predicted that Mr. de Villepin, who has been in office for 10 months, would hold firm. But further conflict could damage his prospects of running for president next year.

The employment measure, set to go into effect in April, would allow employers to lay off new workers younger than 26 without cause for two years. Protesters say the law erodes vital employment rights and could be turned into a charter to exploit young workers.

Security forces arrested 167 people at the protests on Saturday and were still holding 70 on Sunday morning, said Catherine Castéran, a spokeswoman for the National Police. She said 34 members of the security forces and 18 demonstrators had been hurt in the violence. None of the injuries were serious, she said.

There was little sign that the tension over the contract would ease this week. On Monday, union leaders will meet to discuss the timing of a possible general strike, said Maurice Marion, a spokesman for the C.G.T.

Student groups could resume their street protests as soon as Thursday, the newspaper Le Monde reported.

So far the government has refused to cancel the measure, saying only that modifications are possible. But commentators say that Mr. de Villepin now looks trapped after the ultimatum from unions, a call by university presidents to suspend the measure and a recent opinion poll indicating that 68 percent of French citizens favor overturning the law.

"Watering down the contract could be a quick escape route for Villepin," said Emmanuel Rivière, the director of political research at TNS Sofres, a polling firm. "But that would be a political liability for him, too, because then the contract probably wouldn't do as much to lower unemployment."

Mr. de Villepin pushed through the law to ease chronic high unemployment, particularly among the young. One in four young people in France is out of work.

But Mr. de Villepin's plan has come unstuck as union members fight to retain their job security and students accuse the government of age discrimination and of leaving them vulnerable to unscrupulous employers.

French Unions Threaten To Strike (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

PARIS -- Buoyed by big protests Saturday across France, French trade-union leaders threatened yesterday to call a nationwide strike to increase pressure on the government over a new labor law.

The strike threat escalates the stakes in a protest movement initially driven largely by students but now grown into a far broader campaign of opposition to an overhaul of France's rigid labor market.

The alliance of students and labor is a powerful force in French politics. It drove a 1968 revolt that, like the current movement, centered on the Sorbonne, a venerable academy in the middle of Paris that has been shut for more than a week following clashes between students and riot police.

Trade unions are much weaker now, hit by declining membership that has left only a small portion of the total work force unionized. Nonetheless, unions still have muscle, thanks to their ability to disrupt the national railway and other state-run services.

In a radio interview yesterday, Bernard Thibault, head of France's biggest union, the CGT, said he would propose a one-day general strike if the government doesn't abandon its labor changes. The CGT and other trade unions will meet today to make a decision, he said. The leader of Force Ouvrière, another union, also dangled the possibility of a strike, but it is unclear whether union members would support such drastic action over labor overhauls that don't directly affect them.

The strike warnings followed protest marches Saturday in more than 150 cities and towns. Authorities put the turnout at 500,000; organizers claimed three times that many. In Paris, a march across the city drew about 100,000 people, including leaders of the socialist and communist parties. It was the biggest protest so far, attracting not only students but also many older people anxious about the encroachment of "Anglo-Saxon" free-market methods.

At the end of Saturday's Paris protest, police fired tear gas to halt a small riot near Place de la Nation. Several cars were torched and a McDonald's restaurant was attacked. Protesters also tried to break a police blockade around the Sorbonne in the Latin Quarter. In Marseille, police used tear gas against youths who clambered up a City Hall flag pole to replace the French flag with a banner reading "Anti-Capitalism."

The snowballing protest movement risks derailing the government's efforts to tackle what many economists see as a major obstacle to economic growth. They also could reshape a presidential election next year. Seriously weakened by the conflict is Dominique de Villepin, France's center-right prime minister and a presidential hopeful. France's normally fractious left-wing opposition, meanwhile, has united in opposition to the labor-law changes.

The government says the changes, which make it easier to hire and fire young workers, will ease unemployment, particularly in deprived urban areas that erupted in violent rioting last fall. Protesters, however, say the centerpiece of the changes -- a contract for workers younger than 26 that frees employers from legal constraints on dismissing them within the first two years of hire -- will erode workers' rights and create only "junk jobs." In Paris Saturday, students waved placards denouncing the measure as a "garbage job contract" and a "slave contract." Some marched wrapped in blue plastic garbage bags. "We don't want law-of-the-jungle capitalism," said Clara Borarier, 20, an art-history student.

French unemployment stands at 9.6% but is more than twice as high for young people. Among older marchers, anger at a new labor law mingled with nostalgia for 1968 and alarm over globalization. "We were much stronger in 1968. We had all high hopes then. Now our horizons are much lower," said Gerard Daniel, a 56-year-old veteran of the 1968 unrest and CGT trade union activist. He said the goal now, in contrast with 1968, is "not to change the world" but to "protect what we've gained."

France's unrest plays into a debate across Europe over how to cut unemployment and lift sluggish economic growth without demolishing cherished worker rights introduced at a time when European economies were growing much faster. "Reform is ineluctable in Europe; if not, we'll lose everything," José Manuel Barroso, the head of the European Commission, said yesterday. "The status quo is not an option."

Jobs Law Means Little In Riot-torn Suburb (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, March 20, 2006

CLICHY-SOUS-BOIS, France — When Gnoro Biady saw youths running past his store with Molotov cocktails in this northern Paris suburb last fall, he feared that his store and livelihood would be incinerated.

But Biady, 47, an immigrant from the Ivory Coast, says he understood the frustrations that led youths here to launch nightly rampages starting Oct. 28. The riots spread over three weeks to almost 300 other enclaves of African immigrants and their French-born children.

"There are few jobs," Biady says. "And if you're black or Arab, they are hard to get."

The rioting began after teenagers Zyed Benna and Bouna Traore were electrocuted after climbing into an electrical substation. Some local residents said they were hiding there from police. Police have denied they were chasing the teens.

The rioting shook France and raised questions about whether every citizen enjoys the liberté, egalité, fraternité— "liberty, equality and brotherhood" — promised in its national motto. It also helped prompt French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin to push through Parliament a change in labor laws designed to tackle the high unemployment by encouraging employers to be more willing to hire new, young workers.

The change, which takes effect next month, would allow employers to fire workers younger than 26 without stating a cause during their first two years on the job. The passage of the law set off a rash of protests, some violent, by students and union workers across France who say the measure takes away job security.

There have been no demonstrations in this poor suburb against the new law. People don't expect any measures undertaken or proposed by the government to provide more opportunities for minority youth.

Oliver Klein, deputy mayor of Clichy-sous-Bois, says he has seen few changes in the suburb of about 28,000 since the unrest erupted last fall.

"We still have the same problems," he says. "Transportation, housing, employment issues are still a big problem here." The only thing that has changed, he says, is that the Interior Ministry has promised to build Clichy-sous-Bois' first police station.

Karen Boucheron-Didry, 31, teaches French at the Robert Doisneau high school, where the student body is mostly minorities.

She says the future will be very hard for many of her students, despite government promises of more open university admissions and greater job opportunities.

"They (government promises) are very far from reality," says Boucheron-Didry, whose school has the national motto emblazoned on the front of the building.

Biady, whose store offers groceries and African products, sees little future in France for his five children and is contemplating returning to the Ivory Coast.

"The jobs aren't going to be long-term," he says. "If things don't change, they will grow up suffering the same. They live here. They're educated here. But they can't find a job here."

China Puts Energy At Top Of Agenda For Putin's Visit (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White And Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Russian President Vladimir Putin is scheduled to visit Beijing tomorrow for talks in which energy will be high on the agenda. China intends to push its energy-rich neighbor to deliver on past promises to supply it with more power.

During Mr. Putin's two-day stay, his hosts are likely to convey growing frustration that Russia hasn't provided as much energy assistance as China has wanted. Beijing is expected to push the Russian leader to commit to specific plans for building oil and gas pipelines to China.

"China isn't satisfied with the development of cooperation in energy," Zhang Guobao, vice chairman of the National Development and Reform Commission told Russia's Interfax news agency early this month, in a rare display of open concern. "The practical level of cooperation in my view is still very insignificant."

The lack of progress is disappointing to China, which has scoured the globe for energy to supply its fast-growing economy, even though Russia, the world's largest gas producer and No. 2 in oil, is next door. At present, Russia supplies no gas to China and roughly 5% of China's oil imports.

A legacy of Cold War tensions between the two giants, there are no major pipelines and limited rail links across the shared border. Last year, Russia shipped 7.7 million metric tons of crude by rail to China. It had promised 10 million tons.

This week's discussions are expected to center on reviving talks to build a spur that would carry oil directly to China from a $7 billion pipeline Russia plans to build across east Siberia to the Pacific, as well as a stalled gas pipeline.

For years, China has pressured Russia to build more links and expand shipments. But Kremlin politics, Russia's legendary bureaucracy and Moscow's persistent suspicions of its more-dynamic neighbor have led to delays and broken promises. Beijing's efforts to buy up Russian energy assets, meanwhile, have run into roadblocks from the Kremlin.

China is particularly eager to foster closer energy ties with Russia because routing resources by land could be more secure than sea shipping. Currently, some four-fifths of China's oil imports pass through the Straits of Malacca in Southeast Asia, which Chinese planners fear could be easily blocked.

Officials on both sides say a deal on a spur for the oil pipeline to the Pacific could be signed during Mr. Putin's visit, although Russia's record on following up pledges has Beijing wary.

"Take the question of building the oil pipeline. ... One Russian official says Russia has made the decision, another says it hasn't," Mr. Zhang told Interfax, in comments that were confirmed by his office in Beijing last week. "The whole process is unsatisfactory."

Japan, meanwhile, has been pressuring the Kremlin to ensure that any pipeline runs to the Pacific -- not directly to China -- thus preventing Beijing from monopolizing Russian supplies. Despite Russian assurances that there will be enough oil for both customers, Tokyo officials are concerned that China's surging demand could mean that no Russian crude flows to the Pacific Ocean, and on to Japan.

Within Russia, meanwhile, there is infighting over who will carry the oil. The national railroad was planning to spend more than $1 billion to expand lines to carry crude to China. It now wants the government to guarantee that the planned pipeline won't divert those flows, even though rail shipments are more costly.

Russian officials insist they want to see more oil flow to Asia, especially China, and hope the planned pipeline will stimulate growth across the desolate Siberian region. When completed in 2008, the line is slated to carry 600,000 barrels of crude a day. Moscow has said it will expand daily capacity to 1.6 million barrels, although officials have given no indication of when that might happen.

Han Xiaoping, senior vice president of Beijing-based energy consultancy Beijing Falcon Pioneer Technology Co., said the negotiations may still take time. "Russia isn't market driven. But maybe this [Putin] visit is slowly the turning point."

Moscow is only beginning talks on links to supply gas to China. An official from the state gas company OAO Gazprom said it will sign an agreement in Beijing this week spelling out planned volumes and the pricing formulas for future gas shipment. But officials indicate key issues including where the multibillion-dollar pipelines will be run remain unresolved.

"In Russia, the contract signing is only the beginning of the negotiation," said Stephen O'Sullivan, an analyst at United Financial Group, a Moscow brokerage. "The Chinese are increasingly strident in their view that 'We're not just going to wait for you.' "

While Beijing would clearly prefer the security and low cost of pipeline gas from Russia, the Chinese government could also build more terminals for liquefied natural gas from elsewhere in Asia as an alternative.

Beijing had been working with BP PLC on a deal to bring in gas from the huge Kovykta field, which lies relatively close to the Mongolian border near Lake Baikal. But Gazprom blocked that project, saying it wants to determine where pipelines are built.

In an interview with Chinese media Friday, Russian First Deputy Premier Dmitry Medvedev, who also serves as chairman of Gazprom's board of directors, seemed to provide a ray of hope for Kovykta, citing it as an example of what he called "significant potential for cooperation in the gas sphere."

Russian officials have expressed concern that building a gas pipeline directly to China would leave them hostage to a single buyer. Analysts and officials said Gazprom needs to decide quickly on its plans for fields and pipelines to be able to deliver gas by early in the next decade.

Beijing Passes On Intervening Over Iron Ore (WSJ)

By Rebecca Blumenstein

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

BEIJING -- China's top economic planner said the government won't intervene in continuing negotiations between Chinese steelmakers and foreign mining companies that supply the iron ore they need, despite earlier warnings by Chinese officials that the country couldn't tolerate higher prices.

"The government will not interfere," Ma Kai, head of the National Development and Reform Commission, told a group of U.S. newspaper editors Friday. "This price will be decided on the basis of market and enterprise negotiations."

China is increasingly concerned about prices of key commodities needed to feed its surging economy, such as oil, copper and steel. Prices for China's iron-ore imports surged 71.5% last year from 2004. The sharp jump has hurt Chinese steelmakers, which have banded together in the current negotiations with global iron-ore suppliers.

Earlier last week, China's Ministry of Commerce issued a statement warning that China can't tolerate higher iron-ore prices. The ministry warned it may take unspecified measures if prices are deemed too high.

Speaking to a visiting delegation from the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Mr. Ma reiterated China's broader development goals approved earlier last week by China's National People's Congress, or legislature. The goals include balancing economic growth with measures to protect China's environment. Surging pollution levels in China's air and water have become an issue of national and international concern.

"We are aware that we cannot develop our economy at the expense of tomorrow," Mr. Ma said. He said local officials will be judged not only by how much their regional economies grow, but also by their success at protecting the environment.

He said China's leaders are committed to reducing a widening income disparity that is making some Chinese very rich while the country's annual per capita income averages slightly more than $1,700. "All we can say is that they are growing pains ... it is a historic and long-term process."

Mr. Ma, who has headed the NDRC since 2003, is among the country's most influential economic policy makers. Indeed, the commission, which was built on the foundation of the former State Planning Commission and a number of industrial ministries, is so powerful that it is sometimes called the "Little State Council." Besides setting macroeconomic policies, the NDRC continues to oversee a number of industrial sectors and is involved in such key issues as energy.

Mr. Ma said he isn't overly worried about inflation. If prices rise, he said, the government "has enough economic instruments to control it."

Americas Brazil, Mexico, Chile Are Expected To Fuel Strong Area Growth (WSJ)

By Patricia San Juan

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile -- The economies of Latin America and the Caribbean will likely expand an overall 4.3% in 2006, according to Jose Luis Machinea, head of the United Nations' regional-research group.

"We are [forecasting] between 4% and 4.5%, but I think it will be more like 4.3%," said Mr. Machinea, head of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, or Eclac.

The official said the forecast is based on expectations that Brazil and Mexico, the region's two largest economies, may expand slightly faster than expected. Furthermore, Chile also may perform better than the 5.5% forecast of Eclac, Mr. Machinea said. For now, however, the group isn't changing its estimate.

Argentina may expand closer to 7% this year, faster than the previous Eclac forecast of 6%, because a surge in growth at the end of 2005 may spill over into this year, he said.

Consumers In Japan And Europe May Help To Drive Global Growth (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse And Jathon Sapsford

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

An important shift is taking place in the global economy: Japan and Europe, until recently among the biggest drags on world growth, may soon be playing crucial supporting roles.

In a trend that has caught many economists by surprise, companies and consumers in the euro zone and Japan, the world's second- and third-largest economies after the U.S., have started spending again -- or appear poised to do so -- for the first time in years.

The new climate has prompted moves by central bankers in both places to push up interest rates to curb inflation, a policy that could weigh on stock and bond prices everywhere by slowing the flow of cash around the globe. But the re-emergence of spending in those nations has implications far beyond financial markets.

For one thing, it means that the world might be less dependent on the American consumer, whose willingness to borrow and spend has been a primary driver of world growth for the past five years. If U.S. economic growth starts to taper off later this year, as some economists predict, Japanese and Europeans might help pick up the slack, a global rebalancing act that many had hoped for but few had thought probable. Growing local demand in emerging economies such as China and India could make a difference, too.

"I feel nervous as hell thinking it, because it's such a ridiculously optimistic thing to think," says Jim O'Neill, chief economist at Goldman Sachs in London. But, "if the U.S. was ever going to slow down, in many ways there couldn't be a better time for it."

Even if U.S. growth doesn't slow anytime soon, stronger growth abroad would be welcome news. It could help rein in the widening U.S. trade deficit by giving American companies more opportunity to sell their goods and services overseas.

"The businesspeople in both Japan and Europe are beginning to feel their oats," U.S. Treasury Secretary John Snow said last week in an interview with The Wall Street Journal. The trend, he said, is "good for us."

For the time being, the U.S. is on a roll, fueling growth in the rest of the world by buying much more stuff from abroad than it exports. The current-account deficit, a measure of how much the U.S. borrows from overseas to pay for foreign goods and services, widened to a record $805 billion in 2005 from $668 billion in 2004. That's a sign that the world's dependence on U.S. demand has been growing.

Some economists, though, expect the U.S. economy to slow in the second half of 2006, as stagnant or falling home prices make Americans feel less wealthy, and thus less willing to spend. Economists polled by the Journal expect annualized growth in U.S. gross domestic product to slow to 2.9% by the fourth quarter of this year from 4.6% in the current quarter. That could be a significant blow to the global economy: U.S. consumers buy about a fifth of everything the world produces.

Until recently, there were few candidates to step up and buy if the U.S. consumer stepped down. Japan has been growing for three years, but slowly and without much help from its consumers. Europe, too, offered little hope of buoyancy. Household consumption in Germany, for example, fell in each of the past four quarters.

But change has come quickly. In Japan, for example, fourth-quarter GDP grew at an annualized 5.4%, the highest rate among the Group of Seven industrialized nations. More significantly, Japanese consumers have regained some of their urge to buy. After barely budging for much of the past decade, Japan's household spending grew by an annualized 3.5% in the final quarter of 2005.

Anecdotal evidence suggests a society that is learning how to spend money again. New restaurants are opening in Tokyo's posh neighborhoods, as are high-end boutiques. Apple Computer Inc. sold 14 million iPod portable music devices in the last quarter of 2005 -- its best sales since introducing the iPod to Japan in 2001. Coach Inc., a maker of upscale handbags, expects its Japanese sales to jump 20% to about $410 million for the fiscal year ending in June.

The picture is less clear in Europe. In France and Spain, robust household spending is fueling an economic upturn. But in Germany, Europe's largest economy, official data still show consumers in the doldrums. Many economists hope Germans will feel better about opening their pocketbooks if -- as some surveys suggest -- employers start taking on more workers.

The widely followed Ifo survey, for example, shows German business confidence at levels not seen since the reunification boom of 1991. And in the most recent Manpower survey of hiring expectations, German businesses said they expect to increase their work forces by 5% in the second quarter, reversing an expected decline of 4% in the current quarter.

U.S. multinational companies see signs that German industry is tooling up to produce for local consumers. Nordson Corp., which makes systems that apply glue and paint to packaging for the kinds of food and other products that go to local markets, says that European orders in December through February were up 12% from a year earlier, largely due to German demand. Nordson, based in Westlake, Ohio, does two-thirds of its manufacturing in the U.S., so more foreign demand means more exports.

"Talking to other industrial companies, they're having a similar experience," says Peter Hellman, president and chief operating officer at Nordson.

To be sure, even Japan and Europe won't be able to compensate if U.S. consumer demand falls sharply. And both face deeper problems that will keep their economies from growing very fast in the long run. They have aging populations and shrinking labor forces. Germany also faces another hurdle: Many of its manufacturers are relocating to cheaper locales in Central and Eastern Europe.

Still, if Japanese and European consumers start buying more over the next year, it could help curb the gaping U.S. current-account deficit, which many economists have cited as the most glaring sign of a global economic imbalance. "We will be getting worse more slowly, or possibly improving a little bit," says Michael Mussa, senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics in Washington.

Further down the road, emerging economies could play a bigger role in correcting the world's imbalances. Already, people and companies in the largest emerging economies, most of which have grown mainly by selling to the rest of the world, are making their own contributions to global demand. Data from the International Monetary Fund suggest that in 2005, China, India, Brazil and Russia together contributed about 30% of total growth in global demand, which includes consumer, corporate and government spending. That's more than double the level in 2000.

Investment has been the main driver of China's consumption growth. Massive government spending on everything from highways to sports stadiums for the 2008 Olympics has led to surging demand for imports. And China's emergence as a global center for product assembly has driven demand for high-tech parts from around the world. As the Chinese economy advances, however, consumers are playing a larger role, increasing their spending at an annualized rate of around 12%.

The rapid emergence of a middle class in cities like Shanghai and Beijing is attracting many of the world's top brands, as well as retailers such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc., Carrefour SA and Ikea. Still, Beijing isn't satisfied. It hopes consumer spending will expand much faster, replacing investment and exports as a leading engine of growth. Such a shift will take time, partly because a lack of health and welfare measures encourages the Chinese to save more and spend less. Chinese savings are among the highest in the world, at more than 40% of GDP.

India, too, is experiencing a consumer boom, driven by low interest rates, a rocketing stock market and a growing number of young urbanites employed in technology, one of the hottest corners of the global economy. Over the past year in India, sales of air conditioners and DVD players have risen 25%, washing machines 18% and microwaves 27%, according to a recent survey by the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry.

The emerging economies' growth is still coming from a relatively low base. China must expand about seven times as fast as the European Union to make the same dollar contribution to global demand growth. But the gap is closing -- a fact not lost on businesses in the U.S.

"In the very near term, the strength in Europe is more important," says Paul Meister, vice chairman of Fisher Scientific International Inc., Hampton, N.H., which has recently seen stronger demand for everything from beakers to high-precision scales as European firms ramp up research spending. "But in the medium term, strength in Asia [outside Japan] is more important, particularly in China and India."

EU Raps Ankara For Pace Of Reforms (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The Turkish government has ducked a confrontation with the military over Kurdish unrest -- at the price of incurring fresh criticism from the European Union that it is not making needed reforms.

Signals from Ankara indicate the problem is likely to surface again as the EU presses Turkey for changes in the treatment of the Kurdish minority and the role of the military.

The EU said recently that Turkey "has lost its appetite for reform."

Tension remained high yesterday in southeastern Turkey, where security forces were reinforced as Kurds prepared to celebrate the Newroz spring holiday tomorrow.

Authorities in Diyarbakir, one of the centers of Kurdish unrest, banned civil servants from taking part in the festivities, warning violators of disciplinary action. Newroz is not an official holiday in Turkey.

At the same time, the government authorized two regional radio and television stations to start limited programs in the Kurdish language, use of which was until recently banned in public statements. The EU wants Turkey, a membership candidate, to eliminate all such restrictions.

Relations between the government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan and the military have been strained by a report that a leading general had organized a special autonomous military force to fight Kurdish nationalist guerrillas.

When a prosecuting judge called for an investigation of the report, Mr. Erdogan ordered a probe of the judge instead, saying, "No one will gain anything by making the country's military appear weak."

"The army is one of our most important institutions," he added, in what was seen by diplomats as an effort to placate the military.

The general involved, Gen. Yasar Buyukanit, is head of Turkey's land forces and is due to take over as chief of general staff in August. He publicly supports Turkey's bid to join the EU, but thinks certain reforms demanded by the union would threaten Turkish society and traditions.

Since the creation of the republic in the 1920s, the army has served as the ultimate guardian of the republican system. In 1997, it forced the resignation of Necmettin Erbakan, Turkey's first openly Islamist prime minister.

The relationship of the military and Mr. Erdogan's ruling Justice and Development Party has undergone periodic strains, mainly because of the party's Islamist roots and some government measures seen by the army as encouraging fundamentalism.

Prodded by the EU, Turkey has limited the army's role in the National Security Council, accepted the concept of civilian control over military finances and reduced the army's judicial autonomy.

But the EU says the reforms fall short of expectations and has asked for the appointment of an ombudsman to fight corruption and an easing of property restrictions for non-Muslim minorities.

Dowries Running Dry In Drought-Stricken East Africa (WP)

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya -- They were neighborhood friends who occasionally flirted amid the once lush elephant grass of the East African savanna.

He was a gregarious 28-year-old cattle herder who had a college education, spoke five languages and supplemented his income by working for an international safari business.

She was a lively 22-year-old high school graduate, respectful of her parents and a captivating storyteller who met his main physical requirement: She was tall.

He arranged to meet her parents, who brewed a traditional welcome drink of sugar, honey, herbs, sour milk and cow's blood at their farmhouse. For her dowry, he offered his best bulls and most productive dairy cows.

Then, with her parents' blessing, Moses ole Samante proposed marriage to Evelyn Kutingala last spring.

But the engagement of the two young Kenyans, both from the Masai tribe, proved stressful. As the region's worst drought in a generation swept across East Africa, turning grazing fields to rock-strewn expanses of dust, Samante's chances for a wedding grew as thin as his bony cattle.

Each month, more of his 300 cattle collapsed. Soon, nearly all were dead. By December, he had lost cattle worth more than $10,000 in a country where most people survive on $350 a year. The wedding was canceled. And Samante moved to Nairobi to find work.

"It's such a sad time," he said. "I had to leave my beautiful fields."

"Is there any way you can mate remaining cows quickly?" he recalled Kutingala pleading in a phone call from their village of Ntulele, about 120 miles south of Nairobi. "I fear they will give me to another, to an old and richer man. My mother doesn't want me to waste my youth."

The men of marrying age in East Africa are calling the current dry season "the drought that killed the dowry." On the world's poorest continent, droughts and changing weather patterns are pushing more and more Africans into cities, putting pressure on already strained resources and changing cultural practices, from diet to marriage traditions.

Humanitarian organizations estimate that 3.5 million people, mostly nomadic herders, are facing food shortages in Kenya. About 40 people have died of hunger-related illnesses, and 70 percent of livestock in the drought-affected northeast have perished.

Masai herders trying to escape the drought are streaming into Nairobi, letting their cattle feed on the city's grassy traffic circles. Police blotters are filled with reports of herdsmen being hit by cars. The Masai are also building congested shantytowns to live in and wandering the city begging for jobs.

"The drought and changes of weather patterns are disrupting a whole way of life," said Doug Keating of Oxfam International, which is helping distribute aid in the region. "If one was to take the view that the pastoralist way of life is no longer viable and they should give up their cattle, then what's the alternative? Millions head for the cities. I think we know cities in Kenya can hardly sustain the populations they have."A Hard Life in 'Nai-Robbery'

Samante first came to Nairobi, a city of high-rises and high crime, after a punishing two-year drought started in 1999, the seventh to hit East Africa since 1975. His parents begged him to seek a college education, and it was his father's dying dream, Samante said, that his eldest son learn foreign languages and earn a living that did not depend on cattle.

Samante arrived in Nairobi with $300 for his college tuition. But he lost it to a pickpocket shortly after arriving in a city Kenyans have nicknamed "Nai-robbery."

"We didn't have cars, we have cows, so I was looking this way and that. Not paying attention," he said, laughing at his former innocence. "And there were so many people, some banging smack into me. I would just smile and shake their hands. They gave me odd glances."

He returned to his village to sell more cows to make money. But when he returned to Nairobi a second time, he was robbed again.

This time, he thought he spotted the thief, a man who had stood very close to him asking questions about his Masai life. He ran after the man, and a fight broke out, he said.

Both men ended up in jail. Samante was beaten up by some inmates and teased as a "country Kenyan." He watched in shock as the thief used his college money to bribe his way out of jail, he said.

Samante eventually got out himself by having a friend also bribe the guards. But he had to work several jobs as a security guard to pay for college, and it took him years to graduate.

"We just aren't city guys," said Simon Kiraison, 22, a friend of Samante's from Ntulele who now works in Nairobi. "I can't marry. And I keep getting mugged. The city does not soothe my heartaches. It only brings more."

Samante and his friends in the city said they were afraid of the crime and frustrated that they could not afford milk, which they used to drink for free, or find cow's blood, a staple of their diet.

"Cow blood is very fantastic," Samante said. "I couldn't understand why the Nairobi tribes didn't want any."

Worst of all, they were lonely without their girlfriends and prospective wives.

Some of the rural men who moved to Nairobi took to having sex with prostitutes, a taboo in Masai culture. Cases of HIV infection began to increase in the Masai community, which historically has had a lower rate then the rest of the country, according to a government survey.

"We were losing all our self-respect," Samante said. "I wanted to try and remain a true Masai."A Debate About Dowries

Samante and Kutingala's wedding was to be a village celebration with more than 1,000 guests. A month beforehand, Kutingala's parents prepared a traditional wedding chest for her that contained fabrics, beaded necklaces and silverware.

But at the end of November, after he had lost nearly all of his cattle, Samante met with his fiancee's parents.

"When I told them," Samante said, "they wouldn't even look at me."

The drought has forced elders to revisit a debate about dowry and its role in a rapidly urbanizing Africa. Some of the arguments against dowries draw on stories like Samante's. Community leaders cite examples of girls being forced into early marriage by fathers eager to get the dowries to replace their livestock. Last month, educators rescued 20 schoolgirls in the herding district of Samburu from early marriage, according to national television reports.

The Catholic Church in Kenya, which has helped coordinate relief efforts, has blamed the government for failing to prepare for the droughts. In recent weeks, several high-level officials have been accused of pocketing a total of $1.3 billion in public funds, money that critics say should have gone to irrigation projects.

"It's really a big issue to see our culture being stamped out by drought, corruption and urban ways," said Julius Lemanken, a Masai who works for World Vision, an organization that is helping fund feeding projects. "Sometimes, culture changes naturally, on its own. But could this have been avoided? Will my grandchildren be able to herd like I did? Will they even know our good traditions?"

Young Kenyans say they are caught between strong traditions, which they still feel they must obey, and new ideas about wealth. Masai children are taught a proverb that says: "All cattle of the world actually belong to the Masai. Even the ones in India and the west were stolen from our lands."

"I love cows. I can't remove this mentality. If I do, we are lost people," Samante said. "The minute I have money in my pocket, I just buy cows. When I have money in the bank and no cows, it's like I am poor and pathetic."

Samante still hopes to wed, maybe in a year when he can mate his few remaining cattle. He just hopes Kutingala's family will allow her to wait for him.

"She met all of my needs for a young lady," he said. "I was so very happy."

"He was a successful and kind man in my age-set," Kutingala said she told her parents recently. "I am still longing for our married life."

At World Forum, Support Erodes For Private Management Of Water (NYT)

By Elisabeth Malkin

MEXICO CITY, March 19 — For more than a decade, the idea that private companies would be able to bring water to the world's poor has been a mantra of development policies promoted by international lending agencies and many governments.

It has not happened. In the past decade, according to a private water suppliers trade group, private companies have managed to extend water service to just 10 million people, less than 1 percent of those who need it. Some 1.1 billion people still lack access to clean water, the United Nations says.

The reality behind those numbers is sinking in. At the fourth World Water Forum, a six-day conference here of industry, governments and nongovernmental organizations, there is little talk of privatization.

Instead, many people here want to return to relying on the local public utilities that still supply 90 percent of the water to those households that have it.

There is a "big-time shift" in tone, said David Boys, a water policy expert with the Public Services International labor federation. Mr. Boys is a member of an advisory panel appointed by United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, that presented its recommendations at the forum, beginning with a call to strengthen local public utilities.

"The companies have lost tons of dough and tons of respect," Mr. Boys said. "They are pulling out."

Nowhere has that been more evident than in Bolivia, where, in the city of El Alto, residents have been fighting a subsidiary of the French company Suez. The government is now negotiating for Suez to leave, arguing that it did not extend service to people too poor to pay enough to make it profitable.

"The water rates have to conform to reality," said Abel Mamani, an activist from El Alto who is now Bolivia's new water minister.

An uprising in the city of Cochabamba five years ago chased out a subsidiary of the United States company Bechtel after it raised rates but failed to improve service.

Bolivian officials at the World Water Forum admitted that the old public municipal water systems were mired in corruption, bureaucracy and nepotism.

"The solution is for the community to get involved in water management," said Pablo Solón, an economic adviser to the government.

That kind of citizen oversight is already in place in many cities, like Porto Alegre, Brazil, which created a permanent council of 12 citizens' groups to oversee its water utility.

Even officials of the World Water Council, the organization that runs the forum and is heavily weighted toward multinational water companies, appear to be giving up on wholesale privatization.

"Let's finance infrastructure for the 50 countries most in need and the twenty poorest megacities through a more intense donation policy," said Loïc Fauchon, president of the council, in his opening speech last week.

The debate over privatization is driving the controversy inside and outside the forum, which ends Tuesday. Across town, international and local groups held an alternative forum for activists opposed to privatization, who are unconvinced that governments and organizations like the World Bank have given up on the idea.

"The state does not assume its responsibilities properly," said Cuauhtémoc Abarca, a Mexico City activist. "In many cases there is a deliberate intention to show that public utilities work badly" as an excuse to privatize them.

For all the focus on privatization, much of the serious work of the forum was rooted in heart-wrenching statistics.

One in three people in the world, 2.6 billion, does not have access to any kind of toilet or latrine, according to a United Nations report to be presented at the conference on Tuesday.

Water-related diseases cause more than three million deaths a year, mostly of children younger than 5. Unicef, the United Nations children's agency, estimates that women and girls in the poorest countries and regions walk nearly four miles a day to carry water.

Only $3 billion in aid a year goes to improve water access and sanitation, the United Nations World Water Development Report said, and very little of that gets to the people who need it most.

But there was encouraging news, too, that local activists, even very young ones, could make a difference.

"We were scolded for being young people with big ideas," said Suresh Baral, 13, who organized a sanitation club in his school in rural Nepal. With help from Unicef, the children set up a microfinance program to help villagers pay for installing toilets.

Dolly Akhter, 15, started a hygiene group for adolescent girls in her slum in Dhaka, Bangladesh. Many teenage girls stayed away from school, too embarrassed by the lack of privacy for hygiene.

But when the group brought in new latrines, the girls returned and several were able to avoid early marriages by continuing their studies.

As her news conference ended, she looked up and said in broken English, "I hope water for all in the world."

Wise Council (WSJ)

By Kofi A. Annan

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

In just seven weeks time, on May 9, the U.N. will elect its first Human Rights Council. That moment can, and must, mark a new beginning for all the U.N.'s human-rights work. One hundred and seventy nations, including all of America's NATO allies, voted last Wednesday for the resolution creating this new Council. Belarus, Iran and Venezuela abstained. Sadly, the U.S. voted against, joined only by Israel, the Marshall Islands and Palau.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador, explained his vote in a constructive speech, pledging that, despite its disappointment with the text, his country "will work cooperatively with other member states to make the Council as strong and effective as it can be." That is very encouraging. Ever since Eleanor Roosevelt helped to draft the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, the U.S. has been a leading champion of human rights at the U.N. I hope and believe it will remain so.

Why were some Americans disappointed with the text? Essentially because they fear that in the new Council, as in the Commission that it replaces, some notorious human-rights abusers will win seats and shield themselves from scrutiny. That concern is shared by many other states, which -- like the U.S. -- would have preferred that Council members be elected by a two-thirds majority of the General Assembly. I had myself suggested this when I first proposed the Council a year ago. But in exchange for dropping it the president of the assembly, Sweden's Jan Eliasson, was able to persuade the assembly to include other provisions, which will make it more difficult for gross human-rights violators to sit on the Council.

First, Council members must be elected, "directly and individually by secret ballot by the majority of the members of the General Assembly." This means that nations will not get on the Council, as they did on the Commission, simply because there is no rival candidate from their own region. There will be a separate vote on each candidate, and any state that does not win an absolute majority of all U.N. members (not just those present and voting) will not get in. Its region will have to put up another candidate instead.

Second, Council members are required to "uphold the highest standards in the promotion and protection of human rights," and to submit their own human-rights record to the Council's scrutiny during their term of membership. Already some governments have produced manifestoes, pledging specific improvements in their human-rights performance, in the hope of winning election. This was unheard of under the old system. And third, the General Assembly will have the power to suspend Council members that do commit gross and systematic violations during their term. It had no such power over the old Commission.

Taken together, these provisions should make it very hard for a notorious violator to win election, and should deter the worst offenders even from running. How effective they are depends, of course, on how seriously the U.N. membership takes them. Already a large number of states have pledged not to vote for candidates that are under Security Council sanctions for human rights-related reasons. If all governments that really care about human rights take a similar attitude, and use their powers of diplomacy to persuade others to do likewise, the membership of the new Council will be significantly different from that of the Commission.

And that will not be the only difference. Being chosen by the entire U.N. membership, the Council will have greater authority than the Commission, which was elected indirectly. It will also be faster on its feet. Unlike the Commission, the Council will meet regularly throughout the year, and can respond more promptly to human-rights crises by holding special sessions at short notice. (The Commission had only one six-week session each year, while its procedure for calling special sessions was much slower.)

Equally important, instead of singling out some countries for attack while ignoring human-rights violations in others, the Council will regularly review the human-rights record of all countries -- starting, as mentioned above, with its own members. It is required to "be guided by the principles of universality, impartiality, objectivity and non-selectivity," while eliminating "double standards and politicization." And whereas the Commission was entirely reactive, the Council is mandated to contribute to preventing human-rights violations.

Some had feared that the General Assembly would use the change to strip away some of the more valuable aspects of the U.N. human-rights system, such as the use of independent experts as special rapporteurs, or the important role of non-governmental organizations. But these are explicitly continued.

In short, there is every reason to hope that the new Council will combine the best features of the old system with some much-needed changes. All those who want it to fulfill this promise now have seven weeks to make it happen. Let no one who cares about human rights remain on the sidelines of this struggle.

Mr. Annan is U.N. secretary-general.

The Case For Caring Now (WP)

By Fred Hiatt

The Washington Post, March 20, 2006

On one of her visits to her native Liberia, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf told a joint session of Congress last week, she was placed in a jail cell with 15 men. "All of them were executed a few hours later," she said. "Only the intervention of a single soldier spared me from rape."

Now Johnson-Sirleaf, 67, is the newly elected president of her unhappy African country, and if you think she was trying to seize Congress's attention with that anecdote of 20 years past, you are no doubt correct.

After all, the world is full of unhappy countries that have won sympathy here, and then been rapidly discarded. Think Haiti, for example, or Afghanistan, which was of interest to Ronald Reagan, forgotten by George H.W. Bush, neglected by Bill Clinton and then (not coincidentally) a crisis again.

Now Johnson-Sirleaf, Africa's first female elected leader, is enjoying her moment of fame and good feeling. Laura Bush and Condoleezza Rice attended her inauguration in January, Congress greeted her as a hero last week, President Bush will receive her tomorrow. After a quarter-century of coups, dictators and civil wars in Liberia, this is a moment of restored democracy and hope.

Do not assume, however, that Johnson-Sirleaf therefore will stoop to unseemly flattery or diplomatic spin. After all her years of exile, harassment, surveillance and prison, with all the misery waiting for her back home, she seems to have no time for that.

As in: When she is asked during a visit to The Post how she will plead her case for aid to Bush, given draining U.S. commitments to Iraq and Afghanistan, she replies, "For the reason you said -- he needs a success. Billions are being spent on Iraq, billions are being spent on Afghanistan -- and it will take a fraction of those billions to make Liberia a success story.

"I think he needs one, and we're going to give him an opportunity to have one."

It's not that Johnson-Sirleaf, stately in traditional dress, comes across as ungrateful. In her address to Congress, she thanked the United States for its help in brokering an end to Liberia's vicious civil war and for sending money to get the country going again.

But, she says, "we still have problems. I can't tell you we're out of the woods."

Any Western leader might regard that as an astonishing understatement. Johnson-Sirleaf works out of a dilapidated palace that, like the rest of her country, depends on generators for electricity.

"We have a city that's dark," she says. "We have a city where many young children don't know that water comes out of a tap." At night, children gather on street corners to do their homework by the spillover from private floodlights, since they have no light at home. Many others do no homework because they can't afford pencils, or can't attend school at all.

DOJ_NMG_0018767

Civil war drove most of the country's 3.5 million people from their homes. Some 45 percent of the population is 14 or younger; many of those children were press-ganged into armies and know no other life. Life expectancy is 42.5 years. Unemployment is 80 to 85 percent. Of every 1,000 children born, 132 die in infancy.

Why should the United States care? The standard answer of traditional historical ties, based on the freed American slaves who founded Liberia, may have worn thin after all these years. But there are two others.

One is that helping is cheaper in the long run than the alternative. When conditions in a country become too atrocious to bear -- when drug-addled marauders take to chopping off the hands of children who get in their way, as in Liberia's neighbor Sierra Leone -- public opinion may (at least some of the time) force the United States, Britain or the United Nations to intervene. By the time that demand comes, the destruction is so complete -- in Liberia, roads, hospitals, water pipes, everything has crumbled -- that repair is far more difficult and expensive.

The second is Johnson-Sirleaf herself: Harvard-trained economist, former World Bank and U.N. official, democrat. She espouses an anti-corruption, socially inclusive vision that aid officials can only dream of finding in most poor countries. Courageously, for he still has many followers, she has asked that former dictator Charles Taylor, now in Nigeria, stand trial for his crimes.

When her hour at The Post is over, she waves off the usual pleasantries and asks: What will emerge from this interview? What will Liberia get out of it? And suddenly "grandmotherly," the adjective you often hear applied to her, reminds you less of the woman who sneaked you an extra cookie when your mother wasn't looking and more of having your hands checked for cleanliness before being seated at the Sunday dinner table.

Well, Madam President, I'm afraid this column is the best I can do. I hope you get more out of President Bush tomorrow.

Spreading Genocide To Chad (NYT)

After the Holocaust, the world vowed it wouldn't stand back and allow genocide to happen again. Bosnia, Cambodia and Rwanda showed how empty that promise was. Darfur was yet another reminder that when it comes to standing up to stop the slaughter of entire peoples, the nations of the world remain pitifully inadequate.

And now, as if the hundreds of thousands of Africans killed in Sudan weren't enough, the Arab militias financed by the government of Sudan to "cleanse" Darfur of blacks are moving across the border into neighboring Chad. Our colleague Nicholas Kristof reports that the janjaweed — the name given to the Arab militias — have unleashed their fury on villages in Chad, riding in and killing and raping, accompanied by their standard shouting of racial epithets like "black slaves."

Mr. Kristof is one of the few journalists willing to venture into the lawless region. He took along NBC's Ann Curry of the "Today" show on his trip this month, and wrote about a market town in Chad near the Sudan border called Koloy, where villagers were actually waiting to be massacred. There was no one to help them. Chad's government sent a handful of troops, but when the soldiers realized that they would be facing more than 500 janjaweed armed with heavy machine guns, they fled. Diplomats don't dare visit because it's not safe. Ditto for United Nations aid groups. Only one organization, Doctors Without Borders, goes to Koloy, Mr. Kristof reported, "sending in a convoy of intrepid doctors three days a week to pull bullets out of victims."

Is this really what we have come to? The United Nations has described the carnage in Darfur as the world's biggest humanitarian crisis but continues to prove itself completely useless at doing anything to stop it. In the Security Council, China protects Sudan. Europe, for its part, has been inert.

That leaves the United States, where the Bush administration has made a few strides. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick appears to be close to getting the United Nations to supplement, if not replace, the woefully ineffective African Union peacekeeping force in the region with United Nations peacekeepers. The United States should also commit to providing specialized reconnaissance and air support for the United Nations force. Sudan's government doesn't like the idea of a multinational peacekeeping force, and has even organized demonstrations in the capital against the idea, although the protesters tend to look suspiciously like government military types.

The African Union soldiers have done their best, but they are poorly equipped for one thing, and low in numbers for another — there are only 7,000 of them in an area the size of France. They don't have much in the way of intelligence capability and they are lightly armed. That's a recipe for stalemate, and stalemate is the last thing villagers waiting to be massacred need.

A Chinese Huff (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 20, 2006

Ever wonder why India's economy might overtake China's one day? China's Commerce Minister, Bo Xilai, might acknowledge India's English-language capabilities and its younger population. But never mind those pesky ideas about the rule of law and democratic principles.

At the Asia Society's annual corporate conference in Mumbai yesterday, we asked Mr. Bo what the Middle Kingdom might learn from India's experience, particularly as the Chinese economy becomes more integrated with the rest of the world. To our surprise, and to the shock of the audience -- save the mainland rent-a-clap crowd who were along to lend a literal hand -- Mr. Bo embarked on a tirade against democratic freedoms.

"Democracy is not the ultimate goal," Mr. Bo, the princeling son of Long March veteran and former Vice Premier Bo Yibo, declared. "We need to raise the living standards of the people." (Cue: rent-a-clap.) "I've been to lots of developed countries where there are also a lot of poor people," he added, jabbing his finger at us. (Encore rent-a-clap.) "I don't think it's good to separate countries into democratic or non-democratic countries." (One more clap.)

Now, Mr. Bo happens to be one of the more enlightened Beijing bureaucrats. A former mayor of Dalian, a northeastern port city in Liaoning province, he won praise for boosting foreign investment, among other things. In his new role as commerce minister, he's also reacted calmly to bouts of European and U.S. trade protectionism.

But despite prolonged contact with open societies, Mr. Bo still doesn't seem to understand the secret of their success. Near the end of his huff, Mr. Bo backtracked and claimed that Beijing is "listening" to the voices of its people, and that its citizens are gradually gaining more democratic freedoms. If only it were so.

King Abdullah: Protector (WT)

By S. Rob Sobhani

The Washington Times, March 20, 2006

As the rest of the Muslim world was engulfed in violence over the publication of sacrilegious cartoons of the prophet Muhammad, one country at the heart and soul of the Muslim world remained surprisingly silent. Yet that country, Saudi Arabia, is where one would have expected the most virulent and violent demonstrations, since it is the birthplace of Islam. But extremists failed to capitalize on the European press' lack of respect for the prophet of Islam.

The extremists' failure to widely incite the population of Saudi Arabia is largely due to the nature of its new leader, King Abdullah. The new king is a pious and popular leader of the most significant Muslim country in the world, and he has reset the tone and tenure of political life in Saudi Arabia by emphasizing restraint and tolerance.

At his home in the outskirts of the capital, Riyadh, King Abdullah's gracious and reform-minded son, Prince Miteb, explained his father's vision as one of "constructive engagement." As custodian of Islam's two holiest shrines, King Abdullah understands the enormous responsibility he carries as the flag-bearer of Islam. Therefore, one of the most important themes that King Abdullah has been stressing is unity both within Islam and among the various faiths of the world. For example, at a recent gathering in Riyadh, he emphasized that the "clash of civilizations" is only likely to occur if instigators of discord are allowed to spread hatred without any intervening authority.

Unlike irresponsible Muslim clerics and "leaders" who encouraged violence in response to the cartoons, this reformist leader called on Muslim intellectuals to project the true picture of Islam as a moderate and tolerant religion: "We should tell the world that the mistakes committed by a small minority of extremists and fanatics do not represent the spirit of Islam and its heritage." The king led the way by expressing his satisfaction with the apologies issued by Danish authorities expressing their deep sorrow and thereby showed statesmanship on a grand scale.

Prince Miteb, who represents a new, more progressive generation of Saudi leaders, highlighted the National Dialogue Forum as an example of the king's commitment to democratization of the kingdom, individualized to adapt to the country's culture and norms. The forum was founded in 2003 on the instructions of then-Crown Prince Abdullah as a channel for "responsible expression." These Saudi-style town hall meetings have become an effective means of fighting fanaticism and extremism by enabling Saudi men and women from all walks of life to publicly discuss previously taboo subjects.

For the first time in the kingdom's history, Saudis are enjoying a culture of public dialogue that is bringing about societal change. The first two forums covered issues of religious tolerance and women's rights. As a result of these dialogues, King Abdullah was able to peacefully return the formerly shunned minority Shi'ite Muslims into the mainstream of Saudi society.

The third forum focused on education reform, whereupon most Saudis opined that the present education system produces students who are experts at memorization but who cannot think logically and rationally. Another forum was called "Us and the Other" and dealt with how Saudis relate to the rest of the world. A majority of participants were fiercely critical of the Saudi curriculum, which blames "the other" for most international problems.

As the United States faces the uncomfortable fact that its goal of energy independence is increasingly at odds with reality, America's energy security remains in lock-step with Saudi Arabia's oil strategy. Luckily for American consumers, King Abdullah's vision of a stable global-energy market is reflective of a deep understanding of the responsibility that Saudi Arabia has as the world's No. 1 oil producer.

The key policy for King Abdullah is price stability. He has ensured that Saudi Arabia is on track to increase its production capacity by 15 percent by 2009 to more than 12 million barrels per day. This bodes well for the United States because it could be importing 70 percent of its oil in 2020 (compared to 58 percent today and 33 percent in 1973). Furthermore, the king understands that globalization of the energy sector makes energy security a common responsibility of consumers and producers. His vision expands the concept of energy security to include the new super consumers -- China and India -- and acknowledges that the worldwide energy-supply value chain needs to be protected.

Under the leadership of King Abdullah, Saudi Arabia is undergoing a political and social reformation. It is incumbent upon the United States to work with this distinguished statesman to ensure that his vision becomes a permanent feature of this strategic, yet combustible, region.

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 23

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 24

TERRORISM NEWS:

Despite Agreement On Wiretaps Illegality, Senators Said To "Recoil" From Bush Censure. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/19, Gilbert, 266K) reports that while "most senators recoiled last week from Wisconsin Democrat Russ Feingold's resolution to censure the president, many of them agreed with one of its basic premises: that the wiretapping of Americans without a warrant is against the law," and doubts about its legality are "found among both liberal and conservative scholars and on both sides of the aisle in Congress."

Dead Saudi Al Qaeda Leader Preaches Violence In Video. The Washington Times/AP (3/19, El-Magd) reports that in a video sent to the Associated Press by email, Fahd Faraaj al-Juwair, the slain leader of al Qaeda in Saudi Arabia, "vowed in his final testament that his group would overthrow the royal family and stage more attacks against the kingdom and Americans in the region."

Lawyers In Moussaoui Case Argue Over Calling Martin To Testify. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Serrano, 958K) reports that Zacarias Moussaoui's lawyers want Carla J. Martin to "testify about why she tried to influence witnesses" even "as soon as Monday," saying "she should be the next witness before the prosecution brought in any 'untainted' witnesses on aviation security because her testimony would provide 'critical information' about the nature of the witness-tampering effort." However, "Prosecutors want to delay Martin's appearance until the middle of the week and have her testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment against self-incrimination."

Ashcroft Calls Cooperation Key To Terrorism Fight. The AP (3/19, Gresko) reports,

"Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft said Saturday that he does not believe the threat of terrorism has passed and that the United States must work with other countries to combat it." The AP continues, "In an hour-long talk as part of a conference on economic crime, the nation's former top law enforcement officer also discussed the importance and challenges of prosecuting financial crime and the emphasis after the 2001 terrorist attacks on 'prevention over prosecution.' … 'As we fight against terror . . . We need to remind ourselves of the necessity and value of being extremely cooperative with individuals of other nations and in other settings,' Ashcroft said." The AP adds, "Ashcroft also drew laughs with some self-deprecating remarks. He also joked that the crowd of approximately 200 students, professors and attorneys at St. Thomas University School of Law would not have to remember anything he said. … Not mentioned as part of his speech was the pending case in Miami against alleged terror suspect Jose Padilla, who was arrested almost four years ago while Ashcroft was attorney general."

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Satirized By Board Game. The AP (3/19, Parry) reports, "'Patriot Act: The Home Version' pokes fun at 'the historic abuse of governmental powers' by the recently renewed anti-terrorism law," and "the object of the game is not to amass the most money or real estate, but to be the last player to retain civil liberties."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House Drill Tests Response To Smallpox Attack. The New York Times/AP (3/19) reports Cabinet secretaries "participated in a drill on Saturday that simulated a smallpox attack as the government tested plans to counter the potential use of bioweapons by terrorists." Officials "from various government agencies, including Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, participated in the four-hour exercise. Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Michael O. Leavitt , the health and human services secretary, were among the cabinet members who were part of the drill."

Library Incident Cause Concern Over Maryland County's Homeland Security Force. The Washington Post (3/19, C5, Barr, 744K) reports that Montgomery County, Maryland's, "Homeland Security Department, national experts say, is the only such agency to maintain uniformed officers apart from its local police force." While "County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) wants to increase the department's $5 million budget by 20 percent in the next fiscal year," an incident last month when "a homeland security officer told public library patrons that they couldn't view Internet pornography," has "some County Council members…questioning the size and role of the department and its security unit," and "controversy surrounding the library incident might…be swelling."

White House Advance Workers Impersonated Reporters. The Washington Post (3/19, A11, Lee, 744K) reports, "The White House said yesterday that it will discipline two government employees who masqueraded as journalists this month while scouting locations for a presidential visit to the Gulf Coast. A Mississippi couple whose home was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina said two men who later identified themselves as Secret Service agents pretended to be Fox News journalists," but "Tom Mazur, a spokesman for the Secret Service, said he did not know who the men were but they were not Secret Service officials."

New Flood Maps Expected To Impact Louisiana Coastal Communities. The Washington Post/AP (3/19, Burdeau) reports that "new Federal Emergency Management Agency flood-vulnerability maps due to be released soon" for Louisiana's coastal areas "will likely make the insurance more costly, force residents to spend heavily to raise homes out of flood plains to qualify for coverage, make many other homes uninsurable and make lenders less willing to loan money for construction in flood-prone areas. That new reality may threaten the state's coastal population and its heritage of shrimp fishing, alligator hunting, fur trapping and oyster harvesting."

Reformers Try To Change New Orleans Bureaucracy. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Quinones, 958K) reports, "New Orleans has what critics contend are layers of redundant government that it can no longer afford, given its greatly reduced population and budget." Part of this is its "seven elected property assessors — each with their own staff and responsibility for a separate district — to assess the city's 164,000 parcels." Now, "Riding the wave of change, a group of lawyers and businessmen have qualified a slate of assessor candidates — known as the I Quit Ticket — for the April 22 city elections." They "vow to lobby for legislation allowing voters to approve consolidating their offices into one, and resign en masse when that happens," forcing "a special election of a single assessor."

Old Black Church May Close In New Orleans. The Washington Post (3/19, A7, Lydersen, 744K) reports, "In the face of a much-reduced city population and physical damage to many churches post-Katrina, the Archdiocese of New Orleans is closing seven parishes," including St. Augustine, "one of the nation's oldest African American Catholic churches." Still, "local residents are rallying behind the church and hoping the parish can be saved.

Future Of New Orleans Music Landmark Uncertain. The New York Times (3/19, Saulny, 1.19M) reports that part of Milne Boys Home in New Orleans was the Colored Waif's Home for Boys. "A host of noted jazz musicians", including Louis Armstrong, trained at the Colored Waif's Home, and "Milne stands as one of the last physical connections to the city's musical past." However, it was damaged in the flooding, "and many wonder if it will have a place in the new city." While, "officials said the city was negotiating with the Federal Emergency Management Agency to determine how much federal money might be available for the site," they also have "the chaos of dealing with an acute housing shortage, a coming mayoral election and tens of thousands of displaced residents."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Highlights Progress, But Iraq Continues To Weigh Down Approval. President Bush continues to make the case that the US is making progress in Iraq, even as polls show the war is taking a toll on his job approval rating. The President addressed the challenges facing the US in his weekly radio address, and the White House says he plans two speeches this week on "lessons learned" in Iraq. The issue was the subject of extensive media coverage, with much of it focused on the problems the US and the Administration faced in achieving its goal of establishing a peaceful democracy in Iraq.

NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 4, 1:55, Jordan, 9.87M) reported, "In his weekly radio address today, President Bush says Americans have seen horrific images from Iraq and he says more sacrifice will be required." President Bush: "The fighting has been tough. The enemy has proved brutal and relentless. We changed our approach in many areas to reflect the reality on the ground." Jordan: "Still, the President said US strategy in Iraq is succeeding 'slowly, but surely.' However, the latest Newsweek poll out today suggests that the majority of Americans disagree. 29% approve of how the President is handling the situation in Iraq; 65% disapprove. And Mr. Bush's approval ratings remains at a low of 36%, [while 58% disapprove.]"

The Washington Post (3/19, Gugliotta, 744K) reports Bush "promised to 'finish the mission' with total victory, urging the American public to remain steadfast but offering no indication when victory might be achieved." His "address comes at a time when confidence in the administration's Iraq strategy appears to have reached all-time lows."

The AP (3/19, Riechmann) says Bush "braced Americans for more bloodshed in Iraq but said recent civil strife has motivated warring political factions to move quickly to set up a representative government." His upcoming speeches will "be similar in tone to a series of talks he made in December to help turn public opinion on the war in his favor. In those talks, he combined steely resolve with frank acknowledgments that mistakes have led to changes in U.S. strategy."

Taking a negative tone on Bush's radio address, the Houston Chronicle/Cox News (3/19, Deans) reports, "Three years after President Bush launched the invasion of Iraq, the war grinds on amid escalating costs — in lives, money and U.S. influence abroad." In his radion address Bush said, "We will finish what we started in Iraq. … We will complete the mission." Yet, "sectarian violence verges on civil war. More than 130,000 troops remain in Iraq. And the toll on Iraq and the United States is far beyond anything the administration prepared Americans for in the lead-up to the March 19, 2003, invasion."

Over 50 local television stations covered President Bush's weekly radio address, focusing mainly on his call for patience and need to maintain resolve. Most of these same stations also reported on protests, or continuing violence in Iraq, on the third anniversary of war. For example: KTRK-TV Houston (3/18, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is urging Americans not to lose resolve today, signaling there will be no pullback, and promising that progress is being made, and the world is safer because of the invasion. In city after city, from London to Sydney and here at home, that stay-the-course strategy is fueling today's protests, one of the largest in this country in Chicago."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (3/18, 6:00 p.m.) reported President, "Bush says the horrific images from Iraq may overwhelm the good news on progress. But he insists Iraq is making strides towards a better future." KTRK-TV Houston (3/18, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Three years ago tomorrow, President Bush ordered the start of the war in Iraq. Today, the President defends the decision and tens of thousands head to the streets to protest."

KPHO-TV Phoenix (3/1/8) 10:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush expressed hope in his weekly radio address. He said Iraqi leaders are making progress for forming a new government and that will ease the bloodshed, but he warned of more fighting and sacrifice ahead."

WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (3/18 11:00 p.m.) reported President Bush said, "The security of our country is directly linked to the liberty of the Iraqi people, and we will settle for nothing less than complete victory." KARE-TV Minneapolis-St. Paul (3/18, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "In his weekly radio address, President Bush, facing dwindling approval ratings, is calling for patience."

Administration Lowers Expectations For Iraq Progress. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, McManus, 958K) in a front page analysis titled "U.S. Lowers Goals In Iraq" reports that after three years of war in Iraq "the Bush administration faces a new challenge: the prospect of civil war. And, in response, officials again appear to be redefining success downward." The Times notes, "In increasingly sober public statements -- and in slightly more candid assessments from officials who insisted that they not be identified -- the administration is working to lower expectations." While the Administration has "tacitly acknowledged for more than a year that trying to stabilize Iraq is proving more difficult than they expected," experts "say they see signs of a more fundamental shift in the administration's position -- a creeping redefinition of U.S. goals in Iraq that increasingly allows for the possibility that the nation may remain unstable for years to come."

Similarly, Nina Kamp and Michael O'Hanlon from the Brookings Institution in an op-ed in the New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) updating their assessment of the situation in Iraq write that "the confusion on the ground in Iraq seems to have spread to American generals' public pronouncements. Last Monday, just days after saying that pacification efforts with the Iraqis were going 'very, very well,' Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told an audience that Iraq is 'a place that is having some real difficulties right now' and that 'everything is in place if they want to have a civil war.' Unfortunately, an examination of trends in Iraq backs up General Pace's later, more sober comments." But despite the problems in Iraq, "more than 60 percent of Iraqis (though very few Sunni Arabs) remain bullish on the future. … These statistics may point to the possibility of a troop drawdown strategy for the United States -- but while a strategically passable outcome still seems within reach, it is increasingly hard to believe that there are the makings of a major success for American foreign policy in Iraq."

Support For Bush's Handling Of Iraq Seen As Dropping In Heartland. The Boston Globe (3/19, Savage, 484K) reports, "Support for Bush and his handling of Iraq is sharply eroding across the American heartland, where the overcast skies and the muddy fields of late winter matched a sense of gloom about Bush and the war." Recently "the Indianapolis Star released poll findings that Bush's approval rating among Indiana voters stood at 37 percent -- a drop of 18 points over the past year. The numbers echoed national polls, but were particularly shocking in a state that has not voted for a Democratic presidential candidate since 1964, and where Democratic presidential contenders often do not bother to campaign." In rural Indiana "support for the troops remains high. But many in Indiana also say the war has not turned out the way they thought it would three years ago, and they question whether Bush has what it takes to lead the troops into a happy ending."

Bush Accused Of Using Misleading Rhetoric. The AP (3/19, Loven) in an article titled "Bush Using Straw-Man Arguments In Speeches" reports, "When the president starts a sentence with 'some say' or offers up what 'some in Washington' believe, as he is doing more often these days, a rhetorical retort almost assuredly follows." He has been "criticized for dressing up events with a too-rosy glow. But experts in political speech say the straw man device, in which the president makes himself appear entirely reasonable by contrast to supposed 'critics,' is just as problematic." Washington University professor Wayne Fields says, it is a "'bizarre kind of double talk' that abuses the rules of legitimate discussion."

television cameras and repeating a single message: Iraq must have a unity government and Americans must be patient until that happens. The 54-year-old Afghan-born US envoy -- a snappy dresser with a soft-spoken, easy demeanor -- has become the increasingly effective face of the Bush administration's campaign to restore American confidence in the Iraq mission."

Rumsfeld Reiterates Commitment To Iraq. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, B7, 744K) writes, "The rationale for a free and democratic Iraq is as compelling today as it was three years ago. A free and stable Iraq will not attack its neighbors, will not conspire with terrorists, will not pay rewards to the families of suicide bombers and will not seek to kill Americans." Abandoning Iraq "would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis. It would be as great a disgrace as if we had asked the liberated nations of Eastern Europe to return to Soviet domination because it was too hard or too tough or we didn't have the patience to work with them as they built free countries."

Former General Calls For Rumsfeld To Resign. Ret. Army Major General Paul Eaton, who was in charge of training the Iraqi military from 2003 to 2004, in a strongly-worded op-ed in the New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) says Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "has shown himself incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically, and is far more than anyone else responsible for what has happened to our important mission in Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld must step down." President Bush should accept his resignation and "in the longer term, Congress must assert itself. Too much power has shifted to the executive branch, not just in terms of waging war but also in planning the military of the future. Congress should remember it still has the power of the purse; it should call our generals, colonels, captains and sergeants to testify frequently, so that their opinions and needs are known to the men they lead. Then when they are asked if they have enough troops -- and no soldier has ever had enough of anything, more is always better -- the reply is public."

Feinstein Says Bush Needs To Provide Leadership. The AP (3/19, Riechmann) in its article on Bush's radio address also notes that "critics of the administration's handling of the war say that the Iraqis must be told that the American military will not be in Iraq forever, and they must realize that the eventual pullout will be on U.S., not Iraqi, terms." In the Democratic radio address, Sen. Dianne Feinstein said, "We need the president to urgently exercise the leadership necessary to bring Iraq's political factions together. … In no uncertain terms, the president must immediately inform the Iraqi people that they need to get their political house in order."

Skelton Says US Will Need Luck To Achieve Goals In Iraq. The Kansas City Star (3/19, 286K) publishes the predictions of six commentators on US progress in Iraq. U.S. Rep. Ike Skelton said, " "The American people strongly support the troops, (but) the support for the mission is beginning to wane. With some good luck, this can all come out at the end of the day with a responsible government and with Iraq forces quelling the violence. We're going to have to have good luck along with some hard work."

Columnist Applauds Shift In US Strategy. Two columns in the Washington Post call Bush's policy of using Democracy to achieve peace as failed. James Hoagland in his column in the Washington Post (3/19, B7, 744K) describes the evolving US policy on Iraq saying "The Bush team gets closer" to resolving the conflict in Iraq "with this exercise, which portrays the long war as a global ideological struggle that hinges on a battle of ideas within and about Islam." Instead of promoting "democracy as a cure-all for the vast frustrations and delusions of al-Qaeda's target audience," a "new tone of realism about those conflicts has taken hold in internal administration discussions of the way forward. Nothing could reassure Americans more than publicizing that change."

Columnist Says US Policy Of Promoting Democracy A Failure In Iraq. George Will in his column in the Washington Post (3/19, B7, 744K) urges Bush to "emphasize the dangers of failure and de-emphasize talk about Iraq's becoming a democracy that ignites emulative transformation in the Middle East." Will concludes, "Three years ago the administration had a theory: Democratic institutions do not just spring from a hospitable culture, they can also create such a culture. That theory has been a casualty of the war that began three years ago today."

NYT, LAT Say US Has Been Humbled By Lack Of Progress In Iraq. The New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) editorializes, "Many who supported the invasion have taken this anniversary to argue that it all would have been worthwhile if things had been run better," but "the last three years have shown how little our national leaders understood Iraq, and have reminded us how badly attempts at liberation from the outside have gone in the past." While right now

"there is no time to imagine what the world might be like if George Bush had chosen to see things as they were instead of how he wanted them to be three years ago," his "Iraq debacle ought to serve as a humbling lesson for future generations of American leaders."

The Los Angeles Times (3/19, 958K) in an editorial writes that "the occupation of Iraq has been a humbling letdown." The Times does "concede that the Bush administration's actions were rooted in a strain of American idealism most often identified with Woodrow Wilson." But it has resulted in "a quagmire. Bush's messianic idealism was never justified, and in any event the administration's flawed execution would have undermined his purpose." Entering "its fourth year, the war in Iraq defies simplistic characterizations from both ends of the political spectrum" and "the future of Iraq remains shrouded in gray uncertainty."

On Third Anniversary Of US Invasion Of Iraq, Troops See Problems Lingering. In a story on the third anniversary of the US invasion of Iraq, ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 3, 3:10, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported it is "a milestone" for the US troops in Iraq "in the sense, because of the fact a lot of them are back. They can't really believe they are still here. They look around, and they see some of the problems haven't gone away. I think they are very proud of themselves for what they have done here, and some of the reconstruction efforts, and some of the efforts of reaching out to the Iraqi people. But they know the security situation is not solved, and I think a lot of them think it probably would have been -- probably those especially who came in on the initial invasion thought it would be over then, and they are still here."

Soldiers Recount Negatives And Positives Of Iraq Experiences. And the Washington Post (3/19, A1, 744K) in a front page article describes the experiences of 100 Iraq war veterans interviewed over the past year reporting, "Iraq was bad, nearly all of them agreed," yet "it was not bad in the ways they see covered in the media -- the majority also agreed on this. What they experienced was more complex than the war they saw on television and in print. It was dangerous and confused, yes, but most of the vets also recalled enemies routed, buildings built and children befriended, against long odds in a poor and demoralized country.

Iraqis Said To Be Disenchanted With Lack Of Progress. ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 3, 3:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "I can't find any commemorations, no sign of demonstrations or protests scheduled for tomorrow, no mention of this anniversary in the major newspapers, or on the major newscasts. If you ask Iraqis about the anniversary, you'll get an earful, mostly complaints." Drivers waiting in gas lines that could last 4-12 hours "said this would never have happened under Saddam. When I asked the natural follow up, after three years would you rather have Saddam back, they said no." A lot of Iraqis "thought with the Americans, the world's only superpower taking over, that this country would be turned into something like Connecticut overnight. And in fact, just the opposite has really happened, and they've seen a deterioration in the security front. They have less electricity than before the war in many parts of the country, and many parts of the country still don't have drinkable water. So at this point, three years after the invasion, what we're seeing is a lot of disappointment as opposed to the optimism felt in many quarters three years ago."

Similarly, the Washington Times (3/19, A1, Behn, 90K) in a front page story also reports, "Iraqis interviewed on the streets of Baghdad on the eve of the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion said it will take at least a decade, maybe longer, to get their country on its feet." And "many Iraqis said they had lost confidence in their political leadership's ability to pull the country together."

And the Washington Post publishes a number of opinion pieces critical of US progress from the perspective of local Iraqis. Muean Aljabiry, an Iraqi-born filmmaker and political consultant, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, B1, 744K) says that after the liberation of Iraq he served as an interpreter for "Barbara Bodine and retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, the two highest officials in postwar Iraq. I didn't know how the experiment would turn out. But as I arrived in Baghdad, I really believed the United States had an efficient, well-studied plan to put Iraq together after toppling the Saddam regime." But his experiences have "made me doubtful about our competence for nation building, an exercise the United States initially claimed to have no interest in carrying out. … I sometimes worry that, like the British enterprise, the U.S. effort to build a pluralistic, democratic society in Iraq will be remembered primarily for the insurgency it has spawned."

Middle East and North Africa for Women International regional coordinator Manal Omar in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, B3, 744K) says that after Iraq was liberated three years ago there was concern over sectarian violence, but the situation has become worse. The "schisms among communities were predictable -- and predicted. The most painful fact is that, early on, the feuding was preventable." She is "continually plagued by the question of how we in the international community could have gotten this so very wrong. I believe that we have dug a grave. And it is the Iraqis who will have to lie in it. But who will be held accountable?"

And Professor Kanan Makiya, author of "Republic of Fear: The Politics of Modern Iraq," in an interview with the Washington Post (3/19, B5, Chandrasekaran, 744K) was asked whether the US could have prevented the sectarian violence in Iraq. Makiya said, "There's this old thorn…and that is the issue of provisional government versus occupation. Occupation was the wrong formula for dealing with the transition. The U.S. government pushed aside the Iraqi opposition -- both those groups that were in exile and those groups that were inside Iraq, mainly the Kurds." It was a mistake to rely on "occupation as opposed to a provisional government like what was done in Afghanistan. So what we ended up with was the rhetoric of liberation but the reality of occupation."

Iraqi Dentist and blogger Zeyad in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, 744K) describes the violence he faces every day in Iraq and notes, "The new parliament was sworn in today. Our bickering politicians agreed to disagree yet again, and this time it was over the oath. I sometimes can't help wondering if it was the war that has left us so divided, or have we been that way all along."

Iraqi Insurgents Seen As Improving. Jonathan Finer in the Washington Post's (3/19, B3) "Outlook" section reports, "Long considered a fragmentary and disorganized collection of groups with varying tactics and aims, Iraq's insurgency is showing signs of increasing coordination, consolidation and confidence, those who study it now say. There is no consensus on the precise number of insurgent fighters, but estimates range from a few thousand to more than 50,000. The vast majority of insurgents, probably more than 90 percent, are believed to be Iraqis from the Sunni minority group that largely ruled the country before the fall of Saddam Hussein. But U.S. commanders say that most of the deadliest attacks, and particularly suicide attacks, are committed by foreigners from a range of neighboring countries, including Jordan, Syrian, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Sudan."

The Washington Post (3/19, B3, 744K) also publishes statements by Iraqi insurgents like Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's top aide Abu Hafsa al-Ansari who was quoted by a Lebanses paper saying, "Be sure that the American Army is living now in a swamp of blood and is suffering a state of collapse. Also, the government forces are corrupt and falling apart psychologically. It will flee and soon, as the Americans announce the withdrawal of their forces, and this will happen very soon, Allah willing. The battle of Iraq will be the beginning of other battles in the area to topple the idols allied with Satan."

Operation Swarmer Said To Have "Fizzled."

Time (3/19, Bennett, Jallam) reports in a story headlined, "How Operation Swarmer Fizzled," that "contrary to what many many television networks erroneously reported, the operation was by no means the largest use of airpower since the start of the war." It had "no airstrikes and no leading insurgents were nabbed in an operation that some skeptical military analysts described as little more than a photo op. What's more, there were no shots fired at all and the units had met no resistance."

The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/19) adds that U.S. and Iraqi officials said they "rounded up dozens more suspected insurgents, including alleged killers of" Amjad Hameed, director of the Iraqi television station Al Iraqiya. Still, the operation "stirred growing unease among leading Sunni Arabs. One called it a needless 'escalation' at a time of difficult negotiations over forming a broad-based government."

Two US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 2, :10, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "And today, the Pentagon announced the deaths of two more American soldiers killed in Iraq. The total number of US troops killed in three years of war now stands at more than 2,300."

Violence Mars Start Of Iraqi Shiite Holiday. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 3, 2:30, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported, "Two were killed, eight injured when a roadside bomb hit pilgrims walking to the holy city of Karbala to mark one of their holiest days, Arbayeen. Three and a half million Shiites are making this journey, an easy target for Sunni Muslim insurgents determined to spark civil war. The US mission: Thwart insurgent plans."

The New York Times (3/19, Gettleman, 1.19M) adds, "Shiite pilgrims are threading a needle of danger this week as they make their annual pilgrimage to a shrine in Karbala," as "the pilgrimage route from Baghdad to Karbala cuts straight across territory so overrun by Sunni Arab insurgents that the American military calls it the Triangle of Death."

Documents Appear To Show Saddam Supported Philippine Terrorism. The Weekly Standard (3/19, Hayes) reports, "The discussion of the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq is about to get more interesting," as documents captured in postwar Iraq and now released by the government "add to the growing body of evidence confirming the Iraqi regime's longtime support for terrorism abroad," showing that "Saddam hussein's regime provided financial support to Abu Sayyaf, the al Qaeda-linked jihadist group founded by Osama bin Laden's brother-in-law in the Philippines in the late 1990s." The Boston Globe (3/19, Bray, 484K) adds, "Conservative bloggers, eager to bolster the case for going to war against Iraq, have long argued for release of the documents," but "some prominent liberal bloggers scoffed at the release."

Protests For Iraq War Anniversary Fail To Draw Expected Crowds. ABC World News Tonight (3/18, lead story, 2:35, Reynolds, 8.78M) reported, "In London, thousands took to the streets with a very clear message," calling for the withdrawal of coalition troops from Iraq. But "while organizers expected upwards of 100,000 demonstrators in the British capital, police say it wasn't even a quarter of that. Indeed, while protests against the three-year-old conflict spanned the globe today, the crowds were on the small side. The gathering here in Chicago typified protests in the rest of this country. A lot of passion from the relatively few who bothered to show up." There were "maybe a couple thousand protesters in New York's Times Square, and far fewer took to the pavement in Washington, DC. Their voices were unlikely to penetrate the walls of the Vice Presidential residence nearby, if Mr. Cheney had been there, which he wasn't."

NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 2, :25, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "Thousands hit the streets in Australia, thousands more protested in London, though it is important to note far fewer than were predicted. Demonstrators took to the streets of New York City and all carried the same message. They want the war over and the soldiers to come home."

The New York Times (3/19, Confessore, 1.19M) reports, "About 1,000 people gathered near Times Square yesterday, in one of dozens of energetic and often unfocused rallies held in cities across the United States and around the world" that "were vigorous and peaceful but far smaller than the large-scale marches that preceded the war." Also, "the Iraq war itself…was noticeably less central to the proceedings than in previous years." The Washington Post/AP (3/19, Burkhardt) adds, "many events were far smaller than organizers had hoped." Additional local coverage of the anti-war protests can be found in the Los Angeles Times (3/19, Lin, Schoch, 958K), the Baton Rouge Advocate (3/19, Johnson), the Indianapolis Star (3/19, Webber, 267K), the Mobile Register (3/19, Colquitt, 96K), the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/19, Cleary, 261K) and the Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP (3/19).

Anti-War Activists Discouraged By Lack Of Public Opposition To War. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (3/19, Lambrecht, 310K) reports that despite polls showing "growing anti-war sentiment among the American public," the "new pessimism appears to be having little effect in Washington, where Congress had approved billions of dollars more for war and a proposal to censure President George W. Bush for ordering electronic surveillance in the war on terror is drawing little support." And "anti-war organizers have expressed frustration at what they describe as a disconnect between public sentiments and continued support for the war in Congress."

Camp Nama Account Said To Belie Assertion That Prisoner Abuse Confined To Rogues. The New York Times (3/19, A1, Schmitt, Marshall, 1.19M) publishes an account of Task Force 6-26 and Camp Nama in Iraq, which "reveals the extent to which the unit members mistreated prisoners months before and after the photographs of abuse from Abu Ghraib were made public in April 2004, and it helps belie the original Pentagon assertions that abuse was confined to a small number of rogue reservists at Abu Ghraib." Even a Pentagon official admits, "there were no rules there," and in "early 2004, both the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. had expressed alarm about the military's harsh interrogation techniques." Civilians who worked there, "when pressed repeatedly by reporters who contacted them,…agreed to speak about their experiences and observations out of what they said was anger and disgust over the unit's treatment of detainees and the failure of task force commanders to punish misconduct more aggressively."

Injuries Cause Iraq Veteran To Lose Memory. The Washington Post/AP (3/19, Bynum) reports,

"His 3-year-old son Nicholas' first steps, the first time Liam, his newborn, smiled -- Staff Sgt. Douglas Piper lived to see them. Then his scarred memory erased even those precious moments." Piper's "doctors tell him at least 80 percent of his short-term memory has been destroyed."

Drugs Threaten Afghan Democracy. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (3/19, Dine, 310K) reports that "poppies are invaluable cash crops to farmers seeking to sustain their families, but dangerous to a young Afghan democracy. An unholy alliance is emerging among farmers, drug lords, Taliban remnants and al-Qaida fighters," and "drugs are already the nation's sole export of any magnitude." They "threaten to turn it into a 'narco-state,'" and "Afghan sources say" al-Qaida "has acknowledged in private sessions its satisfaction that expanding heroin use is poisoning 'infidels' in other countries."

More Federal Prosecutors Urged For Washington State. The Columbia (WA) Tri-City Herald (3/19) reports, "It is time for the U.S. Justice Department to start bearing its share of the load in the Tri-Cities. … And we don't mean by asking local prosecutors to do even more of the federal government's job than they already do." The Herald continues, "We have had a federal judge in the Tri-Cities for the past six years, but no federal prosecutors. … It was four years ago that U.S. Attorney James McDevitt, in Spokane, promised to look into the question of assigning some federal prosecutors here instead of keeping them all based in Spokane or Yakima. … Local law enforcement and prosecutors have said for years many cases that should be tried in federal court instead are pushed down to local courts. … The result: Overload on local courts and prosecutors, more costs for local taxpayers and a cheap way out for the feds." The Herald concludes, "We do not doubt McDevitt's sincerity nor do we accuse him of being the problem. … Nor is it right to fault Congress for not authorizing money to have a prosecutor and other accouterments and officers of the federal government stationed here. … But between the two lies the only solution to a judicial and cost inequity. … McDevitt should press the case for a prosecutor in the Tri-Cities, and Congress should give him the money to make it happen."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Cross-Examination In Enron Trial Vital Despite Lack Of Drama. The Houston Chronicle (3/19, Fowler) reports, "If you stop by the Enron trial in downtown Houston expecting to witness a Perry Mason moment, don't hold your breath. … Those instances of 'gotcha,' — when an attorney catches an opposing witness in a lie or draws out a weeping confession during cross-examination — aren't as common as TV legal dramas might have you believe." The Chronicle continues, "In reality, cross-examination is often a dry, protracted process by which attorneys try to undermine a witness or dig for nuggets of information that support their case. It's not at all unusual for 'cross,' as attorneys call it, to seem random and meandering to a casual observer." The Chronicle adds, "Lawyers watching the current trial said so far the cross-examination by the defense teams for Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling has had a little bit of everything: entertainment and tedium, humor and anger, precision and confusion. … The defense will get its chance to put its best arguments before the jury when the government rests its case, but any points it can score with jurors now on cross are crucial."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Defense May Prove Embarrassing To White House. The AP (3/19, Yost) reports attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, are "signaling they may delve deeply at his criminal trial into infighting among the White House, the CIA and the State Department over pre-Iraq war intelligence failures." Libby's attorneys are also "suggesting that the State Department — not Libby — may be to blame for leaking the identity of covert CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media." The prospective defense raises "the possibility a trial could become politically embarrassing for the Bush administration by focusing on the debate about whether the White House manipulated intelligence to justify the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003."

The Washington Post (3/19, A8, Smith, 744K) reports Libby's attorneys "want access to many Bush administration documents they say will demonstrate that an undercover CIA officer played a 'peripheral role' in the government's debate over prewar intelligence and that Libby had no motive to lie about her, according to new court filings." Libby's defense "wrote that they anticipated the trial would showcase testimony by a Who's Who of senior administration officials involved in the Iraq policymaking at the heart of the CIA leak investigation, including three top officials at the State Department who the lawyers asserted played key roles in the unraveling of Plame's covert CIA position. Those officials include then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his deputy secretary, Richard Armitage, and undersecretary for political affairs, Marc Grossman."

Analyst Says CIA Not Careful In Protecting Agents' Secrecy. In a Washington Times op-ed (3/19), Scripps Howard News Service political analyst Martin Schram says that in a March 12 "investigative report," Chicago Tribune reporter John Crewdson "revealed how America's enemies, armed only with a computer hooked to the Internet, could do what he did: Break the cover of 2,653 CIA employees around the world, many of them secret agents. Headline: 'Internet blows CIA cover.'" Schram recalls his own scoop on June 6, 1974 in Newsday that "revealed how America's enemy rogues and spies, armed only with no-tech eyes, ears and shoes, could do what he did: Break the cover of a secret CIA school for spies operating in a well-appointed downtown Washington apartment building." In "both cases, the journalist revealed to the CIA an intelligence gap within its midst that stunned and embarrassed the agency -- but provided the CIA with info it needed to try to recover its secrets, post haste." Schram adds, "Sadly, the pattern is frighteningly clear. The most dangerous intelligence gap of all is the one between the ears of the CIA officials whose job requires them to think it all through and prevent gaffes that could cost agents' lives or compromise the safety of us all."

Judicial Security Still An Issue One Year After Chicago Courthouse Shootings. The New York Times (3/19, Files) reports, "About a year after the killings of the husband and mother of a Chicago federal judge and a shooting rampage in an Atlanta courthouse that left three people dead, the safety of judges and court employees remains a serious concern for the judiciary." The Times continues, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said this week that three-quarters of the more than 2,000 federal judges had sought home security systems paid by the government." The Times adds, "The Judicial Conference of the United States, which sets policy for the federal courts, met this week for the first time under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and approved security measures. … The conference authorized security equipment and workers for federal probation and pretrial services offices, urged added training for judges' security guards and called for the Bureau of Prisons to screen all outgoing mail to judges and courts from federal prison inmates." The Times notes, "A spokesman for the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, David A. Sellers, said that after the killings of the family members of the Chicago judge, Joan H. Lefkow, the security focus shifted from courthouses to judges and other court employees outside court buildings. … Last May, Congress appropriated $12 million for the Marshals Service to coordinate such security, including paying for home detection systems for any federal judge who wants one. This month, the House passed an authorization for $20 million to hire additional marshals for court security and investigating threats."

Potential Witnesses Named In Nevada Corruption Case. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/19, Packer) reports, "During pretrial motions in the political corruption case of former Clark County Commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, a U.S. District judge offered a glimpse of the witnesses who might be called to testify." The Review-Journal continues, "Judge Larry Hicks rattled off potential witnesses to prospective jurors Tuesday to determine whether any of them had relationship with those who could be called to the stand during the trial, which is expected to last three months." The Review-Journal adds, "Among the names were Terry Lamuraglia, a former lobbyist who now works in the county's Parks and Recreation Department; attorneys Jay Brown and Joe Brown; and Peter S. Christiansen, former strip club owner Michael Galardi's longtime lawyer. … The list also includes FBI agent Joe Dickey." The Review-Journal notes, "During opening statements on Thursday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Schiess touched on those witnesses' roles in the government's case. … A federal indictment issued in May 2003 accuses Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey, Galardi and former Commissioners Erin Kenny and Lance Malone of bribery. The commissioners allegedly accepted cash bribes from Galardi that were delivered by Malone, in exchange for votes that furthered the success of Galardi's strip clubs, according to the indictment. … Galardi and Kenny cut deals with the government and have provided information to prosecutors."

Data Show Federal Sentencing Disparities. The Des Moines Register (3/19) reports, "In the first 13 months since federal judges were handed more freedom in sentencing, punishment disparities have developed among courthouses nationwide, new data show." The Register continues, "Federal prosecutors and judges in Iowa downplay the meaning of the statistics, but defense attorneys say the numbers reinforce what they have always believed: Varying judicial temperaments, combined with harsher prosecution in Iowa's northern half, can create widely different sentences for similar crimes. … 'There are some judges who are far less likely to' depart from federal sentencing guidelines, said Alfredo Parrish, a defense attorney who has represented alleged criminals in both of Iowa's federal districts. 'Everybody knows it.'" The Register adds, "The data, from the U.S. Sentencing Commission, indicate a new attitude among judges since a January 2005 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that gave them much more leeway in how they dole out punishment. … Nationally, judges have been 10 percentage points more likely since the change to deviate from what were mandatory sentencing rules before then. Almost always, they deviated with less-harsh sentences. … The guidelines, created in the mid-1980s because Congress wanted more uniformity in punishments, gave judges scant wiggle room. After only 13 months with 'advisory' rules, Justice Department officials have urged Congress to take away judges' freedom."

Goodlatte Bill Would Ban Internet Gambling. The Washington Times (3/19, A1, Lemke, 90K) reports in a front page story that Internet gambling is "a $15 billion industry driven by the popularity of sports and the growing interest in poker. The industry is the subject of tense debate between companies looking to cash in on the American marketplace and lawmakers looking to ban online gambling. Analysts predict online betting soon could make up as much as 10 percent of gambling worldwide." Conservative lawmakers, "often at the urging of religious groups, have been trying to stop online gambling since it first surfaced in the mid-1990s." Rep. Bob Goodlatte said, "We feel this type of gambling is particularly pernicious." The Times adds, "However, advocates argue governments would reap big financial gains by making online gambling legal, regulating it and taxing it heavily." But the "Federal legislation introduced last month by Mr. Goodlatte seeks to clarify the law to ensure that online bets are banned and to include poker and other common gambling practices."

Law Enforcement Officials Worry Overuse May Limit Effectiveness Of Amber Alert. The New York Times/AP (3/19) reports ten years after the Amber Alerts "began being used in the Dallas-Fort Worth area, the system has been adopted in all 50 states. And in some, it is being used for reasons beyond its original purpose of helping find children abducted by strangers." In Ohio, Texas "and other states the program can be used when a child is taken away by a parent or family member who does not have custody, if the child is believed to be in immediate danger of injury or death. Some law enforcement officials say they are concerned that the alerts will be overused and become less effective."

South Carolina Sex Offender Captured. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 11, 1:00, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "There will be no bail for a convicted sex offender captured in South Carolina yesterday, after a four day manhunt. Police arrested Kenneth Hinson after a relative called 911 to report he had come looking for water. He is charged with assaulting two teenage girls in a room beneath has property. Many in the community were upset he was not behind bars all along. He was convicted of raping a 12-year-old girl in 1991 and released in 2000."

CIVIL LAW:

Amount Of Unpaid Federal Fines Up Significantly. The Washington Times/AP (3/19, A1, Mendoza, Sullivan) reports the "amount of unpaid federal fines has risen sharply in the past decade. Individuals and corporations regularly avoid large penalties for wrongdoing -- sometimes through negotiations, sometimes because companies go bankrupt, sometimes because of officials' failure to keep close track of who owes what." An Associated Press "examination of federal financial-penalty enforcement across the nation" also found that the "government currently is owed more than $35 billion in fines and other payments from criminals and in civil cases, according to Justice Department figures." In 2004, Federal authorities "ordered $7.8 billion in 98,985 fines, penalties and restitution demands in criminal and civil cases, but collected less than half of that." White-collar crime cases "account for the largest amount of uncollected debt."

Google Gets Win In Battle With Government Over Data Subpoena. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 7, 1:00, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "In what Google's lawyers are calling a clear victory, a Federal judge ruled that the search engine does not have to turn over the terms people use to search. It does, however, have to share 50,000 web addresses. The government says its intent was to collect information it needs to uphold child pornography laws."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FDA Investigating Two Deaths Linked To RU-486. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 9, 1:00, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "The Food and Drug Administration is investigating the deaths of two women who died after taking RU-486, the so called abortion pill. As a result of these reports, Planned Parenthood announced they will change the way they administer the medication. Abortion rights opponents are calling for the drug to be pulling from the market."

South Dakota Officials Get Earful Over Abortion Ban. The New York Times/AP (3/19) reports, "South Dakota politicians and state agencies have been bombarded in the past few weeks with thousands of calls, letters and e-mail messages, for and against the state's recently enacted ban on nearly all abortions." A few groups "who oppose the ban have called for a tourism boycott of South Dakota, urging people to avoid attractions like Mount Rushmore; the Badlands; the annual motorcycle rally in Sturgis; and the Corn Palace, an arena in Mitchell whose walls are covered with colorful ears of corn."

Petition Likely To Place South Dakota Abortion Ban On Ballot. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/19, Haga, 424K) reports, "It appears likely that South Dakota's recently adopted ban on abortions will be referred to the state's voters. Jim Robinson, secretary of the nonprofit organization Focus South Dakota, said he expects 'a large variety of groups that disagree with this extremist ban' to participate in a petition drive to keep the law from taking effect July 1 and go on the November general election ballot. 'I wouldn't anticipate too much difficulty' in obtaining the necessary 16,728 signatures, he said."

Rights Of Unwed Fathers In Dispute. The New York Times (3/19, Lewin) reports, "Although one in every three American babies has unwed parents, birth fathers' rights remain an unsettled area, a delicate balancing act between the importance of biological ties and the undisrupted placement of babies whose mothers relinquish them for adoption." The Times continues, "While women have the right to get an abortion, or to have and raise a child, without informing the father, courts have increasingly found that when birth mothers choose adoption, fathers who have shown a desire for involvement have rights, too. .. But to claim those rights most states require a father to put his name on a registry. While about 30 states now have registries, they vary widely. In some, fathers must actually claim paternity; in others, just the possibility of paternity. The deadlines may be 5 days after birth or 30, or any time before an adoption petition is filed. … And registries are a double-edged sword: It remains an open question whether they serve more to protect fathers' rights or to protect adoptive parents, and the babies they have bonded with, from biological fathers' claims."

Outcry Over New Orleans Elections Grows. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/19, Bazile) reports, "Echoing concerns of other civil rights leaders about the fairness of New Orleans' upcoming elections, National Urban League president and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial announced a plan Saturday for out-of-town mayoral forums and outreach programs to help the city's displaced voters." The Times-Picayune continues, "The National Coalition for Black Civic Participation plans to file a letter of objection to the U.S. Justice Department's approval Thursday of the plans for the April 22 and May 20 elections, said Morial, who was in New Orleans to attend a funeral." The Times-Picayune adds, "The department gave advance clearance to the plans under the terms of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which requires the Justice Department to review proposed changes in voting procedures in Louisiana and other Southern states to ensure the changes don't discriminate against black voters. … The department's action drew immediate fire from several civil rights groups, which have contended for weeks that too little is being done to ensure that tens of thousands of black voters displaced by Hurricane Katrina will be able to participate in one of the most crucial elections in the city's history."

ENVIRONMENT:

Some Say Interior Nominee Kempthorne Lacks Substance. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Tizon, 958K) reports "the ready smile and neighborly style" Republican Gov. Dirk Kempthorne of Idaho "don't always get the job done, some supporters and critics say. They contend that the man President Bush has picked to succeed Gale A. Norton as secretary of the Interior often exhibits more charm than substance." Fellow Republicans "and business leaders say Kempthorne, 54, knows how to create consensus but is too politically cautious. Local Democrats and environmentalists say that he is gifted at making people feel heard but that, at the end of the day, his loyalties lie squarely with development and corporate interests."

Bingaman Criticized For Aiding GOP On Gulf Of Mexico Drilling. In his Los Angeles Times column (3/19), Ronald Brownstein says ranking Senate Energy Committee Democrat Jeff Bingaman is "now helping Senate Republicans and the energy industry advance one of their top goals: a bill to expand drilling for oil and gas in the Gulf of Mexico off the Florida coast. He's doing so even though Republicans are blocking the energy priorities of Bingaman and most other Democrats: more focus on conservation and renewable energy." By helping Republicans "pursue their agenda while the GOP suppresses Democratic preferences, Bingaman isn't only making a bad bargain — he's making it more difficult for the nation to craft a comprehensive plan to reduce our excessive dependence on foreign oil."

WPost Calls On Bush To Raise Fuel Economy Standards. An editorial in The Washington Post (3/19, B6, 744K) says, "the Bush administration is due to issue a revised set of fuel economy standards for 'light trucks.'" The Posts sees this as a way for the White House to, "start making good on its promise to end America's 'oil addiction,' in a concrete way. Unfortunately, there isn't yet any certainty that the necessary willpower exists." The Post adds that only cowardice would stop these changes, but "93 percent of Americans, according to one poll, support making cars and trucks more fuel-efficient." So, "saving fuel is not only good for the economy, good for foreign policy and good for the environment, it's politically popular, too."

NYTimes Says Court Rulings Rebuke EPA Interpretation. An editorial in the New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) states, "the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit struck down as illegal an attempt by the Bush administration to allow power plants and other industrial polluters to evade the Clean Air Act. At issue was a provision of the act known as New Source Review." The Times says the court noted the EPA's new interpretation of the rule would, "have had the perverse effect of allowing plants that are now in compliance with the law to break it. … We should not expect the current E.P.A. administrators to rush the battlements with new enforcement cases. Indeed, such is Mr. Cheney's continued reach in these matters, the agency even now is seeking other, subtler ways to undermine the law. But it is nice to hear someone say that you cannot rewrite an act of Congress just because you do not like it."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Audit Criticizes FBI Oversight Of Trilogy Contractors. Under the headline "Audit Critical Of FBI, Contractors," The Washington Post (3/18, A4, Eggen) reports, "The FBI and its contractors spent more than $17 million on first-class airfare, inflated labor rates, missing equipment and other questionable payments during the botched attempt to upgrade the bureau's outdated computer system," according to a new GAO audit. The Post notes, "The FBI's struggle to modernize its computer system has been a recurring headache for Director Robert S. Mueller III and has earned it considerable criticism from lawmakers. … The auditors said the problems with Trilogy may well be much worse than their report shows because the review was based on only a portion of the FBI's payments to contractors," and warns that Sentinel could suffer similar problems "if these weaknesses go uncorrected." Sen. Charles Grassley said of the GAO report, "It's time for the FBI to explain what assurances it has that the taxpayers will be able to recover any funds these companies owe to the government before we start paying them millions more for work on Sentinel." However, "The FBI said in a statement that it has tracked down more than 1,000 of the missing items and has put in place numerous checks to avoid the problems that plagued Trilogy. 'We have strengthened our internal controls to avoid repeat of the issues cited by auditors, from any vendor,' spokesman Michael Kortan said.

CNN Live Saturday (3/18, Lin) reported, "The FBI may have wasted millions of dollars trying to update its computer systems. And a new investigation concludes it may spend millions more before the job is done." CNN (Nurenberg) added that the GAO report "questioned $17 million in spending saying more than 1,200 pieces of equipment can't be accounted for. Price tag for that, $7.5 million. The FBI says it has tightened up accounting procedures. After 9/11, the FBI says it was under great pressure to find a quick fix." FBI Assistant Director John Miller: "The pressure certainly came to bear on the bureau to launch a computer system that was capable of connecting the dots and to do it quickly. And under that pressure, sometimes -- not in every instance, but sometimes the message was get it done and if an obstacle came up, to move it out of the way." UPI (3/18) also briefly reports on the GAO review, noting, "However, an FBI spokesman told CNN the agency's own audit had accounted for most of the equipment."

The Washington Times (3/19, Seper, 90K) reports an audit says the FBI "has improved its ability to plan and manage a new information-technology project but still faces major problems in implementing the program, designed to replace a failed $170 million system." The Sentinel program was "introduced last year as a replacement for the failed Virtual Case File system and is scheduled to be fully operational by 2009 at an expected cost of $425 million. It is part of an FBI effort to close internal communication gaps and improve information sharing with other law-enforcement and intelligence agencies." The audit "by the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General said that although the FBI has developed new technology-planning processes that can help the agency complete a new case- and information-management system, 'several continuing concerns' remain regarding the FBI's management of the new project."

MD Schools Turn Down First Lady Ehrlich's Anti-Drug Show. The Washington Post (3/19, C6, Mosk, 744K) reports, "Maryland first lady Kendel Ehrlich pitched the state schools superintendent a plan to air her television talk show about drug and alcohol prevention in public school classrooms, but the department eventually turned her down. The State Education Department declined her offer after an expert on drug and alcohol prevention reviewed it and determined that it was not suitable for children. One episode, filmed on the beach and at a nightclub in Ocean City, includes sexually explicit language and brief nudity as it explores the pitfalls of drinking."

Montana Running Graphic Ads To Demonstrate Dangers Of Meth Addiction. The state of Montana is running a series of TV ads to demonstrate the danger of addiction to methamphetamine. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 10, 2:00, Hattori, 9.87M) reported the state is "blanketing the stage with edgy broadcast and print ads, dramatizing the addictiveness of meth." Peg Shea, Montana Meth Project Director: "Kids across the state said we don't want to have adults lecturing us." Hattori: "This one did extensive research on the group it's trying to reach, young people." Shea: "The kids said it was almost a dare. If you do a television ad it has got to catch our attention." The effort is privately funded, aided by software entrepreneur Thomas Siebel, who was shown saying, "We are breaking a lot of rules. I am not sure a public figure would be willing to take this heat." Hattori: "Will it make a difference here in Montana? Nearly one in four young people were offered meth within the last year. The eighth graders that we talked to were convinced.

DC Area Sees Surge In Meth Use. The Washington Post (3/19, C1, Paley, 744K) reports, "The number of methamphetamine labs and addicts in the Washington area has jumped in recent years, but law enforcement and public health officials say the region is still woefully unprepared to deal with a problem that remains under the radar." The number "of seized meth labs in Maryland, Virginia and the District has increased from close to zero in 2000 to more than 80 last year."

IMMIGRATION:

Conservatives, Catholic Officials Divided On Immigration Reform. Conservative Republicans who are taking a hard line on immigration reform are clashing with Catholic Church officials, who provide services to migrants regardless of their legal status. The New York Times (3/19, Swarns, 1.19M) reports immigration "has long caused friction between the church, with its advocacy for migrants, and conservatives, who want to slow illegal crossings over the Mexican border. But as Congress wrestles with the fate of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants, that tension has escalated into a sharp war of words, highlighting the divide among some Republicans and Catholics who have fought side by side on other issues like abortion and same-sex marriage."

Gates Personally Lobbying Congress On H1B Visa Cap. In his Washington Post column (3/19, B7), David Broder says Microsoft's Bill Gates "decided to add his personal voice to his Washington office's lobbying effort to expand the number of foreign-born computer scientists allowed to work in this country under a special program known as H-1B visas." Gates "told me the 'high-skills immigration issue is by far the number one thing' on the Washington agenda for Microsoft and for the electronics industry generally." Since autumn 2003, Congress "has limited the number of people admitted annually on H-1B visas to 65,000." But so "great is the demand for such skills in the burgeoning high-tech world that in August 2005 the last of the visas available for fiscal 2006 were issued. That means a 14-month shutdown of the program, until October of this year."

TAX:

Federal Officials Examining Nonprofit Hospitals' Tax Exempt Status. The New York Times (3/19, Pear, 1.19M) reports congressional leaders, "concerned that many nonprofit hospitals are not providing enough charity care to justify their tax-exempt status, say they will set standards for the industry if it does not do so itself." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley, "who had already been examining nonprofit groups like United Way and the American Red Cross, is broadening his focus to include nonprofit hospitals, with an eye to legislation that would clarify standards for their tax exemptions." House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas "began investigating the financial practices of nonprofit hospitals last year," and Internal Revenue Service Commissioner Mark Everson "said tax officials often found little difference between nonprofit and for-profit hospitals 'in their operations, their attention to the benefit of the community or their levels of charity care.'"

New Definition Inadvertently Affects Child Tax Credits. The Washington Post (3/19, F5, Crenshaw, 744K) in its Cash Flow column reports, "A new provision of the tax law, which was meant to make the law simpler and fairer, is turning out to have done neither. The provision involves the definition of 'child' in claiming various tax breaks." Some taxpayers may be able to claim unintended benefits, while others may be deprived of legitimate credits. For Instance, children, "of well-to-do families may be able to use their siblings to claim the earned-income tax credit, which is meant for low-income working families." While the new definition may knock, "single taxpayers whose adult children live with them out of head-of-household filing status."

WPost Argues Bush Tax Cuts Make Balancing Budget Impossible. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/19, B6, 744K) posits that the Bush administration does not want to discuss balancing the budget without raising taxes because it "would require cuts so deep and wide as to be unimaginable as a matter of politics and unwise as a matter of policy." This goal could be accomplished, "but only if Americans are willing to sacrifice," basically, "all of the federal budget outside defense and veterans." … That's why Mr. Bush doesn't talk about the real-life consequences of his tax cuts, and the real-life people who will suffer from them after he leaves office." The Post adds, "If this is what you want government to look like, go ahead and support the extension of the president's tax cuts and oppose any tax increases."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Attention On Iraq Seen As Distracting Bush From Domestic Agenda. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, A1, Wallsten, Gerstenzang, 958K) in a front page article reports, "A growing Republican chorus is calling for a staff overhaul inside President Bush's beleaguered White House, but some conservatives say such a change would stop far short of fixing what they view as a serious flaw: an unfocused domestic agenda." The Times continues, "The war in Iraq is dominating the attention of Bush and his top aides, these critics say, while the recent departure of the president's top domestic policy advisor after just one year has left the White House without an obvious conductor to direct the sometimes disparate policy-making machine." While "Bush first campaigned on a largely domestic agenda, experts either said he had achieved much of what he had set out to accomplish or said he had put aside priorities at home to devote time, energy and government resources to the war on terrorism." The "frustration among domestic policy advocates underscores the range of problems facing Bush. Sixteen months after reelection, his second term has so far been dominated by a drumbeat of controversy and crises involving a range of issues."

Bush Staff Shakeup Rumors Noted. The Houston Chronicle (3/19, Mason, 581K) reports on the rumors that top

White House aides may be suffering from burnout, leading to a shakeup among longtime Bush aides. The Chronicle reports, "Rumors of high-profile departures wax and wane. Is" Chief of Staff Andrew Card "leaving? What about" White House spokesman Scott "McClellan? Similarly, prognostications of imminent staff shake-ups are on the rise." McClellan "did little to stanch the speculation with an enigmatic nondenial last week," saying, "This is part of the inside Washington babble that goes on in this town. It's part of the parlor game. We are focused on the priorities that the American people care most about and getting things done."

Bill To Reform Pension System May Weaken It. A Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation analysis says the measure to reform the private pension system under consideration by a House-Senate conference committee could weaken the system instead of strengthening it. The New York Times (3/19, A1, Walsh, 1.19M) reports in a front page story that lawmakers "modified many of the proposed rules, allowing companies more time to cover pension shortfalls, to make more forgiving estimates about how much they will owe workers in the future, and even sometimes to assume that their workers will die younger than the rest of the population." Companies also "persuaded lawmakers to add dozens of specific measures, including a multibillion-dollar escape clause for the nation's airlines and a special exemption for the makers of Smithfield Farms hams. As a result, the bill now being completed in a House-Senate conference committee, rather than strengthening the pension system, would actually weaken it, according to a little-noticed analysis by the government's pension agency."

Saletan Calls For Dropping Age As Criteria For Social Security. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, B2, 744K), William Saletan of Slate magazine says that with "more and more boomers living to age 65 and beyond, perfectly healthy but collecting checks for decades," we "need a radical change in Social Security. I'm not talking about privatization. I'm talking about rethinking, and possibly abolishing, the whole idea of payments based on age." The "point of Social Security was to subsidize those who couldn't work, not those who could." Abolishing "age as a standard of fitness would be fairer than simply raising the eligibility age."

Reliance On Standardized Testing Said To Increase Risk Of Error. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Silverstein, 958K) reports on the College Board's recent SAT scoring error on 4,600 October tests, adding that while "high school seniors and their parents, along with college counselors and admissions officers, have been roiled by" the "recent disclosures," education testing experts "point out that similar mistakes have happened before — and inevitably will happen again." Kathleen Rhoades, "a research associate with the Center for the Study of Testing, Evaluation and Educational Policy at Boston College," said "there were 137 publicly disclosed cases of large-scale testing errors by educational testing companies from 1976 through early 2004, with most of them occurring since 1997." The "consequences of grading mistakes and other mishaps have intensified over the last decade with the increasing reliance on so-called high-stakes testing." In "recent years, President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act has triggered expanded testing by many states."

Boehner Says Futures Contract Fee Not Likely. The Bloomberg (3/19, Hassler) reports House Majority Leader John Boehner said Congress is unlikely to approve a "new fee on futures contracts proposed by President George W. Bush." At a Futures Industry Association conference in Boca Raton, Florida, Boehner said, "If it hasn't happened in 13 consecutive tries, that probably means it won't happen again" Bloomberg notes the fee proposed in the Bush budget "would cover the $127 million budget for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission that regulates the $2.5 trillion-a-day U.S. futures industry."

O'Connor, Ginsburg Said To Have Stepped Up Defense Of Judicial Independence. The New York Times (3/19, Liptak, 1.19M) reports former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor "told an audience at Georgetown University that a judiciary afraid to stand up to elected officials can lead to dictatorship," while last month, "speaking in South Africa, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said that the courts were a safeguard 'against oppressive government and stirred-up majorities.'" The justices' speeches "were mostly a reaction, students of the court said, to attacks on judicial independence in Congress." Kermit L. Hall, the editor of "The Oxford Companion to the United States Supreme Court," said, "What's going on is that Ginsburg and O'Connor are using their position — and it is striking that both are women — to state a position in favor of the judiciary that comes real, real close to taking a political position." The Times adds the O'Connor and Ginsburg speeches, "variations on basic speeches they had given often before, were sharper and more topical than what many expect from Supreme Court justices."

Lobbyists Doubt Proposed Rules Will Change Much. The Washington Post (3/19, A1, Birnbaum, 744K) reports in a front page story that some of Washington's "top lobbyists say that they expect to find ways around congressional efforts to impose new restrictions on lobbyists' dealings with lawmakers in the wake of the Jack Abramoff corruption scandal, and that any limits will barely put a dent in the billions of dollars spent to influence legislation." Lobbyists say they "have already found scores of new ways to buy the attention of lawmakers through fundraising, charitable activities and industry-sponsored seminars. An estimated $10 billion is spent annually to influence legislation and regulations, and that spending is not likely to be diminished by the proposed lobbying changes, these lobbyists contend."

Legislators With Safe Seats Still Spending Campaign Cash. The Washington Post (3/19, A4, Murray, 744K) reports that although Rep. Spencer Bachus "hasn't drawn a serious opponent in the past three elections," he "burns through significant sums of campaign cash, as do plenty of other House members sitting in safe congressional seats. Among the items billed in 2005 to Bachus's campaign account and his 'Growth and Prosperity' political action committee: $6,689 for U2 concert tickets and expenses as part of a campaign event; $1,298 in lodging in Vail, Colo.; and $270 for the catering of an 'American Idol' party." Rep. Corrine Brown (D-Fla.) "spent $15,835 of campaign funds on condolence flowers for constituents, Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) used $8,328 of his campaign war chest to buy gifts for his staff, and Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) was reimbursed for a $1 'meal' at a local gas station, which his staff believes was bottled water." Some lawmakers "say that such expenditures are routine and completely legal under Federal Election Commission rules. But these spending practices are beginning to attract attention from watchdog groups and the news media, as the 2006 congressional campaigns heat up and Congress considers measures to crack down on the perks of office."

Bush Approval Drops To 36% In Newsweek Poll. Newsweek (3/18, Dickey) reports in an Internet exclusive that a Newsweek poll "shows President Bush's approval rating dropping to new lows on domestic issues and rising public anger over Iraq and homeland security." Bush's approval rating is "only 36 percent in the latest NEWSWEEK poll, matching the low point in his presidency recorded last November. His image as an effective leader in the war on terror is tarnished, with less than half the public (44 percent) approving of the way he's handling terrorism and homeland security. Despite a series of presidential speeches meant to bolster support for the war in Iraq, as well as the announcement of a major military offensive when the poll was getting under way, only 29 percent of the people questioned approved Bush's handling of the situation in Iraq. Fully 65 percent disapprove."

Bloomberg (3/19, Decker) also reports the Newsweek poll, saying "the president's misfortune has translated into good news for Democrats, with 50 percent of registered voters polled saying they will back Democratic candidates, compared with 39 percent for Republicans."

Democrats' Message Attacking Bush As "Incompetent" Finds Success. Nina Easton in her "Washington Briefing" column in the Boston Globe (3/19, 484K) reports, "The Democrats' sudden discipline at staying on message is beginning to score points in pubic opinion polls. The Pew Research Center's Andrew Kohut has reported that 'incompetent' has replaced 'hones' as the most frequent descriptor applied to Bush." Although "the Democrats have used 'incompetence' with increasing regularity since the administration's flat-footed response to Hurricane Katrina, the phrase 'dangerous incompetence' is a recent invention of Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid." Recently, "Reid strategists began inserting the words into talking points for press secretaries to the Senate's 44 Democrats. And during Reid's weekly Saturday afternoon huddle with Democratic senators scheduled to appear on the Sunday morning talk shows, he encouraged them to use the label to describe the White House."

Sabo Announces Retirement. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/19, Olson, 424K) reports Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo, "the stoic, gentle giant of Minnesota politics, broke into tears Saturday as he announced plans to retire after 46 years in elective office, the last 28 in Congress." Sabo's action "leaves prospective candidates little time to organize for the DFL convention. The endorsee is expected to become the prohibitive favorite in the race in the strongly

DFL district, which includes Minneapolis and a number of inner-ring suburbs." The Star Tribune adds, "State Rep. Keith Ellison, DFL-Minneapolis, Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer, a college professor, and DFL Minneapolis City Council Member Gary Schiff already are in the race to succeed Sabo. Green Party member Jay Pond also is in, as are Republicans Tim Anderson and James Turnham." Other potential candidates cited by the Star Tribune include former DFL Hennepin County Commissioner Mark Andrew, former state Sen. Ember Reichgott Jung, DFL-New Hope, state Sen. Satveer Chaudhary, DFL-Fridley, state Rep. Connie Bernardy, DFL-Fridley, Hennepin County Board Members Gail Dorfman, and Mike Opat.

Lessening Inflation Fears, Strong Economic Reports Lead Stocks Higher. Several papers noted the stock market's end of the week rise and overall positive performance this year. Reasons cited included strong economic reports and a belief inflation is under control. The Washington Post (3/19, F02, 744K) reports, "The major factor in the week's market activity was a changing consensus about inflation, and how the Federal Reserve would respond to it." A government report showed an unexpectedly low, "0.1 percent increase in consumer prices in February." And at, "the same time, some Fed officials were heard to express confidence that the economy would cool down on its own later this year."

The New York Times (3/19, Sommer, 1.19M) reports, "It was the best week for stocks since the beginning of the year, as several economic reports suggested that inflation was under control while economic growth remained strong." The Washington Post (3/19, F02, 744K) reports, "The market benefited this week from a new Wall Street consensus on interest rates. The Federal Reserve will boost rates only another half of a percentage point, most economists now are saying." The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Petruno, 958K) reports, "Something may come along to scare the U.S. stock market down from its current heights." But the, "usual suspects seem to be losing their ability to frighten investors. That's often a good sign for a bull market's staying power."

Despite Positive Signs Some On Wall Street Still Bearish. The New York Times (3/19, De Aenlle, 1.19M) reports, "Popular gauges of sentiment toward stocks show extreme bearishness, at least by the standards of the last few years, even with the market hitting new highs." A recent survey by Invests Intelligence of investment newsletters, "recorded the highest level of bearishness since April 2003 and the least bullishness since August 2004."

Rice Seeks To Strengthen Alliance Against China With Japan And Australia. As Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice concludes a trip that brought her to Latin America and Australia, the New York Times (3/19, Weisman, 1.19M) keys on relations with China, reporting, "Rice held talks on Saturday with Japan and Australia to deepen a three-way regional alliance aimed in part at balancing the spreading presence of China." State Department Spokesman Sean McCormack is quoted as saying, "The tenor of the discussion was how to make China a positive force in the region."

In its coverage, the Washington Times (3/19, Kralev, 90K) notes that the triad "discussed China's 'aggressive' buying of energy assets in Africa and Latin America, the first time China's 'energy diplomacy' has been examined at an official international forum." Rice "and the foreign ministers of Japan and Australia…were unable to agree on steps to address the issue." McCormack reportedly "said the meeting had not been a 'finger-wagging' anti-China session, but he acknowledged that Beijing's dealings with problematic states -- whose actions are often referred to the UN Security Council, where China has veto power -- were part of the discussions."

The AP (3/19, Gearan) focuses on more mundane details like the length and breadth of Rice's travels, reporting that she "is flying around the world -- and then some. Whether she breaks a record by a Secretary of State will have to wait for a thoughtful assessment free of jet lag." The AP goes on to note, "For a woman who habitually rises at 4:30 a.m. to exercise and bounds into her office two hours later, Rice's trip had a relaxed feel. Rice actually played the tourist for the first time in her 14-month tenure as the top US diplomat. She took in a boxing match and several swimming events at the Commonwealth Games in Melbourne, Australia, near the end of the trip. She hung medals around the necks of three Australian swimmers and chatted with swim star Ian Thorpe. She looked like she was having fun."

Hungry China Taps World Metals Markets. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Lee, 958K) reports, "China's voracious appetite for metals is convulsing the world. It has led to economic booms in some nations and crime waves in others by so-called urban miners who steal metals from houses and public buildings. China's runaway economy needs the metals to build railroads, office towers, cars and appliances." As the "world's biggest consumer of copper, lead, zinc, iron ore, steel and aluminum," China's "hunger has boosted mineral-rich nations, from copper-laden Chile to Australia, which has vast iron deposits. Prices of new and used lead, copper, nickel and other metals have tripled or more in the last few years, triggering a worldwide scramble for the commodities."

Modernity Slowly Reaches Isolated Muslim Enclave Deep Within In China. The New York Times (3/19, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "The most recent census found 513,000 Dongxiang people in China," the majority of whom live in and around Dongxiang County. "Of the 25 townships in the county, 19 do not have a single Chinese person. Most people do not speak Chinese, and some...have only a vague notion of China, despite living in the middle of it. The geographic isolation has helped preserve an Islamic culture, as well as an ancient language, but it has also separated the Dongxiang people from the prosperity lifting other parts of China. The Dongxiang, one of China's 56 officially recognized ethnic minorities, are now among China's poorest and most illiterate people." But "as everywhere in China, modernity is seeping up the winding roads to the county's larger settlements and beckoning many younger people. In the county seat, Suonanba, cellphones, blue jeans and Internet cafes arrived several years ago. So did Chinese building contractors, cigarettes, alcohol and food not prepared to Islamic code."

Taiwanese Rally For Freedom From China. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Magnier, Ting-i, 958K) reports, "President Chen Shui-bian on Saturday called on Taiwan to resist China's bid to annex the island as tens of thousands of people took to the streets protesting Beijing's growing military threat. 'Our future will never be decided by the 1.3 billion people of China,' Chen told supporters in front of the presidential office building. 'Taiwan is an independent sovereign state, and its future should be determined by its 23 million people. Taiwanese people oppose annexation and invasion.'" According to the Times, "The rally, with the slogan, 'Protect democracy, oppose annexation,' was held to mark the passage of a controversial law in Beijing last year that threatens to use force if Taiwan declares independence."

Candidate Would Focus On The Practical. In a related story, the Washington Post (3/19, A19, Cody, 744K) reports, "Ma Ying-jeou has always loved to run marathons, and he has approached politics the same way." When interviewed "last week, Ma pledged that if he won the next presidential election, in 2008, as widely expected, he would shift Taiwan sharply away from the confrontational, pro-independence policies followed by President Chen Shui-bian. A Nationalist government under his leadership, he declared, would seek neither unification with nor independence from China, focusing instead on practical improvements in cross-strait relations while maintaining the status quo of Taiwanese self-rule." Ma is quoted as saying, "When I talk about these things, I say, 'Let's forget about unification and independence. ... Let's maintain the status quo and concentrate on the economy."

Anger "Spills Over" As Ex-Hostages Blocked From Seeking Iran Damages. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (3/19, A1, Kessler, 744K) reports, "At an emotional meeting this month at the State Department, steps from the office of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a group of former American hostages released by Iran a quarter of a century ago, accompanied by lawyers and some relatives, confronted two of Rice's most senior aides. The families' grievance: Why has the Bush administration, which has labeled Iran one of the world's most dangerous regimes and has called the hostages American heroes, fought their efforts to win damages for their ordeal from the Islamic republic?" Although US officials "express sympathy" for the former captives, "the administration has thwarted every effort in the courts or in Congress to win a monetary judgment against Iran, even as other victims of Iranian-linked terrorism have secured hundreds of millions of dollars in compensation." The Post continues, "Those attending the March 2 meeting said that" Undersecretary R. Nicholas Burns "and legal adviser John B. Bellinger III tried to keep the discussion civil but that anger spilled over. The wife of a former hostage exclaimed at one point: 'You are bloodless!' The meeting broke up with Burns acknowledging the difficulty of the issues and saying he would be open to further discussions."

Iran Releases Prominent Dissident. The Washington Post (3/19, A16, Vick, 744K) reports, "Iran's most prominent dissident emerged from prison looking far older than his 46 years. His clothes hung on a frame reduced to 108 pounds by repeated hunger strikes. He smiled through a beard grown to the bushy nimbus of a Hindu holy man. 'All the time I was in prison was illegal,' Akbar Ganji said of the six-year sentence he served for exposing the government's role in assassinating its critics. 'From the very first day it was illegal.'"

The New York Times (3/19, Fathi, 1.19M) notes, "He did not make any formal comments to reporters. His lawyer, Youssef Mowlai, said he told Mr. Ganji that he first needed to recuperate from the continuing effects of the hunger strike." The timing "came as a surprise. A judiciary official had said Thursday that Mr. Ganji would not be released until March 30, and a statement by the judiciary on Saturday said Mr. Ganji was on leave for Nowruz, the Iranian New Year."

Policy Of Preventing Iran Nuclear Development Questioned. In an analytical piece, the New York Times (3/19, Sanger, 1.19M) asks, "If all other options are worse, could the world learn to live with a nuclear Iran?" President Bush's "message to Iran these days sounds unambiguous: The United States will do what it takes to keep the mullahs from getting the bomb. Diplomacy is vastly preferred, President Bush and his aides insist. Yet it was no accident that the just-revised National Security Strategy declares: 'This diplomatic effort must succeed if confrontation is to be avoided.'" The Times goes on to report, "The debate is likely to play out for much of the year, based on a series of guesses about Iran's true intentions, and its capabilities. ... But getting this right requires projecting what happens to America, Israel and Europe, especially if Iran's power to send the price of oil skyrocketing is enhanced by the confidence that a nuclear arsenal can bring."

Egyptian Woman Thought To Have Died Of Avian Flu. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 8, 5:20, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "Health officials are reporting what may be the first human death from" avian flu "in Egypt. A woman died after contracting the virus from contaminated chicken. The concern in this country is warmer weather may bring the virus closer to home."

Experts Believe Migrating Birds Will Bring Avian Flu To US. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 8, 5:20, Bazell, 9.87M) reported, "Scientists expect new countries to report infections in birds with the new virus almost every day now. The reason, the spring migration of birds is underway now." Experts say "it will almost certainly arrive in birds in the US, probably crossing into Alaska and then into the lower 48 states. The US poultry industry is already preparing, keeping most birds indoors in strict isolation." Michael Leavitt, Secretary of Health and Human Services: "It would only be a crisis if we saw humans getting the virus from domestic flocks or some other course. Even that is able to be handled unless it starts passing from person-to-person."

Hamas Proposes Single-Party Cabinet, Abbas Likely To Approve. The New York Times (3/19, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "The militant Islamic group Hamas said Saturday that it had completed its lineup for a new Palestinian cabinet and would present it Sunday to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, for his approval. An aide to Mr. Abbas said he was likely to give his approval. 'Our cabinet is ready,' Ismail Haniya, the Hamas leader and prime minister-designate, told a news conference in Gaza City," though he declined to "provide names of the cabinet nominees. ... No other Palestinian political parties have announced their intention to participate despite Hamas's invitation to join." According to the Times, "The crucial question now is whether Mr. Abbas will support the Hamas-led cabinet. If he rejects it, his decision could lead to a political crisis, and Palestinian law is not clear on how it would be resolved."

The Los Angeles Times (3/19, King, 958K) adds, although "the group refrained from formally announcing its Cabinet lineup pending its presentation to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas," Hamas officials "said key positions would go to Hamas loyalists such as firebrand Mahmoud Zahar, who has been designated foreign minister. Other senior appointees include lawmaker Said Siyam, who is considered a relative moderate, as interior minister, and economics professor Omar Abdel Razeq, who was jailed at the time of January's parliamentary elections, as finance minister."

Gaza Chafes Under Economic Hardships. The Washington Post (3/19, A12, Wilson, 744K) reports, "The main trade passage between the Gaza Strip and Israel has been closed for much of the year, despite an agreement brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in November that required Israel to 'ensure the continued opportunity to export.' Israeli security concerns, heightened by Hamas's parliamentary victory in January and the almost daily rocket fire from Gaza, have rendered the deal largely moot." The Post continues, "Unreliable trade passages, frozen Israeli tax transfers that helped pay salaries and lapsed permits of Palestinians who work in Israel are evidence of a broader disengagement, one that Israeli security officials say they hope to accelerate once Hamas installs its cabinet this month."

Atmosphere Tense As Belarus Votes, Protests Planned. As Belarus votes in a presidential election amid accusations of fraud and fears of violence, the New York Times (3/19, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "The results of the election on Sunday, widely denounced [at home] and abroad as undemocratic, are a foregone conclusion. But the vote is only a prelude to the real struggle against [Belarussian President Aleksandr] Lukashenko's government, one that many fear could end in violent reprisals along the monumental streets of Minsk, the capital."

In its coverage, the Los Angeles Times (3/19, Murphy, 958K) notes, "In Belarus, President Alexander G. Lukashenko has a stake in giving democracy a black eye: The US government is spending more than $9 million a year here on attempts to develop a sophisticated political opposition and a well-informed electorate, tools for combating one of the most repressive dictatorships in the world." Yet voters will "go to the polls today for an election that is widely expected to hand Lukashenko...a third five-year term."

The Washington Post (3/19, A20, Finn, 744K) adds, "Dissent carries a real price in this country of 10 million people, sandwiched between the European Union and Russia, where Lukashenko has ordered that no one other than Lukashenko can be called 'president.' ... Opposition activists say students who step out of line often receive failing grades or face trumped-up disciplinary charges that lead to expulsion from school. State workers, who commonly have one-year contracts, are routinely dismissed if they question the president's rule. Political activists are arrested and sometimes beaten. Independent newspapers are shut down or lose an entire edition to police seizures."

Students Protesting Labor Law Clash With Police In Paris. NBC Nightly News (3/18, lead story, 2:30, Mendenhall, 9.87M) reported, "In the largest day of protests so far, more than a half million people in dozens of states violently denounced the French government. Tens of thousands descended on Paris throwing bottles, torching cars and clashing with police. Mainly students, the protesters say a proposed job law aimed at reducing unemployment would leave them with few rights and the kind of job security that the French…expect." One out of "four French youths is unemployed. The main reason is labor laws make it so difficult for employers to fire employees they don't hire in the first place. Under economic pressure, the government of Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin says the new law would give employers more flexibility. Students, backed by the French public, young and old, aren't buying it."

ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 7, :15, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "One note from overseas, violence broke out in France today as some 500,000 people took the streets to protest a labor law. In Paris, riot police fired tear gas and rubber bullets as marchers set fires, smashed windows and stormed a McDonald's."

In its coverage, the New York Times (3/19, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "A number of public figures joined in, including the mayor of Paris, Bertrand Delanoe; the Socialist party leader, François Hollande; a former culture minister, Jack Lang; and the Communist Party leader, Marie-George Buffet." The Washington Post (3/19, A12, Moore, 744K) adds that "as the hours-long parade drew to a close in the chill of the early evening darkness, several hundred protesters turned on police at the Place de la Nation in the southeastern part of the city, throwing stones, garbage and sticks at riot police who huddled behind protective shields. Demonstrators smashed windows, burned a car and set a pile of boxes ablaze." The Washington Times/AP (3/19, Charlton) also covers the story.

Dutch Muslim Convert's Experiences Indicate Growing Religious Rift. The Washington Post (3/19, A21, Moore, 744K) reports, "Rabi'a Frank sees her Dutch home town through the narrow slit of the black veil that covers her face. The looks she receives from the townspeople are seldom kindly." Her "day-to-day struggle for acceptance on the streets of her home town is one woman's confrontation with a deepening rift in West European societies, where the emergence of a 15 million-member Muslim minority is reshaping concepts of national and personal identity. Some European governments have passed laws they say are intended to help preserve national identity. Critics argue that the measures reflect Islamophobia and fears of terrorism triggered by the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the subsequent transit bombings in Madrid and London." Frank is quoted as saying, "Sometimes I make a joke and say, 'Oh, you don't have to be scared of me.'"

Waves Of African Immigrants Still Flocking To Spain. The New York Times (3/19, Mclean, 1.19M) reports, "Spain's deputy prime minister began an emergency visit to the Canary Islands on Saturday to discuss ways to control a record flow of African migrants arriving in boats from Mauritania that has led to at least 25 deaths in the last week. The Spanish government says more than 1,000 migrants have been detained at sea in the last 10 days while trying to reach the islands from Mauritania on North Africa's western coast, a voyage of 500 miles. The migrants, mostly sub-Saharan Africans, crowd into boats carrying dozens of passengers in hopes of reaching the islands and thereby gaining entry to the European Union."

US Navy Ships Engage Pirates Off Coast Of Somalia. ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 4, :20, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "US Navy warships fired on a boat of would-be pirates near Somalia. The Navy says two of its ships were attacked when sailors tried to board the suspect boat. Naval gunners fought back, and setting the boat on fire and they say, killing one of the bandits."

NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 5, 1:00, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "The suspected pirates were in a fishing boat armed with a rocket propelled grenade. The US ships are in that region to protect commercial traffic which has been targeted in recent months."

The New York Times/AP (3/19, Press) reports, "The battle started about 25 miles off the Somali coast when the American warships Cape St. George and Gonzalez spotted a 30-foot fishing boat towing skiffs and prepared to board the vessels. The suspects were holding what appeared to be rocket-propelled grenade launchers, the Navy said. When the suspects began shooting, naval gunners returned fire with mounted machine guns." The Washington Post (3/19, A17, Gugliotta, 744K) quotes Navy spokesman Cmdr. Jeff Breslau as saying that the pirates frequently go after "targets of opportunity. They'll take over fishing or merchant vessels, then head back to territorial waters where they demand a ransom."

Congolese Warlord Will Be Tried By ICC. The New York Times (3/19, Simons, 1.19M) reports, "A Congolese militia leader accused of abducting children and turning them into soldiers and sex slaves has become the first suspect to be delivered to the new International Criminal Court, the chief prosecutor announced Saturday. The former warlord, Thomas Lubanga, arrived at the court's detention center in The Hague late Friday after being flown here on a French military plane, the prosecutor said. Mr. Lubanga had been imprisoned since last year in Congo, whose authorities handed him over to the court for trial."

Despite Growth Of Terror, Study Says Conflict Decreasing Worldwide. New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) op-ed contributor James Traub writes, "We live in a world that is objectively more dangerous than the one we knew at the outset of the millennium; whatever our disagreements, since 9/11 both our foreign policy and our domestic politics have pivoted around this ineluctable fact." But does everyone face these greater dangers? "The answer, it seems, is no. ... According to 'Human Security Report 2005,' a study that relies on this recent scholarship, the number of armed conflicts has been dropping steadily since the end of the cold war. Major civil wars, which exploded around the world between 1946 and 1991, declined sharply in the ensuing decade. Indeed, the trend holds true for virtually every category of conflict — coups, interstate wars and even genocides and so-called politicides, in which political belief rather than ethnicity is the criterion for killing. The only exception is international terrorism — as we know all too well."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Despite Agreement On Wiretaps Illegality, Senators Said To "Recoil" From Bush Censure. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (3/19, Gilbert, 266K) reports that while "most senators recoiled last week from Wisconsin Democrat Russ Feingold's resolution to censure the president, many of them agreed with one of its basic premises: that the wiretapping of Americans without a warrant is against the law," and doubts about its legality are "found among both liberal and conservative scholars and on both sides of the aisle in Congress."

Dead Saudi Al Qaeda Leader Preaches Violence In Video. The Washington Times/AP (3/19, El-Magd) reports that in a video sent to the Associated Press by email, Fahd Faraaj al-Juwair, the slain leader of al Qaeda in Saudi Arabia, "vowed in his final testament that his group would overthrow the royal family and stage more attacks against the kingdom and Americans in the region."

Lawyers In Moussaoui Case Argue Over Calling Martin To Testify. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Serrano, 958K) reports that Zacarias Moussaoui's lawyers want Carla J. Martin to "testify about why she tried to influence witnesses" even "as soon as Monday," saying "she should be the next witness before the prosecution brought in any 'untainted' witnesses on aviation security because her testimony would provide 'critical information' about the nature of the witness-tampering effort." However, "Prosecutors want to delay Martin's appearance until the middle of the week and have her testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment against self-incrimination."

Ashcroft Calls Cooperation Key To Terrorism Fight. The AP (3/19, Gresko) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft said Saturday that he does not believe the threat of terrorism has passed and that the United States must work with other countries to combat it." The AP continues, "In an hour-long talk as part of a conference on economic crime, the nation's former top law enforcement officer also discussed the importance and challenges of prosecuting financial crime and the emphasis after the 2001 terrorist attacks on 'prevention over prosecution.' … 'As we fight against terror . . . We need to remind ourselves of the necessity and value of being extremely cooperative with individuals of other nations and in other settings,' Ashcroft said." The AP adds, "Ashcroft also drew laughs with some self-deprecating remarks. He also joked that the crowd of approximately 200 students, professors and attorneys at St. Thomas University School of Law would not have to remember anything he said. … Not mentioned as part of his speech was the pending case in Miami against alleged terror suspect Jose Padilla, who was arrested almost four years ago while Ashcroft was attorney general."

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Satirized By Board Game. The AP (3/19, Parry) reports, "'Patriot Act: The Home Version' pokes fun at 'the historic abuse of governmental powers' by the recently renewed anti-terrorism law," and "the object of the game is not to amass the most money or real estate, but to be the last player to retain civil liberties."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

White House Drill Tests Response To Smallpox Attack. The New York Times/AP (3/19) reports Cabinet secretaries "participated in a drill on Saturday that simulated a smallpox attack as the government tested plans to counter the potential use of bioweapons by terrorists." Officials "from various government agencies, including Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, participated in the four-hour exercise. Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Michael O. Leavitt , the health and human services secretary, were among the cabinet members who were part of the drill."

Library Incident Cause Concern Over Maryland County's Homeland Security Force. The Washington Post (3/19, C5, Barr, 744K) reports that Montgomery County, Maryland's, "Homeland Security Department, national experts say, is the only such agency to maintain uniformed officers apart from its local police force." While "County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) wants to increase the department's $5 million budget by 20 percent in the next fiscal year," an incident last month when "a homeland security officer told public library patrons that they couldn't view Internet pornography," has "some County Council members…questioning the size and role of the department and its security unit," and "controversy surrounding the library incident might…be swelling."

White House Advance Workers Impersonated Reporters. The Washington Post (3/19, A11, Lee, 744K) reports, "The White House said yesterday that it will discipline two government employees who masqueraded as journalists this month while scouting locations for a presidential visit to the Gulf Coast. A Mississippi couple whose home was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina said two men who later identified themselves as Secret Service agents pretended to be Fox News journalists," but "Tom Mazur, a spokesman for the Secret Service, said he did not know who the men were but they were not Secret Service officials."

New Flood Maps Expected To Impact Louisiana Coastal Communities. The Washington Post/AP (3/19, Burdeau) reports that "new Federal Emergency Management Agency flood-vulnerability maps due to be released soon" for Louisiana's coastal areas "will likely make the insurance more costly, force residents to spend heavily to raise homes out of flood plains to qualify for coverage, make many other homes uninsurable and make lenders less willing to loan money for construction in flood-prone areas. That new reality may threaten the state's coastal population and its heritage of shrimp fishing, alligator hunting, fur trapping and oyster harvesting."

Reformers Try To Change New Orleans Bureaucracy. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Quinones, 958K) reports, "New Orleans has what critics contend are layers of redundant government that it can no longer afford, given its greatly reduced population and budget." Part of this is its "seven elected property assessors — each with their own staff and responsibility for a separate district — to assess the city's 164,000 parcels." Now, "Riding the wave of change, a group of lawyers and businessmen have qualified a slate of assessor candidates — known as the I Quit Ticket — for the April 22 city elections." They "vow to lobby for legislation allowing voters to approve consolidating their offices into one, and resign en masse when that happens," forcing "a special election of a single assessor."

Old Black Church May Close In New Orleans. The Washington Post (3/19, A7, Lydersen, 744K) reports, "In the face of a much-reduced city population and physical damage to many churches post-Katrina, the Archdiocese of New Orleans is closing seven parishes," including St. Augustine, "one of the nation's oldest African American Catholic churches." Still, "local residents are rallying behind the church and hoping the parish can be saved.

Future Of New Orleans Music Landmark Uncertain. The New York Times (3/19, Saulny, 1.19M) reports that part of Milne Boys Home in New Orleans was the Colored Waif's Home for Boys. "A host of noted jazz musicians", including Louis Armstrong, trained at the Colored Waif's Home, and "Milne stands as one of the last physical connections to the city's musical past." However, it was damaged in the flooding, "and many wonder if it will have a place in the new city." While, "officials said the city was negotiating with the Federal Emergency Management Agency to determine how much federal money might be available for the site," they also have "the chaos of dealing with an acute housing shortage, a coming mayoral election and tens of thousands of displaced residents."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Highlights Progress, But Iraq Continues To Weigh Down Approval. President Bush continues to make the case that the US is making progress in Iraq, even as polls show the war is taking a toll on his job approval rating. The President addressed the challenges facing the US in his weekly radio address, and the White House says he plans two speeches this week on "lessons learned" in Iraq. The issue was the subject of extensive media coverage, with much of it focused on the problems the US and the Administration faced in achieving its goal of establishing a peaceful democracy in Iraq.

NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 4, 1:55, Jordan, 9.87M) reported, "In his weekly radio address today, President Bush says Americans have seen horrific images from Iraq and he says more sacrifice will be required." President Bush: "The fighting has been tough. The enemy has proved brutal and relentless. We changed our approach in many areas to reflect the reality on the ground." Jordan: "Still, the President said US strategy in Iraq is succeeding 'slowly, but surely.' However, the latest Newsweek poll out today suggests that the majority of Americans disagree. 29% approve of how the President is handling the situation in Iraq; 65% disapprove. And Mr. Bush's approval ratings remains at a low of 36%, [while 58% disapprove.]"

The Washington Post (3/19, Gugliotta, 744K) reports Bush "promised to 'finish the mission' with total victory, urging the American public to remain steadfast but offering no indication when victory might be achieved." His "address comes at a time when confidence in the administration's Iraq strategy appears to have reached all-time lows."

The AP (3/19, Riechmann) says Bush "braced Americans for more bloodshed in Iraq but said recent civil strife has motivated warring political factions to move quickly to set up a representative government." His upcoming speeches will "be similar in tone to a series of talks he made in December to help turn public opinion on the war in his favor. In those talks, he combined steely resolve with frank acknowledgments that mistakes have led to changes in U.S. strategy."

Taking a negative tone on Bush's radio address, the Houston Chronicle/Cox News (3/19, Deans) reports, "Three years after President Bush launched the invasion of Iraq, the war grinds on amid escalating costs — in lives, money and U.S. influence abroad." In his radion address Bush said, "We will finish what we started in Iraq. … We will complete the mission." Yet, "sectarian violence verges on civil war. More than 130,000 troops remain in Iraq. And the toll on Iraq and the United States is far beyond anything the administration prepared Americans for in the lead-up to the March 19, 2003, invasion."

Over 50 local television stations covered President Bush's weekly radio address, focusing mainly on his call for patience and need to maintain resolve. Most of these same stations also reported on protests, or continuing violence in Iraq, on the third anniversary of war. For example: KTRK-TV Houston (3/18, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is urging Americans not to lose resolve today, signaling there will be no pullback, and promising that progress is being made, and the world is safer because of the invasion. In city after city, from London to Sydney and here at home, that stay-the-course strategy is fueling today's protests, one of the largest in this country in Chicago."

WAGA-TV Atlanta (3/18, 6:00 p.m.) reported President, "Bush says the horrific images from Iraq may overwhelm the good news on progress. But he insists Iraq is making strides towards a better future." KTRK-TV Houston (3/18, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Three years ago tomorrow, President Bush ordered the start of the war in Iraq. Today, the President defends the decision and tens of thousands head to the streets to protest."

KPHO-TV Phoenix (3/1/8) 10:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush expressed hope in his weekly radio address. He said Iraqi leaders are making progress for forming a new government and that will ease the bloodshed, but he warned of more fighting and sacrifice ahead."

WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (3/18 11:00 p.m.) reported President Bush said, "The security of our country is directly linked to the liberty of the Iraqi people, and we will settle for nothing less than complete victory." KARE-TV Minneapolis-St. Paul (3/18, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "In his weekly radio address, President Bush, facing dwindling approval ratings, is calling for patience."

Administration Lowers Expectations For Iraq Progress. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, McManus, 958K) in a front page analysis titled "U.S. Lowers Goals In Iraq" reports that after three years of war in Iraq "the Bush administration faces a new challenge: the prospect of civil war. And, in response, officials again appear to be redefining success downward." The Times notes, "In increasingly sober public statements -- and in slightly more candid assessments from officials who insisted that they not be identified -- the administration is working to lower expectations." While the Administration has "tacitly acknowledged for more than a year that trying to stabilize Iraq is proving more difficult than they expected," experts "say they see signs of a more fundamental shift in the administration's position -- a creeping redefinition of U.S. goals in Iraq that increasingly allows for the possibility that the nation may remain unstable for years to come."

(3/19, 1.19M) updating their assessment of the situation in Iraq write that "the confusion on the ground in Iraq seems to have spread to American generals' public pronouncements. Last Monday, just days after saying that pacification efforts with the Iraqis were going 'very, very well,' Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told an audience that Iraq is 'a place that is having some real difficulties right now' and that 'everything is in place if they want to have a civil war.' Unfortunately, an examination of trends in Iraq backs up General Pace's later, more sober comments." But despite the problems in Iraq, "more than 60 percent of Iraqis (though very few Sunni Arabs) remain bullish on the future. … These statistics may point to the possibility of a troop drawdown strategy for the United States -- but while a strategically passable outcome still seems within reach, it is increasingly hard to believe that there are the makings of a major success for American foreign policy in Iraq."

Support For Bush's Handling Of Iraq Seen As Dropping In Heartland. The Boston Globe (3/19, Savage, 484K) reports, "Support for Bush and his handling of Iraq is sharply eroding across the American heartland, where the overcast skies and the muddy fields of late winter matched a sense of gloom about Bush and the war." Recently "the Indianapolis Star released poll findings that Bush's approval rating among Indiana voters stood at 37 percent -- a drop of 18 points over the past year. The numbers echoed national polls, but were particularly shocking in a state that has not voted for a Democratic presidential candidate since 1964, and where Democratic presidential contenders often do not bother to campaign." In rural Indiana "support for the troops remains high. But many in Indiana also say the war has not turned out the way they thought it would three years ago, and they question whether Bush has what it takes to lead the troops into a happy ending."

Bush Accused Of Using Misleading Rhetoric. The AP (3/19, Loven) in an article titled "Bush Using Straw-Man Arguments In Speeches" reports, "When the president starts a sentence with 'some say' or offers up what 'some in Washington' believe, as he is doing more often these days, a rhetorical retort almost assuredly follows." He has been "criticized for dressing up events with a too-rosy glow. But experts in political speech say the straw man device, in which the president makes himself appear entirely reasonable by contrast to supposed 'critics,' is just as problematic." Washington University professor Wayne Fields says, it is a "'bizarre kind of double talk' that abuses the rules of legitimate discussion."

Khalilzad "Dives Into Iraq Diplomacy," AP Reports. In a profile of US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the AP (3/19, Hurst) reports that the envoy "spends a lot of time these days in a soundproof room at the US Embassy, sitting in front of television cameras and repeating a single message: Iraq must have a unity government and Americans must be patient until that happens. The 54-year-old Afghan-born US envoy -- a snappy dresser with a soft-spoken, easy demeanor -- has become the increasingly effective face of the Bush administration's campaign to restore American confidence in the Iraq mission."

Rumsfeld Reiterates Commitment To Iraq. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, B7, 744K) writes, "The rationale for a free and democratic Iraq is as compelling today as it was three years ago. A free and stable Iraq will not attack its neighbors, will not conspire with terrorists, will not pay rewards to the families of suicide bombers and will not seek to kill Americans." Abandoning Iraq "would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis. It would be as great a disgrace as if we had asked the liberated nations of Eastern Europe to return to Soviet domination because it was too hard or too tough or we didn't have the patience to work with them as they built free countries."

Former General Calls For Rumsfeld To Resign. Ret. Army Major General Paul Eaton, who was in charge of training the Iraqi military from 2003 to 2004, in a strongly-worded op-ed in the New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) says Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "has shown himself incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically, and is far more than anyone else responsible for what has happened to our important mission in Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld must step down." President Bush should accept his resignation and "in the longer term, Congress must assert itself. Too much power has shifted to the executive branch, not just in terms of waging war but also in planning the military of the future. Congress should remember it still has the power of the purse; it should call our generals, colonels, captains and sergeants to testify frequently, so that their opinions and needs are known to the men they lead. Then when they are asked if they have enough troops -- and no soldier has ever had enough of anything, more is always better -- the reply is public."

Feinstein Says Bush Needs To Provide Leadership. The AP (3/19, Riechmann) in its article on Bush's radio address also notes that "critics of the administration's handling of the war say that the Iraqis must be told that the American military will not be in Iraq forever, and they must realize that the eventual pullout will be on U.S., not Iraqi, terms." In the Democratic radio address, Sen. Dianne Feinstein said, "We need the president to urgently exercise the leadership necessary to bring Iraq's political factions together. … In no uncertain terms, the president must immediately inform the Iraqi people that they need to get their political house in order."

Skelton Says US Will Need Luck To Achieve Goals In Iraq. The Kansas City Star (3/19, 286K) publishes the predictions of six commentators on US progress in Iraq. U.S. Rep. Ike Skelton said, " "The American people strongly support the troops, (but) the support for the mission is beginning to wane. With some good luck, this can all come out at the end of the day with a responsible government and with Iraq forces quelling the violence. We're going to have to have good luck along with some hard work."

Columnist Applauds Shift In US Strategy. Two columns in the Washington Post call Bush's policy of using Democracy to achieve peace as failed. James Hoagland in his column in the Washington Post (3/19, B7, 744K) describes the evolving US policy on Iraq saying "The Bush team gets closer" to resolving the conflict in Iraq "with this exercise, which portrays the long war as a global ideological struggle that hinges on a battle of ideas within and about Islam." Instead of promoting "democracy as a cure-all for the vast frustrations and delusions of al-Qaeda's target audience," a "new tone of realism about those conflicts has taken hold in internal administration discussions of the way forward. Nothing could reassure Americans more than publicizing that change."

Columnist Says US Policy Of Promoting Democracy A Failure In Iraq. George Will in his column in the Washington Post (3/19, B7, 744K) urges Bush to "emphasize the dangers of failure and de-emphasize talk about Iraq's becoming a democracy that ignites emulative transformation in the Middle East." Will concludes, "Three years ago the administration had a theory: Democratic institutions do not just spring from a hospitable culture, they can also create such a culture. That theory has been a casualty of the war that began three years ago today."

NYT, LAT Say US Has Been Humbled By Lack Of Progress In Iraq. The New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) editorializes, "Many who supported the invasion have taken this anniversary to argue that it all would have been worthwhile if things had been run better," but "the last three years have shown how little our national leaders understood Iraq, and have reminded us how badly attempts at liberation from the outside have gone in the past." While right now "there is no time to imagine what the world might be like if George Bush had chosen to see things as they were instead of how he wanted them to be three years ago," his "Iraq debacle ought to serve as a humbling lesson for future generations of American leaders."

The Los Angeles Times (3/19, 958K) in an editorial writes that "the occupation of Iraq has been a humbling letdown." The Times does "concede that the Bush administration's actions were rooted in a strain of American idealism most often identified with Woodrow Wilson." But it has resulted in "a quagmire. Bush's messianic idealism was never justified, and in any event the administration's flawed execution would have undermined his purpose." Entering "its fourth year, the war in Iraq defies simplistic characterizations from both ends of the political spectrum" and "the future of Iraq remains shrouded in gray uncertainty."

On Third Anniversary Of US Invasion Of Iraq, Troops See Problems Lingering. In a story on the third anniversary of the US invasion of Iraq, ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 3, 3:10, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported it is "a milestone" for the US troops in Iraq "in the sense, because of the fact a lot of them are back. They can't really believe they are still here. They look around, and they see some of the problems haven't gone away. I think they are very proud of themselves for what they have done here, and some of the reconstruction efforts, and some of the efforts of reaching out to the Iraqi people. But they know the security situation is not solved, and I think a lot of them think it probably would have been -- probably those especially who came in on the initial invasion thought it would be over then, and they are still here."

Soldiers Recount Negatives And Positives Of Iraq Experiences. And the Washington Post (3/19, A1, 744K) in a front page article describes the experiences of 100 Iraq war veterans interviewed over the past year reporting, "Iraq was bad, nearly all of them agreed," yet "it was not bad in the ways they see covered in the media -- the majority also agreed on this. What they experienced was more complex than the war they saw on television and in print. It was dangerous and confused, yes, but most of the vets also recalled enemies routed, buildings built and children befriended, against long odds in a poor and demoralized country.

Iraqis Said To Be Disenchanted With Lack Of Progress. ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 3, 3:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "I can't find any commemorations, no sign of demonstrations or protests scheduled for tomorrow, no mention of this anniversary in the major newspapers, or on the major newscasts. If you ask Iraqis about the anniversary, you'll get an earful, mostly complaints." Drivers waiting in gas lines that could last 4-12 hours "said this would never have happened under Saddam. When I asked the natural follow up, after three years would you rather have Saddam back, they said no." A lot of Iraqis "thought with the Americans, the world's only superpower taking over, that this country would be turned into something like Connecticut overnight. And in fact, just the opposite has really happened, and they've seen a deterioration in the security front. They have less electricity than before the war in many parts of the country, and many parts of the country still don't have drinkable water. So at this point, three years after the invasion, what we're seeing is a lot of disappointment as opposed to the optimism felt in many quarters three years ago."

Similarly, the Washington Times (3/19, A1, Behn, 90K) in a front page story also reports, "Iraqis interviewed on the streets of Baghdad on the eve of the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion said it will take at least a decade, maybe longer, to get their country on its feet." And "many Iraqis said they had lost confidence in their political leadership's ability to pull the country together."

And the Washington Post publishes a number of opinion pieces critical of US progress from the perspective of local Iraqis. Muean Aljabiry, an Iraqi-born filmmaker and political consultant, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, B1, 744K) says that after the liberation of Iraq he served as an interpreter for "Barbara Bodine and retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, the two highest officials in postwar Iraq. I didn't know how the experiment would turn out. But as I arrived in Baghdad, I really believed the United States had an efficient, well-studied plan to put Iraq together after toppling the Saddam regime." But his experiences have "made me doubtful about our competence for nation building, an exercise the United States initially claimed to have no interest in carrying out. … I sometimes worry that, like the British enterprise, the U.S. effort to build a pluralistic, democratic society in Iraq will be remembered primarily for the insurgency it has spawned."

Middle East and North Africa for Women International regional coordinator Manal Omar in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, B3, 744K) says that after Iraq was liberated three years ago there was concern over sectarian violence, but the situation has become worse. The "schisms among communities were predictable -- and predicted. The most painful fact is that, early on, the feuding was preventable." She is "continually plagued by the question of how we in the international community could have gotten this so very wrong. I believe that we have dug a grave. And it is the Iraqis who will have to lie in it. But who will be held accountable?"

And Professor Kanan Makiya, author of "Republic of Fear: The Politics of Modern Iraq," in an interview with the Washington Post (3/19, B5, Chandrasekaran, 744K) was asked whether the US could have prevented the sectarian violence in Iraq. Makiya said, "There's this old thorn…and that is the issue of provisional government versus occupation. Occupation was the wrong formula for dealing with the transition. The U.S. government pushed aside the Iraqi opposition -- both those groups that were in exile and those groups that were inside Iraq, mainly the Kurds." It was a mistake to rely on "occupation as opposed to a provisional government like what was done in Afghanistan. So what we ended up with was the rhetoric of liberation but the reality of occupation."

Iraqi Dentist and blogger Zeyad in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, 744K) describes the violence he faces every day in Iraq and notes, "The new parliament was sworn in today. Our bickering politicians agreed to disagree yet again, and this time it was over the oath. I sometimes can't help wondering if it was the war that has left us so divided, or have we been that way all along."

Iraqi Insurgents Seen As Improving. Jonathan Finer in the Washington Post's (3/19, B3) "Outlook" section reports, "Long considered a fragmentary and disorganized collection of groups with varying tactics and aims, Iraq's insurgency is showing signs of increasing coordination, consolidation and confidence, those who study it now say. There is no consensus on the precise number of insurgent fighters, but estimates range from a few thousand to more than 50,000. The vast majority of insurgents, probably more than 90 percent, are believed to be Iraqis from the Sunni minority group that largely ruled the country before the fall of Saddam Hussein. But U.S. commanders say that most of the deadliest attacks, and particularly suicide attacks, are committed by foreigners from a range of neighboring countries, including Jordan, Syrian, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Sudan."

The Washington Post (3/19, B3, 744K) also publishes statements by Iraqi insurgents like Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's top aide Abu Hafsa al-Ansari who was quoted by a Lebanses paper saying, "Be sure that the American Army is living now in a swamp of blood and is suffering a state of collapse. Also, the government forces are corrupt and falling apart psychologically. It will flee and soon, as the Americans announce the withdrawal of their forces, and this will happen very soon, Allah willing. The battle of Iraq will be the beginning of other battles in the area to topple the idols allied with Satan."

Time (3/19, Bennett, Jallam) reports in a story headlined, "How Operation Swarmer Fizzled," that "contrary to what many many television networks erroneously reported, the operation was by no means the largest use of airpower since the start of the war." It had "no airstrikes and no leading insurgents were nabbed in an operation that some skeptical military analysts described as little more than a photo op. What's more, there were no shots fired at all and the units had met no resistance."

The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/19) adds that U.S. and Iraqi officials said they "rounded up dozens more suspected insurgents, including alleged killers of" Amjad Hameed, director of the Iraqi television station Al Iraqiya. Still, the operation "stirred growing unease among leading Sunni Arabs. One called it a needless 'escalation' at a time of difficult negotiations over forming a broad-based government."

Two US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 2, :10, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "And today, the Pentagon announced the deaths of two more American soldiers killed in Iraq. The total number of US troops killed in three years of war now stands at more than 2,300."

Violence Mars Start Of Iraqi Shiite Holiday. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 3, 2:30, Boettcher, 9.87M) reported, "Two were killed, eight injured when a roadside bomb hit pilgrims walking to the holy city of Karbala to mark one of their holiest days, Arbayeen. Three and a half million Shiites are making this journey, an easy target for Sunni Muslim insurgents determined to spark civil war. The US mission: Thwart insurgent plans."

The New York Times (3/19, Gettleman, 1.19M) adds, "Shiite pilgrims are threading a needle of danger this week as they make their annual pilgrimage to a shrine in Karbala," as "the pilgrimage route from Baghdad to Karbala cuts straight across territory so overrun by Sunni Arab insurgents that the American military calls it the Triangle of Death."

Documents Appear To Show Saddam Supported Philippine Terrorism. The Weekly Standard (3/19, Hayes) reports, "The discussion of the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq is about to get more interesting," as documents captured in postwar Iraq and now released by the government "add to the growing body of evidence confirming the Iraqi regime's longtime support for terrorism abroad," showing that "Saddam hussein's regime provided financial support to Abu Sayyaf, the al Qaeda-linked jihadist group founded by Osama bin Laden's brother-in-law in the Philippines in the late 1990s." The Boston Globe (3/19, Bray, 484K) adds, "Conservative bloggers, eager to bolster the case for going to war against Iraq, have long argued for release of the documents," but "some prominent liberal bloggers scoffed at the release."

Protests For Iraq War Anniversary Fail To Draw Expected Crowds. ABC World News Tonight (3/18, lead story, 2:35, Reynolds, 8.78M) reported, "In London, thousands took to the streets with a very clear message," calling for the withdrawal of coalition troops from Iraq. But "while organizers expected upwards of 100,000 demonstrators in the British capital, police say it wasn't even a quarter of that. Indeed, while protests against the three-year-old conflict spanned the globe today, the crowds were on the small side. The gathering here in Chicago typified protests in the rest of this country. A lot of passion from the relatively few who bothered to show up." There were "maybe a couple thousand protesters in New York's Times Square, and far fewer took to the pavement in Washington, DC. Their voices were unlikely to penetrate the walls of the Vice Presidential residence nearby, if Mr. Cheney had been there, which he wasn't."

NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 2, :25, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "Thousands hit the streets in Australia, thousands more protested in London, though it is important to note far fewer than were predicted. Demonstrators took to the streets of New York City and all carried the same message. They want the war over and the soldiers to come home."

The New York Times (3/19, Confessore, 1.19M) reports, "About 1,000 people gathered near Times Square yesterday, in one of dozens of energetic and often unfocused rallies held in cities across the United States and around the world" that "were vigorous and peaceful but far smaller than the large-scale marches that preceded the war." Also, "the Iraq war itself…was noticeably less central to the proceedings than in previous years." The Washington Post/AP (3/19, Burkhardt) adds, "many events were far smaller than organizers had hoped." Additional local coverage of the anti-war protests can be found in the Los Angeles Times (3/19, Lin, Schoch, 958K), the Baton Rouge Advocate (3/19, Johnson), the Indianapolis Star (3/19, Webber, 267K), the Mobile Register (3/19, Colquitt, 96K), the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/19, Cleary, 261K) and the Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP (3/19).

Anti-War Activists Discouraged By Lack Of Public Opposition To War. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (3/19, Lambrecht, 310K) reports that despite polls showing "growing anti-war sentiment among the American public," the "new pessimism appears to be having little effect in Washington, where Congress had approved billions of dollars more for war and a proposal to censure President George W. Bush for ordering electronic surveillance in the war on terror is drawing little support." And "anti-war organizers have expressed frustration at what they describe as a disconnect between public sentiments and continued support for the war in Congress."

Camp Nama Account Said To Belie Assertion That Prisoner Abuse Confined To Rogues. The New York Times (3/19, A1, Schmitt, Marshall, 1.19M) publishes an account of Task Force 6-26 and Camp Nama in Iraq, which "reveals the extent to which the unit members mistreated prisoners months before and after the photographs of abuse from Abu Ghraib were made public in April 2004, and it helps belie the original Pentagon assertions that abuse was confined to a small number of rogue reservists at Abu Ghraib." Even a Pentagon official admits, "there were no rules there," and in "early 2004, both the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. had expressed alarm about the military's harsh interrogation techniques." Civilians who worked there, "when pressed repeatedly by reporters who contacted them,…agreed to speak about their experiences and observations out of what they said was anger and disgust over the unit's treatment of detainees and the failure of task force commanders to punish misconduct more aggressively."

Injuries Cause Iraq Veteran To Lose Memory. The Washington Post/AP (3/19, Bynum) reports, "His 3-year-old son Nicholas' first steps, the first time Liam, his newborn, smiled -- Staff Sgt. Douglas Piper lived to see them. Then his scarred memory erased even those precious moments." Piper's "doctors tell him at least 80 percent of his short-term memory has been destroyed."

Drugs Threaten Afghan Democracy. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (3/19, Dine, 310K) reports that "poppies are invaluable cash crops to farmers seeking to sustain their families, but dangerous to a young Afghan democracy. An unholy alliance is emerging among farmers, drug lords, Taliban remnants and al-Qaida fighters," and "drugs are already the nation's sole export of any magnitude." They "threaten to turn it into a 'narco-state,'" and "Afghan sources say" al-Qaida "has acknowledged in private sessions its satisfaction that expanding heroin use is poisoning 'infidels' in other countries."

DOJ:

More Federal Prosecutors Urged For Washington State. The Columbia (WA) Tri-City Herald (3/19) reports, "It is time for the U.S. Justice Department to start bearing its share of the load in the Tri-Cities. … And we don't mean by asking local prosecutors to do even more of the federal government's job than they already do." The Herald continues, "We have had a federal judge in the Tri-Cities for the past six years, but no federal prosecutors. … It was four years ago that U.S. Attorney James McDevitt, in Spokane, promised to look into the question of assigning some federal prosecutors here instead of keeping them all based in Spokane or Yakima. … Local law enforcement and prosecutors have said for years many cases that should be tried in federal court instead are pushed down to local courts. … The result: Overload on local courts and prosecutors, more costs for local taxpayers and a cheap way out for the feds." The Herald concludes, "We do not doubt McDevitt's sincerity nor do we accuse him of being the problem. … Nor is it right to fault Congress for not authorizing money to have a prosecutor and other accouterments and officers of the federal government stationed here. … But between the two lies the only solution to a judicial and cost inequity. … McDevitt should press the case for a prosecutor in the Tri-Cities, and Congress should give him the money to make it happen."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Cross-Examination In Enron Trial Vital Despite Lack Of Drama. The Houston Chronicle (3/19, Fowler) reports, "If you stop by the Enron trial in downtown Houston expecting to witness a Perry Mason moment, don't hold your breath. … Those instances of 'gotcha,' — when an attorney catches an opposing witness in a lie or draws out a weeping confession during cross-examination — aren't as common as TV legal dramas might have you believe." The Chronicle continues, "In reality, cross-examination is often a dry, protracted process by which attorneys try to undermine a witness or dig for nuggets of information that support their case. It's not at all unusual for 'cross,' as attorneys call it, to seem random and meandering to a casual observer." The Chronicle adds, "Lawyers watching the current trial said so far the cross-examination by the defense teams for Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling has had a little bit of everything: entertainment and tedium, humor and anger, precision and confusion. … The defense will get its chance to put its best arguments before the jury when the government rests its case, but any points it can score with jurors now on cross are crucial."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Defense May Prove Embarrassing To White House. The AP (3/19, Yost) reports attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, are "signaling they may delve deeply at his criminal trial into infighting among the White House, the CIA and the State Department over pre-Iraq war intelligence failures." Libby's attorneys are also "suggesting that the State Department — not Libby — may be to blame for leaking the identity of covert CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media." The prospective defense raises "the possibility a trial could become politically embarrassing for the Bush administration by focusing on the debate about whether the White House manipulated intelligence to justify the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003."

The Washington Post (3/19, A8, Smith, 744K) reports Libby's attorneys "want access to many Bush administration documents they say will demonstrate that an undercover CIA officer played a 'peripheral role' in the government's debate over prewar intelligence and that Libby had no motive to lie about her, according to new court filings." Libby's defense "wrote that they anticipated the trial would showcase testimony by a Who's Who of senior administration officials involved in the Iraq policymaking at the heart of the CIA leak investigation, including three top officials at the State Department who the lawyers asserted played key roles in the unraveling of Plame's covert CIA position. Those officials include then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his deputy secretary, Richard Armitage, and undersecretary for political affairs, Marc Grossman."

Analyst Says CIA Not Careful In Protecting Agents' Secrecy. In a Washington Times op-ed (3/19), Scripps Howard News Service political analyst Martin Schram says that in a March 12 "investigative report," Chicago Tribune

reporter John Crewdson "revealed how America's enemies, armed only with a computer hooked to the Internet, could do what he did: Break the cover of 2,653 CIA employees around the world, many of them secret agents. Headline: 'Internet blows CIA cover.'" Schram recalls his own scoop on June 6, 1974 in Newsday that "revealed how America's enemy rogues and spies, armed only with no-tech eyes, ears and shoes, could do what he did: Break the cover of a secret CIA school for spies operating in a well-appointed downtown Washington apartment building." In "both cases, the journalist revealed to the CIA an intelligence gap within its midst that stunned and embarrassed the agency -- but provided the CIA with info it needed to try to recover its secrets, post haste." Schram adds, "Sadly, the pattern is frighteningly clear. The most dangerous intelligence gap of all is the one between the ears of the CIA officials whose job requires them to think it all through and prevent gaffes that could cost agents' lives or compromise the safety of us all."

Judicial Security Still An Issue One Year After Chicago Courthouse Shootings. The New York Times (3/19, Files) reports, "About a year after the killings of the husband and mother of a Chicago federal judge and a shooting rampage in an Atlanta courthouse that left three people dead, the safety of judges and court employees remains a serious concern for the judiciary." The Times continues, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said this week that three-quarters of the more than 2,000 federal judges had sought home security systems paid by the government." The Times adds, "The Judicial Conference of the United States, which sets policy for the federal courts, met this week for the first time under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and approved security measures. … The conference authorized security equipment and workers for federal probation and pretrial services offices, urged added training for judges' security guards and called for the Bureau of Prisons to screen all outgoing mail to judges and courts from federal prison inmates." The Times notes, "A spokesman for the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, David A. Sellers, said that after the killings of the family members of the Chicago judge, Joan H. Lefkow, the security focus shifted from courthouses to judges and other court employees outside court buildings. … Last May, Congress appropriated $12 million for the Marshals Service to coordinate such security, including paying for home detection systems for any federal judge who wants one. This month, the House passed an authorization for $20 million to hire additional marshals for court security and investigating threats."

Potential Witnesses Named In Nevada Corruption Case. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/19, Packer) reports, "During pretrial motions in the political corruption case of former Clark County Commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, a U.S. District judge offered a glimpse of the witnesses who might be called to testify." The Review-Journal continues, "Judge Larry Hicks rattled off potential witnesses to prospective jurors Tuesday to determine whether any of them had relationship with those who could be called to the stand during the trial, which is expected to last three months." The Review-Journal adds, "Among the names were Terry Lamuraglia, a former lobbyist who now works in the county's Parks and Recreation Department; attorneys Jay Brown and Joe Brown; and Peter S. Christiansen, former strip club owner Michael Galardi's longtime lawyer. … The list also includes FBI agent Joe Dickey." The Review-Journal notes, "During opening statements on Thursday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Schiess touched on those witnesses' roles in the government's case. … A federal indictment issued in May 2003 accuses Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey, Galardi and former Commissioners Erin Kenny and Lance Malone of bribery. The commissioners allegedly accepted cash bribes from Galardi that were delivered by Malone, in exchange for votes that furthered the success of Galardi's strip clubs, according to the indictment. … Galardi and Kenny cut deals with the government and have provided information to prosecutors."

Data Show Federal Sentencing Disparities. The Des Moines Register (3/19) reports, "In the first 13 months since federal judges were handed more freedom in sentencing, punishment disparities have developed among courthouses nationwide, new data show." The Register continues, "Federal prosecutors and judges in Iowa downplay the meaning of the statistics, but defense attorneys say the numbers reinforce what they have always believed: Varying judicial temperaments, combined with harsher prosecution in Iowa's northern half, can create widely different sentences for similar crimes. … 'There are some judges who are far less likely to' depart from federal sentencing guidelines, said Alfredo Parrish, a defense attorney who has represented alleged criminals in both of Iowa's federal districts. 'Everybody knows it.'" The Register adds, "The data, from the U.S. Sentencing Commission, indicate a new attitude among judges since a January 2005 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that gave them much more leeway in how they dole out punishment. … Nationally, judges have been 10 percentage points more likely since the change to deviate from what were mandatory sentencing rules before then. Almost always, they deviated with less-harsh sentences. … The guidelines, created in the mid-1980s because Congress wanted more uniformity in punishments, gave judges scant wiggle room. After only 13 months with 'advisory' rules, Justice Department officials have urged Congress to take away judges' freedom."

Goodlatte Bill Would Ban Internet Gambling. The Washington Times (3/19, A1, Lemke, 90K) reports in a front page story that Internet gambling is "a $15 billion industry driven by the popularity of sports and the growing interest in poker. The industry is the subject of tense debate between companies looking to cash in on the American marketplace and lawmakers looking to ban online gambling. Analysts predict online betting soon could make up as much as 10 percent of gambling worldwide." Conservative lawmakers, "often at the urging of religious groups, have been trying to stop online gambling since it first surfaced in the mid-1990s." Rep. Bob Goodlatte said, "We feel this type of gambling is particularly pernicious." The Times adds, "However, advocates argue governments would reap big financial gains by making online gambling legal, regulating it and taxing it heavily." But the "Federal legislation introduced last month by Mr. Goodlatte seeks to clarify the law to ensure that online bets are banned and to include poker and other common gambling practices."

Law Enforcement Officials Worry Overuse May Limit Effectiveness Of Amber Alert. The New York Times/AP (3/19) reports ten years after the Amber Alerts "began being used in the Dallas-Fort Worth area, the system has been adopted in all 50 states. And in some, it is being used for reasons beyond its original purpose of helping find children abducted by strangers." In Ohio, Texas "and other states the program can be used when a child is taken away by a parent or family member who does not have custody, if the child is believed to be in immediate danger of injury or death. Some law enforcement officials say they are concerned that the alerts will be overused and become less effective."

South Carolina Sex Offender Captured. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 11, 1:00, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "There will be no bail for a convicted sex offender captured in South Carolina yesterday, after a four day manhunt. Police arrested Kenneth Hinson after a relative called 911 to report he had come looking for water. He is charged with assaulting two teenage girls in a room beneath has property. Many in the community were upset he was not behind bars all along. He was convicted of raping a 12-year-old girl in 1991 and released in 2000."

CIVIL LAW:

Amount Of Unpaid Federal Fines Up Significantly. The Washington Times/AP (3/19, A1, Mendoza, Sullivan) reports the "amount of unpaid federal fines has risen sharply in the past decade. Individuals and corporations regularly avoid large penalties for wrongdoing -- sometimes through negotiations, sometimes because companies go bankrupt, sometimes because of officials' failure to keep close track of who owes what." An Associated Press "examination of federal financial-penalty enforcement across the nation" also found that the "government currently is owed more than $35 billion in fines and other payments from criminals and in civil cases, according to Justice Department figures." In 2004, Federal authorities "ordered $7.8 billion in 98,985 fines, penalties and restitution demands in criminal and civil cases, but collected less than half of that." White-collar crime cases "account for the largest amount of uncollected debt."

Google Gets Win In Battle With Government Over Data Subpoena. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 7, 1:00, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "In what Google's lawyers are calling a clear victory, a Federal judge ruled that the search engine does not have to turn over the terms people use to search. It does, however, have to share 50,000 web addresses. The government says its intent was to collect information it needs to uphold child pornography laws."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FDA Investigating Two Deaths Linked To RU-486. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 9, 1:00, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "The Food and Drug Administration is investigating the deaths of two women who died after taking RU-486, the so called abortion pill. As a result of these reports, Planned Parenthood announced they will change the way they administer the medication. Abortion rights opponents are calling for the drug to be pulling from the market."

South Dakota Officials Get Earful Over Abortion Ban. The New York Times/AP (3/19) reports, "South Dakota politicians and state agencies have been bombarded in the past few weeks with thousands of calls, letters and e-mail messages, for and against the state's recently enacted ban on nearly all abortions." A few groups "who oppose the ban have called for a tourism boycott of South Dakota, urging people to avoid attractions like Mount Rushmore; the Badlands; the annual motorcycle rally in Sturgis; and the Corn Palace, an arena in Mitchell whose walls are covered with colorful ears of corn."

Petition Likely To Place South Dakota Abortion Ban On Ballot. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/19, Haga, 424K) reports, "It appears likely that South Dakota's recently adopted ban on abortions will be referred to the state's voters. Jim Robinson, secretary of the nonprofit organization Focus South Dakota, said he expects 'a large variety of groups that disagree with this extremist ban' to participate in a petition drive to keep the law from taking effect July 1 and go on the November general election ballot. 'I wouldn't anticipate too much difficulty' in obtaining the necessary 16,728 signatures, he said."

Rights Of Unwed Fathers In Dispute. The New York Times (3/19, Lewin) reports, "Although one in every three American babies has unwed parents, birth fathers' rights remain an unsettled area, a delicate balancing act between the importance of biological ties and the undisrupted placement of babies whose mothers relinquish them for adoption." The Times continues, "While women have the right to get an abortion, or to have and raise a child, without informing the father, courts have increasingly found that when birth mothers choose adoption, fathers who have shown a desire for involvement have rights, too. .. But to claim those rights most states require a father to put his name on a registry. While about 30 states now have registries, they vary widely. In some, fathers must actually claim paternity; in others, just the possibility of paternity. The deadlines may be 5 days after birth or 30, or any time before an adoption petition is filed. … And registries are a double-edged sword: It remains an open question whether they serve more to protect fathers' rights or to protect adoptive parents, and the babies they have bonded with, from biological fathers' claims."

Outcry Over New Orleans Elections Grows. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/19, Bazile) reports, "Echoing concerns of other civil rights leaders about the fairness of New Orleans' upcoming elections, National Urban League president and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial announced a plan Saturday for out-of-town mayoral forums and outreach programs to help the city's displaced voters." The Times-Picayune continues, "The National Coalition for Black Civic Participation plans to file a letter of objection to the U.S. Justice Department's approval Thursday of the plans for the April 22 and May 20 elections, said Morial, who was in New Orleans to attend a funeral." The Times-Picayune adds, "The department gave advance clearance to the plans under the terms of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which requires the Justice Department to review proposed changes in voting procedures in Louisiana and other Southern states to ensure the changes don't discriminate against black voters. … The department's action drew immediate fire from several civil rights groups, which have contended for weeks that too little is being done to ensure that tens of thousands of black voters displaced by Hurricane Katrina will be able to participate in one of the most crucial elections in the city's history."

ENVIRONMENT:

Some Say Interior Nominee Kempthorne Lacks Substance. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Tizon, 958K) reports "the ready smile and neighborly style" Republican Gov. Dirk Kempthorne of Idaho "don't always get the job done, some supporters and critics say. They contend that the man President Bush has picked to succeed Gale A. Norton as secretary of the Interior often exhibits more charm than substance." Fellow Republicans "and business leaders say Kempthorne, 54, knows how to create consensus but is too politically cautious. Local Democrats and environmentalists say that he is gifted at making people feel heard but that, at the end of the day, his loyalties lie squarely with development and corporate interests."

Bingaman Criticized For Aiding GOP On Gulf Of Mexico Drilling. In his Los Angeles Times column (3/19), Ronald Brownstein says ranking Senate Energy Committee Democrat Jeff Bingaman is "now helping Senate Republicans and the energy industry advance one of their top goals: a bill to expand drilling for oil and gas in the Gulf of Mexico off the Florida coast. He's doing so even though Republicans are blocking the energy priorities of Bingaman and most other Democrats: more focus on conservation and renewable energy." By helping Republicans "pursue their agenda while the GOP suppresses Democratic preferences, Bingaman isn't only making a bad bargain — he's making it more difficult for the nation to craft a comprehensive plan to reduce our excessive dependence on foreign oil."

WPost Calls On Bush To Raise Fuel Economy Standards. An editorial in The Washington Post (3/19, B6, 744K) says, "the Bush administration is due to issue a revised set of fuel economy standards for 'light trucks.'" The Posts sees this as a way for the White House to, "start making good on its promise to end America's 'oil addiction,' in a concrete way. Unfortunately, there isn't yet any certainty that the necessary willpower exists." The Post adds that only cowardice would stop these changes, but "93 percent of Americans, according to one poll, support making cars and trucks more fuel-efficient." So, "saving fuel is not only good for the economy, good for foreign policy and good for the environment, it's politically popular, too."

NYTimes Says Court Rulings Rebuke EPA Interpretation. An editorial in the New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) states, "the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit struck down as illegal an attempt by the Bush administration to allow power plants and other industrial polluters to evade the Clean Air Act. At issue was a provision of the act known as New Source Review." The

Times says the court noted the EPA's new interpretation of the rule would, "have had the perverse effect of allowing plants that are now in compliance with the law to break it. … We should not expect the current E.P.A. administrators to rush the battlements with new enforcement cases. Indeed, such is Mr. Cheney's continued reach in these matters, the agency even now is seeking other, subtler ways to undermine the law. But it is nice to hear someone say that you cannot rewrite an act of Congress just because you do not like it."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Audit Criticizes FBI Oversight Of Trilogy Contractors. Under the headline "Audit Critical Of FBI, Contractors," The Washington Post (3/18, A4, Eggen) reports, "The FBI and its contractors spent more than $17 million on first-class airfare, inflated labor rates, missing equipment and other questionable payments during the botched attempt to upgrade the bureau's outdated computer system," according to a new GAO audit. The Post notes, "The FBI's struggle to modernize its computer system has been a recurring headache for Director Robert S. Mueller III and has earned it considerable criticism from lawmakers. … The auditors said the problems with Trilogy may well be much worse than their report shows because the review was based on only a portion of the FBI's payments to contractors," and warns that Sentinel could suffer similar problems "if these weaknesses go uncorrected." Sen. Charles Grassley said of the GAO report, "It's time for the FBI to explain what assurances it has that the taxpayers will be able to recover any funds these companies owe to the government before we start paying them millions more for work on Sentinel." However, "The FBI said in a statement that it has tracked down more than 1,000 of the missing items and has put in place numerous checks to avoid the problems that plagued Trilogy. 'We have strengthened our internal controls to avoid repeat of the issues cited by auditors, from any vendor,' spokesman Michael Kortan said.

CNN Live Saturday (3/18, Lin) reported, "The FBI may have wasted millions of dollars trying to update its computer systems. And a new investigation concludes it may spend millions more before the job is done." CNN (Nurenberg) added that the GAO report "questioned $17 million in spending saying more than 1,200 pieces of equipment can't be accounted for. Price tag for that, $7.5 million. The FBI says it has tightened up accounting procedures. After 9/11, the FBI says it was under great pressure to find a quick fix." FBI Assistant Director John Miller: "The pressure certainly came to bear on the bureau to launch a computer system that was capable of connecting the dots and to do it quickly. And under that pressure, sometimes -- not in every instance, but sometimes the message was get it done and if an obstacle came up, to move it out of the way." UPI (3/18) also briefly reports on the GAO review, noting, "However, an FBI spokesman told CNN the agency's own audit had accounted for most of the equipment."

The Washington Times (3/19, Seper, 90K) reports an audit says the FBI "has improved its ability to plan and manage a new information-technology project but still faces major problems in implementing the program, designed to replace a failed $170 million system." The Sentinel program was "introduced last year as a replacement for the failed Virtual Case File system and is scheduled to be fully operational by 2009 at an expected cost of $425 million. It is part of an FBI effort to close internal communication gaps and improve information sharing with other law-enforcement and intelligence agencies." The audit "by the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General said that although the FBI has developed new technology-planning processes that can help the agency complete a new case- and information-management system, 'several continuing concerns' remain regarding the FBI's management of the new project."

MD Schools Turn Down First Lady Ehrlich's Anti-Drug Show. The Washington Post (3/19, C6, Mosk, 744K) reports, "Maryland first lady Kendel Ehrlich pitched the state schools superintendent a plan to air her television talk show about drug and alcohol prevention in public school classrooms, but the department eventually turned her down. The State Education Department declined her offer after an expert on drug and alcohol prevention reviewed it and determined that it was not suitable for children. One episode, filmed on the beach and at a nightclub in Ocean City, includes sexually explicit language and brief nudity as it explores the pitfalls of drinking."

Montana Running Graphic Ads To Demonstrate Dangers Of Meth Addiction. The state of Montana is running a series of TV ads to demonstrate the danger of addiction to methamphetamine. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 10, 2:00, Hattori, 9.87M) reported the state is "blanketing the stage with edgy broadcast and print ads, dramatizing the addictiveness of meth." Peg Shea, Montana Meth Project Director: "Kids across the state said we don't want to have adults lecturing us." Hattori: "This one did extensive research on the group it's trying to reach, young people." Shea: "The kids said it was almost a dare. If you do a television ad it has got to catch our attention." The effort is privately funded, aided by software entrepreneur Thomas Siebel, who was shown saying, "We are breaking a lot of rules. I am not sure a public figure would be willing to take this heat." Hattori: "Will it make a difference here in Montana? Nearly one in four young people were offered meth within the last year. The eighth graders that we talked to were convinced.

DC Area Sees Surge In Meth Use. The Washington Post (3/19, C1, Paley, 744K) reports, "The number of methamphetamine labs and addicts in the Washington area has jumped in recent years, but law enforcement and public health officials say the region is still woefully unprepared to deal with a problem that remains under the radar." The number "of seized meth labs in Maryland, Virginia and the District has increased from close to zero in 2000 to more than 80 last year."

IMMIGRATION:

Conservatives, Catholic Officials Divided On Immigration Reform. Conservative Republicans who are taking a hard line on immigration reform are clashing with Catholic Church officials, who provide services to migrants regardless of their legal status. The New York Times (3/19, Swarns, 1.19M) reports immigration "has long caused friction between the church, with its advocacy for migrants, and conservatives, who want to slow illegal crossings over the Mexican border. But as Congress wrestles with the fate of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants, that tension has escalated into a sharp war of words, highlighting the divide among some Republicans and Catholics who have fought side by side on other issues like abortion and same-sex marriage."

Gates Personally Lobbying Congress On H1B Visa Cap. In his Washington Post column (3/19, B7), David Broder says Microsoft's Bill Gates "decided to add his personal voice to his Washington office's lobbying effort to expand the number of foreign-born computer scientists allowed to work in this country under a special program known as H-1B visas." Gates "told me the 'high-skills immigration issue is by far the number one thing' on the Washington agenda for Microsoft and for the electronics industry generally." Since autumn 2003, Congress "has limited the number of people admitted annually on H-1B visas to 65,000." But so "great is the demand for such skills in the burgeoning high-tech world that in August 2005 the last of the visas available for fiscal 2006 were issued. That means a 14-month shutdown of the program, until October of this year."

TAX:

Federal Officials Examining Nonprofit Hospitals' Tax Exempt Status. The New York Times (3/19, Pear, 1.19M) reports congressional leaders, "concerned that many nonprofit hospitals are not providing enough charity care to justify their tax-exempt status, say they will set standards for the industry if it does not do so itself." Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley, "who had already been examining nonprofit groups like United Way and the American Red Cross, is broadening his focus to include nonprofit hospitals, with an eye to legislation that would clarify standards for their tax exemptions." House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas "began investigating the financial practices of nonprofit hospitals last year," and Internal Revenue Service Commissioner Mark Everson "said tax officials often found little difference between nonprofit and for-profit hospitals 'in their operations, their attention to the benefit of the community or their levels of charity care.'"

New Definition Inadvertently Affects Child Tax Credits. The Washington Post (3/19, F5, Crenshaw, 744K) in its Cash Flow column reports, "A new provision of the tax law, which was meant to make the law simpler and fairer, is turning out to have done neither. The provision involves the definition of 'child' in claiming various tax breaks." Some taxpayers may be able to claim unintended benefits, while others may be deprived of legitimate credits. For Instance, children, "of well-to-do families may be able to use their siblings to claim the earned-income tax credit, which is meant for low-income working families." While the new definition may knock, "single taxpayers whose adult children live with them out of head-of-household filing status."

WPost Argues Bush Tax Cuts Make Balancing Budget Impossible. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/19, B6, 744K) posits that the Bush administration does not want to discuss balancing the budget without raising taxes because it "would require cuts so deep and wide as to be unimaginable as a matter of politics and unwise as a matter of policy." This goal could be accomplished, "but only if Americans are willing to sacrifice," basically, "all of the federal budget outside defense and veterans." … That's why Mr. Bush doesn't talk about the real-life consequences of his tax cuts, and the real-life people who will suffer from them after he leaves office." The Post adds, "If this is what you want government to look like, go ahead and support the extension of the president's tax cuts and oppose any tax increases."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

stop far short of fixing what they view as a serious flaw: an unfocused domestic agenda." The Times continues, "The war in Iraq is dominating the attention of Bush and his top aides, these critics say, while the recent departure of the president's top domestic policy advisor after just one year has left the White House without an obvious conductor to direct the sometimes disparate policy-making machine." While "Bush first campaigned on a largely domestic agenda, experts either said he had achieved much of what he had set out to accomplish or said he had put aside priorities at home to devote time, energy and government resources to the war on terrorism." The "frustration among domestic policy advocates underscores the range of problems facing Bush. Sixteen months after reelection, his second term has so far been dominated by a drumbeat of controversy and crises involving a range of issues."

Bush Staff Shakeup Rumors Noted. The Houston Chronicle (3/19, Mason, 581K) reports on the rumors that top White House aides may be suffering from burnout, leading to a shakeup among longtime Bush aides. The Chronicle reports, "Rumors of high-profile departures wax and wane. Is" Chief of Staff Andrew Card "leaving? What about" White House spokesman Scott "McClellan? Similarly, prognostications of imminent staff shake-ups are on the rise." McClellan "did little to stanch the speculation with an enigmatic nondenial last week," saying, "This is part of the inside Washington babble that goes on in this town. It's part of the parlor game. We are focused on the priorities that the American people care most about and getting things done."

Bill To Reform Pension System May Weaken It.

A Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation analysis says the measure to reform the private pension system under consideration by a House-Senate conference committee could weaken the system instead of strengthening it. The New York Times (3/19, A1, Walsh, 1.19M) reports in a front page story that lawmakers "modified many of the proposed rules, allowing companies more time to cover pension shortfalls, to make more forgiving estimates about how much they will owe workers in the future, and even sometimes to assume that their workers will die younger than the rest of the population." Companies also "persuaded lawmakers to add dozens of specific measures, including a multibillion-dollar escape clause for the nation's airlines and a special exemption for the makers of Smithfield Farms hams. As a result, the bill now being completed in a House-Senate conference committee, rather than strengthening the pension system, would actually weaken it, according to a little-noticed analysis by the government's pension agency."

Saletan Calls For Dropping Age As Criteria For Social Security. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/19, B2, 744K), William Saletan of Slate magazine says that with "more and more boomers living to age 65 and beyond, perfectly healthy but collecting checks for decades," we "need a radical change in Social Security. I'm not talking about privatization. I'm talking about rethinking, and possibly abolishing, the whole idea of payments based on age." The "point of Social Security was to subsidize those who couldn't work, not those who could." Abolishing "age as a standard of fitness would be fairer than simply raising the eligibility age."

Reliance On Standardized Testing Said To Increase Risk Of Error.

The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Silverstein, 958K) reports on the College Board's recent SAT scoring error on 4,600 October tests, adding that while "high school seniors and their parents, along with college counselors and admissions officers, have been roiled by" the "recent disclosures," education testing experts "point out that similar mistakes have happened before — and inevitably will happen again." Kathleen Rhoades, "a research associate with the Center for the Study of Testing, Evaluation and Educational Policy at Boston College," said "there were 137 publicly disclosed cases of large-scale testing errors by educational testing companies from 1976 through early 2004, with most of them occurring since 1997." The "consequences of grading mistakes and other mishaps have intensified over the last decade with the increasing reliance on so-called high-stakes testing." In "recent years, President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act has triggered expanded testing by many states."

Boehner Says Futures Contract Fee Not Likely.

The Bloomberg (3/19, Hassler) reports House Majority Leader John Boehner said Congress is unlikely to approve a "new fee on futures contracts proposed by President George W. Bush." At a Futures Industry Association conference in Boca Raton, Florida, Boehner said, "If it hasn't happened in 13 consecutive tries, that probably means it won't happen again" Bloomberg notes the fee proposed in the Bush budget "would cover the $127 million budget for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission that regulates the $2.5 trillion-a-day U.S. futures industry."

O'Connor, Ginsburg Said To Have Stepped Up Defense Of Judicial Independence.

The New York Times (3/19, Liptak, 1.19M) reports former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor "told an audience at Georgetown University that a judiciary afraid to stand up to elected officials can lead to dictatorship," while last month, "speaking in South Africa, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said that the courts were a safeguard 'against oppressive government and stirred-up majorities.'" The justices' speeches "were mostly a reaction, students of the court said, to attacks on judicial independence in Congress." Kermit L. Hall, the editor of "The Oxford Companion to the United States Supreme Court," said, "What's going on is that Ginsburg and O'Connor are using their position — and it is striking that both are women — to state a position in favor of the judiciary that comes real, real close to taking a political position." The Times adds the O'Connor and Ginsburg speeches, "variations on basic speeches they had given often before, were sharper and more topical than what many expect from Supreme Court justices."

Lobbyists Doubt Proposed Rules Will Change Much. The Washington Post (3/19, A1, Birnbaum, 744K) reports in a front page story that some of Washington's "top lobbyists say that they expect to find ways around congressional efforts to impose new restrictions on lobbyists' dealings with lawmakers in the wake of the Jack Abramoff corruption scandal, and that any limits will barely put a dent in the billions of dollars spent to influence legislation." Lobbyists say they "have already found scores of new ways to buy the attention of lawmakers through fundraising, charitable activities and industry-sponsored seminars. An estimated $10 billion is spent annually to influence legislation and regulations, and that spending is not likely to be diminished by the proposed lobbying changes, these lobbyists contend."

Legislators With Safe Seats Still Spending Campaign Cash. The Washington Post (3/19, A4, Murray, 744K) reports that although Rep. Spencer Bachus "hasn't drawn a serious opponent in the past three elections," he "burns through significant sums of campaign cash, as do plenty of other House members sitting in safe congressional seats. Among the items billed in 2005 to Bachus's campaign account and his 'Growth and Prosperity' political action committee: $6,689 for U2 concert tickets and expenses as part of a campaign event; $1,298 in lodging in Vail, Colo.; and $270 for the catering of an 'American Idol' party." Rep. Corrine Brown (D-Fla.) "spent $15,835 of campaign funds on condolence flowers for constituents, Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) used $8,328 of his campaign war chest to buy gifts for his staff, and Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) was reimbursed for a $1 'meal' at a local gas station, which his staff believes was bottled water." Some lawmakers "say that such expenditures are routine and completely legal under Federal Election Commission rules. But these spending practices are beginning to attract attention from watchdog groups and the news media, as the 2006 congressional campaigns heat up and Congress considers measures to crack down on the perks of office."

Bush Approval Drops To 36% In Newsweek Poll. Newsweek (3/18, Dickey) reports in an Internet exclusive that a Newsweek poll "shows President Bush's approval rating dropping to new lows on domestic issues and rising public anger over Iraq and homeland security." Bush's approval rating is "only 36 percent in the latest NEWSWEEK poll, matching the low point in his presidency recorded last November. His image as an effective leader in the war on terror is tarnished, with less than half the public (44 percent) approving of the way he's handling terrorism and homeland security. Despite a series of presidential speeches meant to bolster support for the war in Iraq, as well as the announcement of a major military offensive when the poll was getting under way, only 29 percent of the people questioned approved Bush's handling of the situation in Iraq. Fully 65 percent disapprove."

Bloomberg (3/19, Decker) also reports the Newsweek poll, saying "the president's misfortune has translated into good news for Democrats, with 50 percent of registered voters polled saying they will back Democratic candidates, compared with 39 percent for Republicans."

Democrats' Message Attacking Bush As "Incompetent" Finds Success. Nina Easton in her "Washington Briefing" column in the Boston Globe (3/19, 484K) reports, "The Democrats' sudden discipline at staying on message is beginning to score points in pubic opinion polls. The Pew Research Center's Andrew Kohut has reported that 'incompetent' has replaced 'hones' as the most frequent descriptor applied to Bush." Although "the Democrats have used 'incompetence' with increasing regularity since the administration's flat-footed response to Hurricane Katrina, the phrase 'dangerous incompetence' is a recent invention of Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid." Recently, "Reid strategists began inserting the words into talking points for press secretaries to the Senate's 44 Democrats. And during Reid's weekly Saturday afternoon huddle with Democratic senators scheduled to appear on the Sunday morning talk shows, he encouraged them to use the label to describe the White House."

OTHER NEWS:

Sabo Announces Retirement. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/19, Olson, 424K) reports Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo, "the stoic, gentle giant of Minnesota politics, broke into tears Saturday as he announced plans to retire after 46 years in elective office, the last 28 in Congress." Sabo's action "leaves prospective candidates little time to organize for the DFL convention. The endorsee is expected to become the prohibitive favorite in the race in the strongly DFL district, which includes Minneapolis and a number of inner-ring suburbs." The Star Tribune adds, "State Rep. Keith Ellison, DFL-Minneapolis, Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer, a college professor, and DFL Minneapolis City Council Member Gary Schiff already are in the race to succeed Sabo. Green Party member Jay Pond also is in, as are Republicans Tim Anderson and James Turnham." Other potential candidates cited by the Star Tribune include former DFL Hennepin County Commissioner Mark Andrew, former state Sen. Ember Reichgott Jung, DFL-New Hope, state Sen. Satveer Chaudhary, DFL-Fridley, state Rep. Connie Bernardy, DFL-Fridley, Hennepin County Board Members Gail Dorfman, and Mike Opat.

Lessening Inflation Fears, Strong Economic Reports Lead Stocks Higher. Several papers noted the stock market's end of the week rise and overall positive performance this year. Reasons cited included strong economic reports and a belief inflation is under control. The Washington Post (3/19, F02, 744K) reports, "The major factor in the week's market activity was a changing consensus about inflation, and how the Federal Reserve would respond to it." A government report showed an unexpectedly low, "0.1 percent increase in consumer prices in February." And at, "the same time, some Fed officials were heard to express confidence that the economy would cool down on its own later this year."

The New York Times (3/19, Sommer, 1.19M) reports, "It was the best week for stocks since the beginning of the year, as several economic reports suggested that inflation was under control while economic growth remained strong." The Washington Post (3/19, F02, 744K) reports, "The market benefited this week from a new Wall Street consensus on interest rates. The Federal Reserve will boost rates only another half of a percentage point, most economists now are saying." The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Petruno, 958K) reports, "Something may come along to scare the U.S. stock market down from its current heights." But the, "usual suspects seem to be losing their ability to frighten investors. That's often a good sign for a bull market's staying power."

Despite Positive Signs Some On Wall Street Still Bearish. The New York Times (3/19, De Aenlle, 1.19M) reports, "Popular gauges of sentiment toward stocks show extreme bearishness, at least by the standards of the last few years, even with the market hitting new highs." A recent survey by Invests Intelligence of investment newsletters, "recorded the highest level of bearishness since April 2003 and the least bullishness since August 2004."

Rice Seeks To Strengthen Alliance Against China With Japan And Australia. As Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice concludes a trip that brought her to Latin America and Australia, the New York Times (3/19, Weisman, 1.19M) keys on relations with China, reporting, "Rice held talks on Saturday with Japan and Australia to deepen a three-way regional alliance aimed in part at balancing the spreading presence of China." State Department Spokesman Sean McCormack is quoted as saying, "The tenor of the discussion was how to make China a positive force in the region."

In its coverage, the Washington Times (3/19, Kralev, 90K) notes that the triad "discussed China's 'aggressive' buying of energy assets in Africa and Latin America, the first time China's 'energy diplomacy' has been examined at an official international forum." Rice "and the foreign ministers of Japan and Australia…were unable to agree on steps to address the issue." McCormack reportedly "said the meeting had not been a 'finger-wagging' anti-China session, but he acknowledged that Beijing's dealings with problematic states -- whose actions are often referred to the UN Security Council, where China has veto power -- were part of the discussions."

The AP (3/19, Gearan) focuses on more mundane details like the length and breadth of Rice's travels, reporting that she "is flying around the world -- and then some. Whether she breaks a record by a Secretary of State will have to wait for a thoughtful assessment free of jet lag." The AP goes on to note, "For a woman who habitually rises at 4:30 a.m. to exercise and bounds into her office two hours later, Rice's trip had a relaxed feel. Rice actually played the tourist for the first time in her 14-month tenure as the top US diplomat. She took in a boxing match and several swimming events at the Commonwealth Games in Melbourne, Australia, near the end of the trip. She hung medals around the necks of three Australian swimmers and chatted with swim star Ian Thorpe. She looked like she was having fun."

Hungry China Taps World Metals Markets. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Lee, 958K) reports, "China's voracious appetite for metals is convulsing the world. It has led to economic booms in some nations and crime waves in others by so-called urban miners who steal metals from houses and public buildings. China's runaway economy needs the metals to build railroads, office towers, cars and appliances." As the "world's biggest consumer of copper, lead, zinc, iron ore, steel and aluminum," China's "hunger has boosted mineral-rich nations, from copper-laden Chile to Australia, which has vast iron deposits. Prices of new and used lead, copper, nickel and other metals have tripled or more in the last few years, triggering a worldwide scramble for the commodities."

Modernity Slowly Reaches Isolated Muslim Enclave Deep Within In China. The New York Times (3/19, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "The most recent census found 513,000 Dongxiang people in China," the majority of whom live in and around Dongxiang County. "Of the 25 townships in the county, 19 do not have a single Chinese person. Most people do not speak Chinese, and some...have only a vague notion of China, despite living in the middle of it. The geographic isolation has helped preserve an Islamic culture, as well as an ancient language, but it has also separated the Dongxiang people from the prosperity lifting other parts of China. The Dongxiang, one of China's 56 officially recognized ethnic minorities, are now among China's poorest and most illiterate people." But "as everywhere in China, modernity is seeping up the winding roads to the county's larger settlements and beckoning many younger people. In the county seat, Suonanba, cellphones, blue jeans and Internet cafes arrived several years ago. So did Chinese building contractors, cigarettes, alcohol and food not prepared to Islamic code."

Taiwanese Rally For Freedom From China. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Magnier, Ting-i, 958K) reports, "President Chen Shui-bian on Saturday called on Taiwan to resist China's bid to annex the island as tens of thousands of people took to the streets protesting Beijing's growing military threat. 'Our future will never be decided by the 1.3 billion people of China,' Chen told supporters in front of the presidential office building. 'Taiwan is an independent sovereign state, and its future should be determined by its 23 million people. Taiwanese people oppose annexation and invasion.'" According to the Times, "The rally, with the slogan, 'Protect democracy, oppose annexation,' was held to mark the passage of a controversial law in Beijing last year that threatens to use force if Taiwan declares independence."

Candidate Would Focus On The Practical. In a related story, the Washington Post (3/19, A19, Cody, 744K) reports, "Ma Ying-jeou has always loved to run marathons, and he has approached politics the same way." When interviewed "last week, Ma pledged that if he won the next presidential election, in 2008, as widely expected, he would shift Taiwan sharply away from the confrontational, pro-independence policies followed by President Chen Shui-bian. A Nationalist government under his leadership, he declared, would seek neither unification with nor independence from China, focusing instead on practical improvements in cross-strait relations while maintaining the status quo of Taiwanese self-rule." Ma is quoted as saying, "When I talk about these things, I say, 'Let's forget about unification and independence. ... Let's maintain the status quo and concentrate on the economy."

Anger "Spills Over" As Ex-Hostages Blocked From Seeking Iran Damages. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (3/19, A1, Kessler, 744K) reports, "At an emotional meeting this month at the State Department, steps from the office of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a group of former American hostages released by Iran a quarter of a century ago, accompanied by lawyers and some relatives, confronted two of Rice's most senior aides. The families' grievance: Why has the Bush administration, which has labeled Iran one of the world's most dangerous regimes and has called the hostages American heroes, fought their efforts to win damages for their ordeal from the Islamic republic?" Although US officials "express sympathy" for the former captives, "the administration has thwarted every effort in the courts or in Congress to win a monetary judgment against Iran, even as other victims of Iranian-linked terrorism have secured hundreds of millions of dollars in compensation." The Post continues, "Those attending the March 2 meeting said that" Undersecretary R. Nicholas Burns "and legal adviser John B. Bellinger III tried to keep the discussion civil but that anger spilled over. The wife of a former hostage exclaimed at one point: 'You are bloodless!' The meeting broke up with Burns acknowledging the difficulty of the issues and saying he would be open to further discussions."

Iran Releases Prominent Dissident. The Washington Post (3/19, A16, Vick, 744K) reports, "Iran's most prominent dissident emerged from prison looking far older than his 46 years. His clothes hung on a frame reduced to 108 pounds by repeated hunger strikes. He smiled through a beard grown to the bushy nimbus of a Hindu holy man. 'All the time I was in prison was illegal,' Akbar Ganji said of the six-year sentence he served for exposing the government's role in assassinating its critics. 'From the very first day it was illegal.'"

The New York Times (3/19, Fathi, 1.19M) notes, "He did not make any formal comments to reporters. His lawyer, Youssef Mowlai, said he told Mr. Ganji that he first needed to recuperate from the continuing effects of the hunger strike." The timing "came as a surprise. A judiciary official had said Thursday that Mr. Ganji would not be released until March 30, and a statement by the judiciary on Saturday said Mr. Ganji was on leave for Nowruz, the Iranian New Year."

Policy Of Preventing Iran Nuclear Development Questioned. In an analytical piece, the New York Times (3/19, Sanger, 1.19M) asks, "If all other options are worse, could the world learn to live with a nuclear Iran?" President Bush's "message to Iran these days sounds unambiguous: The United States will do what it takes to keep the mullahs from getting the bomb. Diplomacy is vastly preferred, President Bush and his aides insist. Yet it was no accident that the just-revised National Security Strategy declares: 'This diplomatic effort must succeed if confrontation is to be avoided.'" The Times goes on to report, "The debate is likely to play out for much of the year, based on a series of guesses about Iran's true intentions, and its capabilities. ... But getting this right requires projecting what happens to America, Israel and Europe, especially if Iran's power to send the price of oil skyrocketing is enhanced by the confidence that a nuclear arsenal can bring."

Egyptian Woman Thought To Have Died Of Avian Flu. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 8, 5:20, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "Health officials are reporting what may be the first human death from" avian flu "in Egypt. A woman died after contracting the virus from contaminated chicken.

The concern in this country is warmer weather may bring the virus closer to home."

Experts Believe Migrating Birds Will Bring Avian Flu To US. NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 8, 5:20, Bazell, 9.87M) reported, "Scientists expect new countries to report infections in birds with the new virus almost every day now. The reason, the spring migration of birds is underway now." Experts say "it will almost certainly arrive in birds in the US, probably crossing into Alaska and then into the lower 48 states. The US poultry industry is already preparing, keeping most birds indoors in strict isolation." Michael Leavitt, Secretary of Health and Human Services: "It would only be a crisis if we saw humans getting the virus from domestic flocks or some other course. Even that is able to be handled unless it starts passing from person-to-person."

Hamas Proposes Single-Party Cabinet, Abbas Likely To Approve. The New York Times (3/19, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "The militant Islamic group Hamas said Saturday that it had completed its lineup for a new Palestinian cabinet and would present it Sunday to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, for his approval. An aide to Mr. Abbas said he was likely to give his approval. 'Our cabinet is ready,' Ismail Haniya, the Hamas leader and prime minister-designate, told a news conference in Gaza City," though he declined to "provide names of the cabinet nominees. ... No other Palestinian political parties have announced their intention to participate despite Hamas's invitation to join." According to the Times, "The crucial question now is whether Mr. Abbas will support the Hamas-led cabinet. If he rejects it, his decision could lead to a political crisis, and Palestinian law is not clear on how it would be resolved."

The Los Angeles Times (3/19, King, 958K) adds, although "the group refrained from formally announcing its Cabinet lineup pending its presentation to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas," Hamas officials "said key positions would go to Hamas loyalists such as firebrand Mahmoud Zahar, who has been designated foreign minister. Other senior appointees include lawmaker Said Siyam, who is considered a relative moderate, as interior minister, and economics professor Omar Abdel Razeq, who was jailed at the time of January's parliamentary elections, as finance minister."

Gaza Chafes Under Economic Hardships. The Washington Post (3/19, A12, Wilson, 744K) reports, "The main trade passage between the Gaza Strip and Israel has been closed for much of the year, despite an agreement brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in November that required Israel to 'ensure the continued opportunity to export.' Israeli security concerns, heightened by Hamas's parliamentary victory in January and the almost daily rocket fire from Gaza, have rendered the deal largely moot." The Post continues, "Unreliable trade passages, frozen Israeli tax transfers that helped pay salaries and lapsed permits of Palestinians who work in Israel are evidence of a broader disengagement, one that Israeli security officials say they hope to accelerate once Hamas installs its cabinet this month."

Atmosphere Tense As Belarus Votes, Protests Planned. As Belarus votes in a presidential election amid accusations of fraud and fears of violence, the New York Times (3/19, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "The results of the election on Sunday, widely denounced [at home] and abroad as undemocratic, are a foregone conclusion. But the vote is only a prelude to the real struggle against [Belarussian President Aleksandr] Lukashenko's government, one that many fear could end in violent reprisals along the monumental streets of Minsk, the capital."

In its coverage, the Los Angeles Times (3/19, Murphy, 958K) notes, "In Belarus, President Alexander G. Lukashenko has a stake in giving democracy a black eye: The US government is spending more than $9 million a year here on attempts to develop a sophisticated political opposition and a well-informed electorate, tools for combating one of the most repressive dictatorships in the world." Yet voters will "go to the polls today for an election that is widely expected to hand Lukashenko...a third five-year term."

The Washington Post (3/19, A20, Finn, 744K) adds, "Dissent carries a real price in this country of 10 million people, sandwiched between the European Union and Russia, where Lukashenko has ordered that no one other than Lukashenko can be called 'president.' ... Opposition activists say students who step out of line often receive failing grades or face trumped-up disciplinary charges that lead to expulsion from school. State workers, who commonly have one-year contracts, are routinely dismissed if they question the president's rule. Political activists are arrested and sometimes beaten. Independent newspapers are shut down or lose an entire edition to police seizures."

Students Protesting Labor Law Clash With Police In Paris. NBC Nightly News (3/18, lead story, 2:30, Mendenhall, 9.87M) reported, "In the largest day of protests so far, more than a half million people in dozens of states violently denounced the French government. Tens of thousands descended on Paris throwing bottles, torching cars and clashing with police. Mainly students, the protesters say a proposed job law aimed at reducing unemployment would leave them with few rights and the kind of job security that the French…expect." One out of "four French youths is unemployed. The main reason is labor laws make it so difficult for employers to fire employees they don't hire in the first place. Under economic pressure, the government of Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin says the new law would give employers more flexibility. Students, backed by the French public, young and old, aren't buying it."

ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 7, :15, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "One note from overseas, violence broke out in France today as some 500,000 people took the streets to protest a labor law. In Paris, riot police fired tear gas and rubber bullets as marchers set fires, smashed windows and stormed a McDonald's."

In its coverage, the New York Times (3/19, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "A number of public figures joined in, including the mayor of Paris, Bertrand Delanoe; the Socialist party leader, François Hollande; a former culture minister, Jack Lang; and the Communist Party leader, Marie-George Buffet." The Washington Post (3/19, A12, Moore, 744K) adds that "as the hours-long parade drew to a close in the chill of the early evening darkness, several hundred protesters turned on police at the Place de la Nation in the southeastern part of the city, throwing stones, garbage and sticks at riot police who huddled behind protective shields. Demonstrators smashed windows, burned a car and set a pile of boxes ablaze." The Washington Times/AP (3/19, Charlton) also covers the story.

Dutch Muslim Convert's Experiences Indicate Growing Religious Rift. The Washington Post (3/19, A21, Moore, 744K) reports, "Rabi'a Frank sees her Dutch home town through the narrow slit of the black veil that covers her face. The looks she receives from the townspeople are seldom kindly." Her "day-to-day struggle for acceptance on the streets of her home town is one woman's confrontation with a deepening rift in West European societies, where the emergence of a 15 million-member Muslim minority is reshaping concepts of national and personal identity. Some European governments have passed laws they say are intended to help preserve national identity. Critics argue that the measures reflect Islamophobia and fears of terrorism triggered by the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the subsequent transit bombings in Madrid and London." Frank is quoted as saying, "Sometimes I make a joke and say, 'Oh, you don't have to be scared of me.'"

Waves Of African Immigrants Still Flocking To Spain. The New York Times (3/19, Mclean, 1.19M) reports, "Spain's deputy prime minister began an emergency visit to the Canary Islands on Saturday to discuss ways to control a record flow of African migrants arriving in boats from Mauritania that has led to at least 25 deaths in the last week. The Spanish government says more than 1,000 migrants have been detained at sea in the last 10 days while trying to reach the islands from Mauritania on North Africa's western coast, a voyage of 500 miles. The migrants, mostly sub-Saharan Africans, crowd into boats carrying dozens of passengers in hopes of reaching the islands and thereby gaining entry to the European Union."

US Navy Ships Engage Pirates Off Coast Of Somalia. ABC World News Tonight (3/18, story 4, :20, Avila, 8.78M) reported, "US Navy warships fired on a boat of would-be pirates near Somalia. The Navy says two of its ships were attacked when sailors tried to board the suspect boat. Naval gunners fought back, and setting the boat on fire and they say, killing one of the bandits."

NBC Nightly News (3/18, story 5, 1:00, Kotb, 9.87M) reported, "The suspected pirates were in a fishing boat armed with a rocket propelled grenade. The US ships are in that region to protect commercial traffic which has been targeted in recent months."

The New York Times/AP (3/19, Press) reports, "The battle started about 25 miles off the Somali coast when the American warships Cape St. George and Gonzalez spotted a 30-foot fishing boat towing skiffs and prepared to board the vessels. The suspects were holding what appeared to be rocket-propelled grenade launchers, the Navy said. When the suspects began shooting, naval gunners returned fire with mounted machine guns." The Washington Post (3/19, A17, Gugliotta, 744K) quotes Navy spokesman Cmdr. Jeff Breslau as saying that the pirates frequently go after "targets of opportunity. They'll take over fishing or merchant vessels, then head back to territorial waters where they demand a ransom."

Congolese Warlord Will Be Tried By ICC. The New York Times (3/19, Simons, 1.19M) reports, "A Congolese militia leader accused of abducting children and turning them into soldiers and sex slaves has become the first suspect to be delivered to the new International Criminal Court, the chief prosecutor announced Saturday. The former warlord, Thomas Lubanga, arrived at the court's detention center in The Hague late Friday after being flown here on a French military plane, the prosecutor said. Mr. Lubanga had been imprisoned since last year in Congo, whose authorities handed him over to the court for trial."

Despite Growth Of Terror, Study Says Conflict Decreasing Worldwide. New York Times (3/19, 1.19M) op-ed contributor James Traub writes, "We live in a world that is objectively more dangerous than the one we knew at the outset of the millennium; whatever our disagreements, since 9/11 both our foreign policy and our domestic politics have pivoted around this ineluctable fact." But does everyone face these greater dangers? "The answer, it seems, is no. ... According to 'Human Security Report 2005,' a study that relies on this recent scholarship, the number of armed conflicts has been dropping steadily since the end of the cold war. Major civil wars, which exploded around the world between 1946 and 1991, declined sharply in the ensuing decade. Indeed, the trend holds true for virtually every category of conflict — coups, interstate wars and even genocides and so-called politicides, in which political belief rather than ethnicity is the criterion for killing. The only exception is international terrorism — as we know all too well."

TERRORISM NEWS:

From left and Right, doubt on Wiretaps (MJS)

By Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 18, 2006

But Feingold's call for censure of President won't fly

Washington - While most senators recoiled last week from Wisconsin Democrat Russ Feingold's resolution to censure the president, many of them agreed with one of its basic premises: that the wiretapping of Americans without a warrant is against the law.

Doubts about the legality of the government's once-secret domestic surveillance program can be found among both liberal and conservative scholars and on both sides of the aisle in Congress.

In other words, unlike his proposal for censure, Feingold's claims about "illegal wiretapping" are well within the mainstream of congressional debate on the issue.

But critics of the censure resolution make two very different arguments about those claims.

One is an unqualified assertion of the program's legality, offered by the Bush administration and on the Senate floor last week by Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, a Republican.

The other doesn't go nearly that far. In dismissing the notion of censure, some senators argue not that the wiretapping is necessarily legal, but that the question is unanswerable for now, either because too little is known about the program or because the courts haven't put the big constitutional issues to rest.

Chief among them: whether a 1978 law against warrantless domestic wiretapping is trumped by the president's inherent constitutional powers as commander in chief.

Did Specter agree with Frist that the wiretapping is legal?

"I neither agree nor disagree. I do not know," said Specter, who in that spirit introduced a bill Friday that would require the government to seek legal approval for its surveillance program from a special foreign intelligence court established in the late 1970s.

Specter said Friday that he's taking a "middle ground" between those who claim the program is legal and doesn't require a change in the law or judicial review, and those, like Feingold, who claim it's flatly illegal.

Of Frist's claim of legality, Specter said, "Senator Frist is not a judicial official."

Of Feingold's claim of illegality, Specter said there are too many unknowns about how the program works, and "I certainly think you ought not castigate the president as a criminal until you do know the answers to those questions."

Feingold, who sits on both the judiciary and intelligence committees, rejects that argument.

"I don't think there will ever be any additional information that is going to make this more legal," Feingold said at a news conference last week.

Then he proceeded to offer the legal case against the National Security Agency's surveillance program, which is intended to monitor calls between the United States and a foreign country that involve al-Qaida suspects.

Argument number one: that the program is in clear conflict with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which makes it a crime to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant from a court.

On this point, Feingold has plenty of company. Specter himself called the program a "flat violation" of the 1978 law on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Feb. 5.

Argument number two: that the Bush administration is wrong when it claims that the warrant requirement in the 1978 law was superseded when Congress passed a resolution in 2001 authorizing the president to use "all necessary and appropriate force" against those responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made that case when he testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Feb. 6.

"That's been laughed out of the halls of Congress," Feingold said last week, and not many lawmakers have endorsed the administration's view on this point.

The Republican Specter told Gonzales that his argument "defies logic and plain English." South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham told the attorney general that his reasoning was "very dangerous." Graham said when he voted to authorize force against al-Qaida in 2001, "I never envisioned that I was giving to this president or any other president the ability to go around (the 1978 law) carte blanche."

But the debate over the legality of the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping also turns on a third question that is more divisive among lawmakers and in the legal community: whether the 1978 law's requirement for a warrant is outweighed by a president's "inherent" constitutional powers as commander in chief.

How clear is the law?

This question was batted around by the legal experts who testified before Specter's committee late last month. They debated not only whether the surveillance program is legal or illegal, but also whether the law itself is gray or black-and-white in this area.

Yale Law School Dean Harold Koh told the Senate panel that the eavesdropping program is "as blatantly illegal a program as I've seen."

Koh, a liberal scholar who served under President Clinton, said the program lacked the basic standards required under the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Two conservative legal scholars also told the panel the program was illegal, though they disagreed over whether it was a close call.

"This case is very easy," said Bruce Fein, a former Reagan administration official, who cited a landmark 1952 Supreme Court ruling involving the government's seizure of a Youngstown, Ohio, steel mill. In that case, Justice Robert Jackson held that presidential authority is at its high point when it's used in concert with congressional authorization, but that it's at its "lowest ebb" when it's "incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress."

Another conservative scholar, Robert Levy of the Cato Institute, agreed that Bush's inherent powers don't allow him to ignore the 1978 surveillance law. Levy called the eavesdropping program "illegal" but also called it a difficult question.

President's powers defended

Among those defending the program's legality at the hearing was Robert Turner of the University of Virginia's Center for National Security Law.

Turner said the control of foreign intelligence is "at the core of executive discretion," and that regardless of the 1978 law, "I don't think Congress could take away the president's independent powers."

Douglas Kmiec of Pepperdine University Law School also asserted the constitutionality of the government's actions. Kmiec, who served under President Reagan and the first President Bush, said the administration's legal arguments regarding both inherent powers and the 2001 use-of-force resolution were "plausible."

"Reasonable minds can differ on this question," Kmiec said.

Spectrum of opinion

In the Senate, minds clearly do differ. Much of the Democratic minority and at least one Republican (Rhode Island's Lincoln Chafee) agree with Feingold that the spying program is against the law. Some Democrats are more agnostic on the question. Among Republicans, there also appear to be two prevailing views. One group believes the program is legal. Another has doubts or questions that it hopes to resolve by passing legislation, putting the matter before the courts, or both.

Graham, the South Carolina Republican, warned Gonzales last month that the "inherent powers" argument "seems to have no boundaries when it comes to executive decisions in a time of war" and could be used to "almost wipe out anything Congress wanted to do."

In an interview last week, Graham said he disagreed with both of the administration's main legal arguments in defense of warrantless spying.

But at the same time, he contended that the "law in this area is unsettled" and said, "This idea of censuring the president really throws politics into the middle of a good, healthy debate."

Feingold said last week he decided to offer the censure resolution after sitting through several judiciary and intelligence hearings, listening for "reasonable legal arguments," and not hearing any.

He called the "inherent powers" argument very weak. And in an interview on the "Charlie Rose Show" on PBS Friday, Feingold said he is afraid the Supreme Court may view the issue as a political conflict between the other two branches and never take it up.

"If you just leave this up to the judiciary, what you're doing is giving up Congress' role," Feingold said. "Why wouldn't we assert our role, our constitutional role, which is that we make the laws?"

Slain Al Qaeda Leader Leaves Testament To Violence (WT/AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

CAIRO -- The slain leader of al Qaeda in Saudi Arabia vowed in his final testament that his group would overthrow the royal family and stage more attacks against the kingdom and Americans in the region, according to a video released yesterday.

The video showed Fahd Faraaj al-Juwair wearing a white head scarf and robes as he read his will in front of a map of Saudi Arabia with the slogan, "Expel the infidels from the Arabian Peninsula." Elsewhere in the video, he appears smiling, wearing a red T-shirt and what appears to be a belt of explosives.

Addressing the Saudi royal family, al-Juwair said, "If you know what the youth are preparing for you, you would be rushing to escape this peninsula."

The video was sent to the Associated Press in an e-mail. In it, al-Juwair also warned the Americans: "Get out of Muhammad's peninsula, get out of all Muslim lands, stop supporting the Jews in Palestine, halt supporting Christians in Muslim lands, or else you'll have nothing but killing, destruction and explosions."

Al-Juwair was reported killed by Saudi security forces along with four other leading militants in a Feb. 27 raid in the capital, Riyadh. The raid was launched in the wake of an al Qaeda attack on the Abqaiq oil complex, the largest oil-processing facility in the world.

The e-mail accompanying the video confirmed his death, with the phrase, "May God accept him as a martyr," and identified al-Juwair as the former head of al Qaeda's branch in the kingdom and as the supervisor of the attack on Abqaiq.

The authenticity of the e-mail, signed by "The Voice of Jihad for Media Production," could not be independently confirmed.

In the video, al-Juwair addressed Saudi police who have been pursuing militants, urging them to join al Qaeda's jihad, or holy war.

"What are you going to tell God when you kill a holy fighter in defense of the Americans, or if you are killed while you are defending the despots?" he asked. "Stop working for the oppressors and join the mujahedeen."

Al Qaeda militants launched a campaign of violence in 2003 in Saudi Arabia, the birthplace of group leader Osama bin Laden. Saudi security forces have carried out a heavy crackdown since, killing or capturing most of the group's leaders.

The Feb. 24 suicide bombing on Abqaiq was the first attack on Saudi Arabia's vital oil infrastructure. The kingdom is the world's largest producer of oil.

Bombers in two explosives-laden vehicles tried to ram through the facility's gates, but were stopped by guards who opened fire on them, detonating the vehicles.

Judge In Moussaoui Trial Faces A Delicate Task (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Deciding when attorney who 'tainted' witnesses will testify while keeping jury intact are her foremost concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0018825

WASHINGTON — With the sentencing trial for Zacarias Moussaoui stumbling forward again, lawyers for the two sides were sharply at odds Saturday over when a government attorney would testify about why she tried to influence witnesses.

The coaching efforts by Carla J. Martin nearly shattered the prosecution's effort to have Moussaoui receive the death penalty for his role in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Defense lawyers want Martin on the stand as soon as Monday in the trial over whether Moussaoui, 37, should be executed or sentenced to life in prison.

Prosecutors want to delay Martin's appearance until the middle of the week and have her testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment against self-incrimination.

"We see no reason" to have Martin take the stand "simply to have [her] invoke her rights," prosecutor Robert A. Spencer said in court papers.

In the middle of the dispute is Judge Leonie M. Brinkema.

Clearly irked by the revelations about Martin early last week, Brinkema has made no secret of her view that the lawyer with the Transportation Security Administration may end up with criminal or civil sanctions for attempting to coach several witnesses.

But Brinkema also is trying to keep together a jury that has been left in the dark over the developments in the case — the only one to be tried in the U.S. that stems from the 2001 attacks.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to plotting with the hijackers. The government contends he should be put to death because he failed to alert the FBI to the plot, which resulted in the deaths of almost 3,000 people.

"I'm fully aware of how important it is for this matter to become resolved," the judge told the prosecution and defense teams in a teleconference session late Friday. "I'm fully aware of the huge resources that have been expended on this case, the fact that we summoned 850 jurors, that we have an excellent jury of 17, and I agree that it would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward …."

One week into the trial, Brinkema abruptly stopped it Monday when word surfaced that Martin had attempted to influence witnesses from the transportation agency and the Federal Aviation Administration. Martin briefly appeared in court on Tuesday but declined to testify and was excused until she could find legal representation.

Her newly hired lawyer, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., has since said she was eager to testify but needed some time to prepare.

"She is entitled to a fair opportunity to prepare and present her side and a fair judgment of her intentions, her conduct and the conduct of others," Howard said.

Brinkema first banned from the trial all testimony and evidence about aviation security because of Martin's action. But the judge scaled back her ruling Friday, allowing prosecutors to present one or two witnesses on the issue who were not "tainted" by Martin.

For prosecutors, that decision drew new breath into their case for the death penalty for Moussaoui.

They had told jurors they would prove that, had the French citizen cooperated with the FBI upon his arrest on an immigration violation in August 2001, the government would have tightened airport security across the country. Those measures, prosecutors said, could have prevented hijackers from making it onto the airplanes used in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said in court papers that he wanted Martin on the stand after he finished cross-examining FBI Special Agent Harry Samit on Monday morning, which is where the trial left off when it was postponed.

He said she should be the next witness before the prosecution brought in any "untainted" witnesses on aviation security because her testimony would provide "critical information" about the nature of the witness-tampering effort.

Ashcroft: Cooperation's Key In Fight Against Terror (AP)

By JESSICA GRESKO, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, March 19, 2006

MIAMI GARDENS - Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft said Saturday that he does not believe the threat of terrorism has passed and that the United States must work with other countries to combat it.

DOJ_NMG_0018826

In an hour-long talk as part of a conference on economic crime, the nation's former top law enforcement officer also discussed the importance and challenges of prosecuting financial crime and the emphasis after the 2001 terrorist attacks on "prevention over prosecution."

"As we fight against terror . . . We need to remind ourselves of the necessity and value of being extremely cooperative with individuals of other nations and in other settings," Ashcroft said.

Ashcroft also drew laughs with some self-deprecating remarks. He also joked that the crowd of approximately 200 students, professors and attorneys at St. Thomas University School of Law would not have to remember anything he said.

"The good part about this lecture is that none of it will be on the quiz or the final," he said.

Not mentioned as part of his speech was the pending case in Miami against alleged terror suspect Jose Padilla, who was arrested almost four years ago while Ashcroft was attorney general. Announcing Padilla's arrest in June 2002, Ashcroft said he had planned to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the United States, charges not mentioned in the current case. Padilla's trial is expected to begin in September.

Ashcroft left the attorney general's office in early 2005 and was succeeded by Alberto Gonzales. He is now a professor at Regent University in Virginia Beach, Va.

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Games Poke Fun At Government (AP)

By Wayne Parry

HAMILTON, N.J.

In this send-up of "Monopoly," players don't pass "Go" and they don't go directly to jail _ they go to Guantanamo Bay.

Instead of losing cash for landing on certain squares, they lose civil liberties. And the "Mr. Monopoly" character at the center of the board is replaced by a scowling former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

"Patriot Act: The Home Version" pokes fun at "the historic abuse of governmental powers" by the recently renewed anti-terrorism law, according to its creator's Web site.

But while it may be fun, creator Michael Kabbash, a graphic artist and Arab civil rights advocate, is serious about how he feels the law has curtailed Americans' freedom.

The object of the game is not to amass the most money or real estate, but to be the last player to retain civil liberties.

"I've had people complain to me that when they play, nobody wins. They say `We're all in Guantanamo and nobody has any civil liberties left,'" he said. "I'm like `Yeah, that's the point.'"

The real Patriot Act, passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks and renewed earlier this month, gave law enforcement new investigative and prosecutorial powers. Critics say it unacceptably impinges on civil liberties, but the government defends the law as a vital tool that has helped prevent another terror attack.

Kabbash decided to keep Ashcroft as the visual focus of the game, even though he stepped down in January 2005, because "he really is the icon that people associate with the Patriot Act."

In a nod to President Bush's prewar comments, the "Go" space in is renamed "Bring It On!" Players roll the dice to determine how many civil liberties they start out with, accumulating them from a variety of categories: U.S. citizens get 5; non-citizens 1. Whites and Asians get 5; Arabs 1. Ultra right-wingers get 6; Democrats 3 or 4.

Instead of landing on, say Oriental Avenue, players land on a color- coded spaces corresponding to the national terror alert. A player who lands on a red space loses one civil liberty, as does anyone else within five spaces. A player who lands on an orange space gets to designate another player to lose one civil liberty.

"Chance" cards are now "Homeland Security Cards," with orders such as, "FBI wants you for questioning; Lose one turn;" and "You provide the local authorities with speculative information on your next door neighbor; Collect one civil liberty from each player."

Kabbash, of Green Brook, created a few full board sets but is also distributing the game free over the Internet, with the game board and playing cards all printable. More than 2,000 copies have been downloaded since it debuted in 2004.

"I wanted it to be not only a parody but a teaching tool," said Kabbash, 38, who teaches graphics at the College of New Jersey. "This is my way of putting my political ideas forward, hoping people will wake up. There's a lot of apathy, and we have to realize that we're in a democracy, that we're all allowed to say something."

Ashcroft had no comment on the game when asked about it Saturday during a crime conference in Miami Gardens, Fla., but he laughed when told "jail" had been replaced with Guantanamo Bay. U.S. Justice Department public affairs did not immediately return a call Saturday seeking comment.

Kabbash says his next project will probably have something to do with the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program. He is reasonably certain "there's a file on me somewhere."

Asked if the FBI keeps a file on Kabbash, a bureau spokesman refused to comment.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Cabinet Drilled On Response To Smallpox (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 18 — Cabinet secretaries participated in a drill on Saturday that simulated a smallpox attack as the government tested plans to counter the potential use of bioweapons by terrorists.

"The purpose of this exercise, which was only a drill, was to address the federal government's response to a potential smallpox attack," said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman. "While there's concern, we do not have any concern that a smallpox attack is imminent."

The World Health Organization reported the disease was eradicated in 1980. Still, there are fears that smallpox may be used by terrorists as a biological weapon.

The United States ended routine childhood vaccination against smallpox in 1971. But after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, the Bush administration ordered some military personnel vaccinated and recommended shots for some health care workers.

Officials from various government agencies, including Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, participated in the four-hour exercise. Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Michael O. Leavitt , the health and human services secretary, were among the cabinet members who were part of the drill.

Montgomery Homeland Security Unit's Scope Challenged (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

When it comes to defending the homeland in suburbia, Montgomery County stands alone.

The county's 15-month-old Homeland Security Department, national experts say, is the only such agency to maintain uniformed officers apart from its local police force. The 60-person unit is charged with being the eyes and ears of a small but growing homeland security apparatus.

County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) wants to increase the department's $5 million budget by 20 percent in the next fiscal year, in part to provide the officers -- most of whom work unarmed -- with pepper spray and body armor. But after an incident last month in which a homeland security officer told public library patrons that they couldn't view Internet pornography, some County Council members are questioning the size and role of the department and its security unit.

"I'd probably advise the next county executive not to have a Department of Homeland Security," said council President George L. Leventhal (D-At Large). "We don't want them swaggering around trying to figure out whether Osama is in the house at the Little Falls library."

Jurisdictions across the country have reorganized in reaction to the post-Sept. 11 era and the creation of the federal Department of Homeland Security. Part of the motivation was to make sure they didn't miss out on millions of dollars in federal funding.

Fairfax County has a Homeland Security Committee made up of senior officials. Prince George's County has an Office of Homeland Security. And the District's Emergency Management Agency plays a coordinating role in homeland security efforts.

None approaches the scale of Montgomery's department, which Duncan began pushing for in late 2004 to "boost the security of our homeland and ensure more coordination within county government."

The council concurred, although it initially resisted moving the security division from Public Works and Transportation into the new agency. Duncan won a council majority for the move during budget deliberations early last year.

"We've taken what should be a small unit and made it much larger than it needs to be," council member Marilyn Praisner (D-Eastern County) said last week.

Controversy surrounding the library incident might also be swelling. The county has informed the Homeland Security Department officer involved that it intends to suspend him without pay for three days because of his conduct. The officer, Ralph Gerharz, recently hired lawyer Robin Ficker, a Republican candidate for county executive, to represent him during disciplinary proceedings.

Montgomery officials contend that Gerharz did not maintain decorum or conduct himself in a professional manner Feb. 9 when he and a fellow officer entered the Little Falls library in Bethesda, Ficker said.

After Gerharz saw adult male patrons viewing explicit pornography on library computers, Ficker said, he told the men that displaying such images was a violation of the county's sexual harassment policy and asked one to leave the library with him to discuss the matter. Other patrons and librarians intervened, and an argument ensued. One librarian felt Gerharz was becoming "abusive" and called police, according to a county report of the incident.

"He was being very authoritarian -- throwing his weight around," said Asher Hyatt, a retired scientific administrator who was volunteering at the library that day.

Gerharz "was offended, and he tried to do something about it and it got a little bit out of hand," Ficker acknowledged. He said the county is making Gerharz a "political fall guy" and failing to address the underlying issue: how to control the display of pornographic materials where children might see them.

Montgomery's policy governing Internet use in public libraries says librarians "will intervene to ensure compliance with state law" and prevent minors from accessing obscene materials, including child pornography. The policy also says that librarians will call police if they believe an adult patron is accessing child pornography.

County officials have condemned the actions of Gerharz and an officer in training who witnesses said stood silent. "What they did was wrong, and I do not condone in any way, shape or form their behavior," Duncan said last month.

Immediately after the library incident, security officers were trained in the need to respect the constitutional rights of library patrons and reminded that their role is to secure and protect county facilities and personnel but not to enforce laws or policies, said Homeland Security Director Gordon Aoyagi.

Aoyagi said county officials moved the security division from the Department of Public Works and Transportation into Homeland Security last year to better integrate the division's officers into the county's emergency response systems.

But he conceded that there was no budget for training.

Duncan's proposed budget increase includes $102,000 to pay for security officer instruction. Gino Renne, president of United Food and Commercial Workers Local 1994, which represents the officers, said the training and additional equipment were funded in part because of pressure from the union.

Advance Workers For Bush Impersonated Reporters (WP)

By Christopher Lee

DOJ_NMG_0018829

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

The White House said yesterday that it will discipline two government employees who masqueraded as journalists this month while scouting locations for a presidential visit to the Gulf Coast.

A Mississippi couple whose home was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina said two men who later identified themselves as Secret Service agents pretended to be Fox News journalists when surveying their neighborhood in advance of a March 8 visit from President Bush.

The men arrived on March 3 at the site of the beachfront home that Jerry and Elaine Akins are rebuilding in Gautier, Miss., Elaine Akins said in a telephone interview yesterday.

"They didn't show any cards or anything," Akins said. "They just came up and said they were with the media, and then they said they were with Fox. They just talked to us and asked us about rebuilding our house. Then, after everything was over with, they approached us and they were laughing, and they said: 'You know, we really weren't with Fox. We're government, Secret Service men.' "

Ken Lisaius, a White House spokesman, said the employees were out of bounds.

"This incident has been brought to our attention, and this is clearly not appropriate, nor is it part of our standard operating procedures," he said. "The individuals involved will be verbally reprimanded."

Tom Mazur, a spokesman for the Secret Service, said he did not know who the men were but they were not Secret Service officials.

"I checked with our people down there in Mississippi who were involved in the advance, and it was not Secret Service people who identified themselves as members of the media," Mazur said. "We wouldn't do that."

Asked whether he could confirm where the employees worked, Lisaius simply reiterated his earlier statement. The incident was reported in yesterday's editions of the Biloxi Sun Herald.

Akins said the men were friendly and looked around the home site for about 20 minutes. The following Wednesday, Bush flew to the small, working-class town. He appeared with Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R) outside the Akins home to call attention to federal efforts to aid in reconstruction.

"Our job and our purpose is to help people like the Akins rebuild," Bush said.

The men eventually revealed their identities and displayed blue lapel pins bearing the presidential seal. Akins said she does not mind that the men temporarily misled her about their identities.

"What could they do?" she said. "They couldn't walk up and tell us who they were, because then we would have been a lot more suspicious about the president coming."

"We didn't know" about Bush's visit "until about an hour before the president actually got there," she added. "I think they handled it great."

Louisiana Faces An Exodus From The Coast (WP)

By Cain Burdeau

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

LAFITTE, La. -- Once the salt water is in your veins, Louisiana's coastal folk say, it's hard to give up the lifestyle of moonlit shrimping trips, the town "fais do-do" dances and afternoons spent on the bayous angling for catfish. But since last year's catastrophic hurricanes, this swampy land defined by Cajuns, cypress and tupelo gum forests, bayou-side saloons and, more recently, subdivisions may have become too vulnerable for that lifestyle to continue.

Even before the devastation caused by Katrina, Louisiana's swampy coast had been sinking by as much as 2 inches a year. Along with that subsidence, the area is even more susceptible to flooding because last year's hurricanes damaged vast tracts of wetlands _ already shrinking because of man's activities _ that used to buffer the area from storms blowing in off the Gulf of Mexico.

All of those factors will be reflected in new Federal Emergency Management Agency flood-vulnerability maps due to be released soon that are the basis for flood insurance rates.

The maps will likely make the insurance more costly, force residents to spend heavily to raise homes out of flood plains to qualify for coverage, make many other homes uninsurable and make lenders less willing to loan money for construction in flood-prone areas.

That new reality may threaten the state's coastal population and its heritage of shrimp fishing, alligator hunting, fur trapping and oyster harvesting.

Some of the roughhewn people down here won't leave willingly.

"You've got earthquakes, you've got fires, you've got volcanoes, you've got tornadoes in tornado alley," said A.J. Fabre, an outspoken leader among shrimp fishermen in Lafitte, about 30 miles south of New Orleans. "Where are you going to have everybody? In Missouri?"

Nearly every house in the area, most of them built on slabs, was flooded by Hurricane Rita. Now, families live in trailers as they rebuild.

"It's a quiet community. Virtually no crime. Kids steal a couple of bicycles," Fabre says.

But the future is gloomy. Fabre's place, a small brick house he inherited from his grandfather, has been condemned because of wind and flood damage. The only thing left of a shrimp processing plant there is a concrete slab, and the old family dock is barnacled, broken and useless.

With no flood insurance, Fabre isn't sure if he'll be able to rebuild. He and his wife might have to demolish the place and buy a mobile home.

He insists he is not defeated and lashes out at politicians, importers, the federal government.

"The fight has just begun," he said.

But many of his neighbors and friends aren't so sanguine.

"We're doomed," said Jimmy Terrebonne, a 46-year-old boat builder. He tells his children to get an education and get out of the fishing trades.

As for himself, he said, "I can't do anything else. I don't have an education. I ain't leaving until it's gone. When the land's gone, I'm leaving."

Many coastal experts believe life along the coast is going to change dramatically with the new flood maps.

"Where we had subdivisions in the marshes, they will not come back," said Shea Penland, a coastal scientist with the University of New Orleans. "I can't believe they're sustainable."

"There are going to be some significant changes across the board," said Butch Kinerney, a FEMA spokesman.

For one thing, much more is known since FEMA last calculated the area's flood vulnerability in 1984 about the area's rate of subsidence.

Last year, the National Geodetic Survey issued a report saying the area was sinking by a half-inch to 2 inches a year, and that was as of 1995.

"When they built the levees, it wasn't below sea level. It was dry land. Now it's dry land only because of the levees," said Roy Dokka, a Louisiana State University subsidence specialist.

About 1,000 homes damaged by Rita's storm surge in the heavily Cajun region southwest of Lafayette called Vermilion Parish might need to be raised to be eligible for insurance, said Robert LeBlanc, the parish's emergency preparedness director.

Younger people might leave, LeBlanc said.

Many others, however, are determined to stay.

"People like where they live, they're content," said Kimberly Chauvin, the wife of a shrimper who is thinking of raising their already-raised home up to 10 feet higher. "I wouldn't want to move to the city, not at all."

New Orleans Assesses Bureaucratic Tradition (LAT)

By Sam Quinones

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

It has seven property assessors whose jobs are virtually inherited. But an upcoming election and the 'I Quit' slate could end that.

DOJ_NMG_0018831

NEW ORLEANS — The upcoming election here will attract national attention as residents vote on who will lead their reconstruction.

But beneath the hullabaloo is an obscure, less riveting issue that advocates of change say could be just as big a step in helping the city reinvent itself.

Now is the time, they say, to revamp the city's antiquated system of property assessment, a system that some view as wasting money and encouraging cronyism.

For more than a century, New Orleans has had seven elected property assessors — each with their own staff and responsibility for a separate district — to assess the city's 164,000 parcels. The system is unique in Louisiana and is believed to be like no other in the country.

Los Angeles County, in comparison, has one elected assessor, whose staff assessed value on 2.6 million properties last year, the office's website says.

New Orleans assessor jobs have been handed down from father to son and husband to wife; one seat has been in a family since 1904.

"We have a screwy, curious, historically developed property-assessment system," said Shaun Rafferty, a local attorney who is leading the nascent movement to overhaul the assessor system. "We've kind of tolerated it. But the hurricane has caused everybody to reanalyze everything."

Since Hurricane Katrina, a new political activism has replaced the city's long-standing complacency. Many people here see the hurricane as a rare chance to discard an outdated system and begin renovating New Orleans' image as a backwater of corruption and inefficiency that left the city vulnerable before the storm.

The assessor system "didn't have anything to do with the emergency response" to Katrina, said Paul Cordes, another lawyer seeking to revamp the system. "But the general fragile nature of our city government — this is the bedrock of it."

Riding the wave of change, a group of lawyers and businessmen have qualified a slate of assessor candidates — known as the I Quit Ticket — for the April 22 city elections.

The candidates — who all hope to be listed on the ballot with the nickname "IQ" — vow to lobby for legislation allowing voters to approve consolidating their offices into one, and resign en masse when that happens. Their resignations would force a special election of a single assessor.

"Everybody felt it was chasing after windmills to take on the assessors," said Bill Aaron, a former city attorney now in private practice and an I Quit Ticket board member. "Now, with Katrina, all bets are off."

Still the issue shows how slowly change can come here, even after hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

A bill to allow a vote on consolidating New Orleans' seven assessors into one failed 8-6 in a state legislative committee last month. Among those opposing it were two legislators whose brother and father, respectively, are New Orleans assessors.

New Orleans has what critics contend are layers of redundant government that it can no longer afford, given its greatly reduced population and budget.

For example, Orleans Parish, whose boundaries are essentially the same as the city's, has a criminal sheriff, a civil sheriff and a coroner — positions that many counties combine in one job. There are several court clerks, each with separate staff, handling the job one court clerk does in most counties.

But the best example of duplication and waste, they say, has been the assessors. Several studies have suggested that consolidating the offices under one appointed assessor would lead to sustainable city financing, and make assessing more accountable, predictable and efficient.

"Every other parish gets by with one," said Janet Howard, of the Bureau of Government Research, a nonpartisan think tank that has studied the system and advocated changing it. With assessor salaries and retirement benefits, New Orleans pays more than $700,000 a year for an assessor, Howard said.

"Even with seven assessors, the job doesn't get done," she said, in part because the money that should pay to modernize and hire appraisers goes to the assessors' salaries. The offices are understaffed and employ people with insufficient training.

The result has been a patchwork of inconsistent assessments for comparable properties. "The only people who are actually paying the taxes are new home buyers" who get their homes reassessed when the sale goes through, said Aaron, the former city attorney. "A lot of the wealthy people are not paying the taxes they should be paying and a lot of the middle-class people are actually bearing the tax burden."

The Times-Picayune newspaper investigated the system in 2004 and found assessments 41% below market value. In response, the Louisiana Tax Commission found that owner-occupied homes in the city were assessed at least 25% below market value. Last year, the commission ordered the New Orleans assessors to reassess all their residential housing — a task they had embarked on when Katrina hit.

Uneven assessments, critics say, have created taxpayer distrust, lawsuits, a culture of corruption and shaky city finances.

Erroll Williams, the 3rd district assessor, doubts that consolidation would save much money. The New Orleans system is poorly funded compared with others around the state, he said, and "you can't save money when you're under-funding it." Moreover, he said, now is no time to change the system because the storm threw property assessment into chaos.

Also, Williams said, one assessor "could be corrupting. If you change it to one assessor in New Orleans, he's going to anoint the mayor. He could influence who becomes your councilmember, your state rep."

But that's exactly what the system now breeds, critics say.

Staying in office for years, assessors develop relationships with their constituents, which promotes lowering assessments as political favors.

"There doesn't need to be this personal relationship with your assessor," said Arthur Sterbcow, president of Latter & Blum, the region's largest real estate firm, in New Orleans, and an I Quit Ticket board member. "That's a thinly veiled way to say, 'Come see me. We'll work out a deal.' "

The success of the I Quit Ticket depends on the election of all seven of its candidates. (The group is appealing a court order that would prevent the candidates from being listed on the ballot with the "IQ" nickname.) The Legislature must also approve putting the idea of a single assessor before voters during its spring session, which runs from March to June.

Until voters approved the consolidation, he said, the candidates would use their salaries to hire professional appraisers to do the job.

The I Quit Ticket will test Orleanians' commitment to revamping the bureaucracy, Cordes said, because changing the assessor system probably would increase assessments for some of the town's wealthiest families.

"With Katrina, we can reproduce a model city," he said. "This assessor thing is a huge building block in that. It's not the apparent problem, but it is the tumor deep within that needs to be removed."

Storied Church May Be Victim Of Katrina (WP)

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

St. Augustine, Founded in 1841, Is Called Vital Link to Culture of New Orleans

NEW ORLEANS -- Parishioners at one of the nation's oldest African American Catholic churches may have celebrated their last Mass as a parish last Sunday, even as they continued their efforts this week to keep the doors open at St. Augustine.

The church, in the Treme neighborhood near the French Quarter, is a center of racial harmony and great jazz, playing a central role in New Orleans history and culture. With so much of the city devastated by Hurricane Katrina, local residents are rallying behind the church and hoping the parish can be saved.

"The people of New Orleans have lost so much; we don't want to lose this," said Sandra Gordon, 52, a church volunteer who has been coming to St. Augustine since 1965, when Hurricane Betsy destroyed her former church.

In the face of a much-reduced city population and physical damage to many churches post-Katrina, the Archdiocese of New Orleans is closing seven parishes and delaying the reopening of 23 churches. Attendance at St. Augustine, down to fewer than 200 people pre-Katrina, increased significantly afterward. But archdiocese officials said current attendance is not enough.

The church sustained about half a million dollars' worth of damage to the roof and bell tower from Katrina, and it was already hurting for money for a needed renovation.

Like New Orleans itself, St. Augustine is an eclectic mix of the ancient and the contemporary, black and white, song and dance. The church was built in 1841 by slaves and by Italian and French immigrants.

It was one of the first churches where slaves, free blacks and whites worshiped together. After a period as a segregated white church and then a black church, it has had an interracial congregation and services that blend elements of Catholicism with African spirituality and homegrown New Orleans culture. Portraits of the African American "Mardi Gras Indians" are displayed side by side with saints on the walls, and the church is known for popular jazz masses and jazz funerals, including an annual "Louis Armstrong Jazz Mass."

Archdiocese spokesman William Maestri said the 250 parishioners registered at St. Augustine will have access to more classes and social services by joining the 8,000-member parish at St. Peter Claver, another Catholic church a few blocks from St. Augustine with a predominantly African American congregation.

He said St. Augustine's parish was recommended for closure in a 1999 study: "We've kept the parish open and subsidized it long beyond the recommendation."

The church would still remain open for weddings, funerals and weekly Masses. But parish priest Jerome LeDoux, a beloved local figure, would no longer minister there.

St. Augustine members said they would miss LeDoux, 76, an African American vegan musician who speaks several languages and has charmed visitors from around the world with his energetic, multicultural services.

"You can't overstate how important St. Augustine's and Father LeDoux are to the African and Creole tradition of the city," said Morgan Clevenger, former executive director of the New Orleans Jazz Legacy Foundation. "Father LeDoux has always acknowledged the black Indians, the social pleasure clubs, the jazz of New Orleans. He acknowledged the spirituality of African people before Catholicism. The loss of Father LeDoux would be a grave loss to the community."

Economist Jacques Morial said the archdiocese should keep subsidizing the parish based on its historical and cultural importance. He is the brother of former mayor Marc Morial, and their family goes back nine generations in New Orleans.

"We need the archdiocese to reconnect itself to the souls and lives of people who need it most, not just the people who have money," Jacques Morial said.

Music Landmark Caught In Tug Of Priorities After Storm (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, March 16 — The doors of the deserted Milne Boys Home flap open in the wind, and anyone who cares to brave the dank interior here in the heart of the drowned Gentilly neighborhood can find crumbling logbooks noting who visited in the early 1900's and yellowing sheet music in the attic.

A bronze plaque on the weather-beaten facade announces that Milne is "A Landmark of American Music," but it hardly looks the part, taking its place among the city's once-grand buildings ruined by floodwater after Hurricane Katrina.

Nonetheless, what happens to this 11-acre campus of wide lawns and oak trees is of more than casual interest to many people here because of its ties to Louis Armstrong, arguably this city's most famous native son.

Before Milne was built in the 1930's, part of it was called the Colored Waif's Home for Boys, the institution where Armstrong was incarcerated at age 11 after firing a pistol to celebrate New Year's Day 1913. It was there that he learned to play the cornet.

Armstrong is but one of a host of noted jazz musicians to train at the Colored Waif's Home, and later at Milne, to which he was a friend throughout his life.

In a city that long ago demolished Armstrong's birthplace, along with Storyville, the neighborhood where early jazz developed, and the original waif's home, Milne stands as one of the last physical connections to the city's musical past, and many wonder if it will have a place in the new city. Other than the landmark plaque placed by a national music group, it was hardly noted in the old one.

"You might say this is the second, if not the third, opportunity to do something with a Louis Armstrong site where the opportunity has been missed," said Bruce Boyd Raeburn, curator of the Hogan Jazz Archive at Tulane University here. "A lot of the old jazz sites have been torn down to make new parking lots."

Mr. Raeburn added, "The track record on preserving jazz-related sites is pretty dismal for New Orleans."

Yet this is a city that is probably more dependent on the marketing of jazz than any other, as tourism is one of the few engines of the local economy. In an acknowledgment of that, the city renamed its airport after Armstrong in 2001. But when asked about the cultural importance of the Milne site, the city official overseeing arts and entertainment said he did not know much about it. Mayor C. Ray Nagin's office did not return calls for comment.

In the chaos of dealing with an acute housing shortage, a coming mayoral election and tens of thousands of displaced residents, city officials have had little energy or resources to deal with issues like the arts or historic preservation.

But it is precisely at times like these, local activists say, that pieces of the culture slip away — especially in areas like Gentilly, where mostly modest homes line quiet streets that in feeling and geography are miles away from better known destinations like the French Quarter and the Garden District.

"It certainly is a chance once again for a rebuilt New Orleans to seize an opportunity that in the past it did not seize, and to actually help its own cause," said Lee Hampton, executive director of the Amistad Research Center, an archive for the history of African-Americans and other ethnic groups, at Tulane. "Certainly I think it would be worth preserving and worth the effort put into upkeep. I think it could actually repay the city in its interest to outsiders, to tourists."

Long neglected, Milne was not in pristine shape before the storm and had not housed children since the 1980's, becoming instead the setting for after-school social service programs and athletics. The home, not far from the London Avenue Canal, which breached the levees in two spots, flooding Gentilly and surrounding neighborhoods, had capacity for 80 boys before it closed as a residence.

The home was named for a Scottish philanthropist, Alexander Milne, who arrived here in the late 1700's and provided money for the care of troubled children in his will after making a fortune in bricks and hardware.

"The problem with the city now is, where do we place our priorities?" said Tad Jones, a local historian and co-producer of the annual Satchmo Summer Fest, a celebration of Armstrong's music. "Since we're not getting much direction from the city or the feds, all the local homeowner associations in Gentilly and around the lake are coalescing and talking about how to revitalize the neighborhoods. That's a good thing and a bad thing because we're not all on the same page."

Over the decades, not everyone in solidly middle-class Gentilly has been thrilled about having a haven for troubled youth in the area. Some wanted Milne done away with years ago. Others want to see it come back just as it was, as a scaled-down social service and recreation center. Still others want at least part of it to be a memorial to Armstrong and a reminder of what can happen when a poor child gets a chance at a better life.

"Louis Armstrong is the poster child for that," Mr. Raeburn said.

Officials said the city was negotiating with the Federal Emergency Management Agency to determine how much federal money might be available for the site. The city holds a 99-year lease on the property from the Milne Trust, a private foundation. Part of the complex has been gutted, and the roofs are protected by blue tarp.

Armstrong was born to a teenage mother in a neighborhood so notoriously dangerous, even by New Orleans' rough port-town standards, that it was called "the battlefield." He was largely abandoned by his father and dropped out of grade school, and entertained people by singing and dancing for change around the brothels of Storyville.

He occasionally got into trouble with the police, but around Storyville, he also got to hear the likes of Buddy Bolden and Jelly Roll Morton, pioneers of early jazz.

Peter Davis, the music teacher who invited Armstrong to play in the waif's home band, retired from Milne in 1949 and died in 1971.

Armstrong wrote about Mr. Davis in his memoir, "Satchmo: My Life in New Orleans."

"Every day I practiced faithfully on the lesson Mr. Davis gave me," Armstrong wrote. And later: "All in all, I am proud of the days I spent at the Colored Waif's Home for Boys."

Richard Winder, director of the city's Department of Human Services, which controls the site, said that these days, "We're in limbo."

"We don't know where we are, post-Katrina," Mr. Winder said.

Still, as a former superintendent of the home, he could not imagine losing Milne. "Those worries should be removed down the line," he said, "once we get some normalcy in this city."

WAR NEWS:

Bush: 'Fighting And Sacrifice' Needed (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

On the eve of the third anniversary of the Iraq invasion, President Bush today promised to "finish the mission" with total victory, urging the American public to remain steadfast but offering no indication when victory might be achieved.

"More fighting and sacrifice will be required," Bush said in his weekly radio address. "For some, the temptation to retreat and abandon our commitments is strong. Yet there is no peace, there's no honor and there's no security in retreat. So America will not abandon Iraq to the terrorists who want to attack us again."

Bush's address comes at a time when confidence in the administration's Iraq strategy appears to have reached all-time lows. A Washington Post-ABC News poll this month found that 65 percent of Americans surveyed thought Bush had no plan for victory, while 35 percent -- the lowest level ever recorded by the poll -- said he did.

Bush used the radio address to draw attention to a series of speeches he is giving this month to rally support for the Iraq war. Last week the first of these focused on efforts to train Iraqi troops and success at mitigating the threat of terrorist bombings and casualties caused by the explosion of roadside "improvised explosive devices."

A White House "Fact Sheet" on Iraq that accompanied the radio address noted that casualties from the explosive devices had been halved in the past 18 months and that nearly half of the devices are being found and disabled before they can be detonated.

The fact sheet also buttressed the president's assertion last week that Iraqi security forces were assuming greater battlefield responsibility. The fact sheet said that "Iraqi forces now conduct more independent operations throughout the country that do Coalition forces."

Democrats noted last week, however, that a recent Pentagon report said the number of "level one" Iraqi units capable of operating independent of the United States had dropped from one to zero in recent months.

And for the most part, the fact sheet ignored the missteps and false starts that have dogged the Iraq war since the invasion in March 2003 and instead contrasted Iraq under Saddam Hussein with Iraq today.

Three years ago, the fact sheet said, "life in Iraq was marked by brutality, fear and terror," and Iraqis "had no voice in their country or their lives." Today, by contrast, "the reign of terror has been replaced by a democratically elected government."

In his radio address Bush noted that sectarian violence plagues Iraq, but urged Iraqis to "reach across political, religious and sectarian lines," to convert December's democratic elections into a "government that can confront the terrorist threat and earn the trust and confidence of all Iraqis."

"These past three years have tested our resolve," Bush said. "The enemy has proved brutal and relentless . . . and our troops have shown magnificent courage and made tremendous sacrifices" which, along with Iraqi sacrifices, had given Iraq a "historic opportunity" to rebuild itself.

"The security of our country is directly linked to the liberty of the Iraqi people," Bush said. "We will settle for nothing less than complete victory."

Bush: Violence Creating Urgency In Iraq (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, March 19, 2006

President Bush on Saturday braced Americans for more bloodshed in Iraq but said recent civil strife has motivated warring political factions to move quickly to set up a representative government.

"Our ambassador to Iraq, Zal Khalilzad, reports that the violence has created a new sense of urgency among these leaders to form a national unity government as quickly as possible," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

"I urge them to continue their work to put aside their differences, to reach out across political, religious and sectarian lines, and to form a government that can confront the terrorist threat and earn the trust and confidence of all Iraqis."

Bush's broadcast came in advance of a speech he plans to deliver in Cleveland on Monday, the second in a series of talks marking Sunday's three-year anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. In the speech, Bush will discuss how the United States is working with various sectors of Iraqi society to defeat terrorists, restore calm and help rebuild homes and communities.

The president said victory in Iraq will come when terrorists and loyalists of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein no longer threaten Iraq's democracy, when Iraqi security forces can ensure safety for citizens and terrorists can't call Iraq home.

"More fighting and sacrifice will be required to achieve this victory," he told listeners.

Democrats are calling on Bush to provide more leadership to unify fighting political sectors in Iraq and prevent the nation from spiraling into civil strife. The Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite mosque and subsequent violence led to the deaths of hundreds of people and pushed the country to the brink of civil war between rival Muslim sects.

According to the latest AP-Ipsos poll, more than three-fourths of Americans, 77 percent, say they think a civil war is likely in Iraq. Seventy percent of Republicans and 90 percent of Democrats felt that way. People are evenly split on whether they think a stable, democratic government will be formed in Iraq, according to the poll taken in early March.

Bush has said that as Iraqi security forces step up, U.S. troops will be able to stand down. But critics of the administration's handling of the war say that the Iraqis must be told that the American military will not be in Iraq forever, and they must realize that the eventual pullout will be on U.S., not Iraqi, terms.

"We need the president to urgently exercise the leadership necessary to bring Iraq's political factions together," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., said in the Democratic radio response Saturday. "In no uncertain terms, the president must immediately inform the Iraqi people that they need to get their political house in order."

Feinstein said the Iraqis need to be told that they must get a government and key ministries up and running, that they need to quickly secure their streets by ramping up the deployment of a viable police force, and they must reconcile differences between Sunnis and the Shia.

"Iraqis must know that we will exit on our terms, not theirs," she said.

Bush's speeches — a total of three this month and possibly more in April — would be similar in tone to a series of talks he made in December to help turn public opinion on the war in his favor. In those talks, he combined steely resolve with frank acknowledgments that mistakes have led to changes in U.S. strategy.

The president said that, in Ohio on Monday, he would provide concrete examples of how U.S. strategy in Iraq is succeeding.

"In recent weeks, Americans have seen horrific images from Iraq: the bombing of a great house of worship in Samarra, sectarian reprisals between Sunnis and Shias, and car bombings and kidnappings," Bush said.

"Amid continued reports about the tense situation in parts of that country, it may seem difficult at times to understand how we can say that progress is being made," he said. "But the reaction to the recent violence by Iraq's leaders is a clear sign of Iraq's commitment to democracy."

Iraq's True Cost Continues To Grow (HC)

By BOB DEANS, Cox News Service

Houston Chroncile, March 19, 2006

The bottom line includes a staggering death toll among troops and civilians, Pentagon spending at $6 billion a month and damage to U.S. credibility

WASHINGTON - Three years after President Bush launched the invasion of Iraq, the war grinds on amid escalating costs — in lives, money and U.S. influence abroad.

Saddam Hussein and his repressive regime are no longer in power and democracy has taken some important, if shaky, first steps.

Iraq has a "hopeful future," Bush said, despite the problems there.

"We will finish what we started in Iraq," the president said in a speech. "We will complete the mission."

But sectarian violence verges on civil war. More than 130,000 troops remain in Iraq. And the toll on Iraq and the United States is far beyond anything the administration prepared Americans for in the lead-up to the March 19, 2003, invasion.

The war has divided the United States, set it at odds with friends and rivals alike abroad, and dominated an often-ugly national political debate. Three years on, the costs continue to mount.

According to Pentagon figures (as of March 15), 2,310 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since the launch of the invasion. Of those, 1,808 were killed in combat and 502 died from accidents, illnesses or other causes.

Another 17,124 American troops have been wounded. Of those, 9,212 were returned to duty within 72 hours. The rest had more serious wounds, including about 400 who have lost an arm, leg, hand or foot.

The figures do not include American civilians killed or wounded in Iraq while working for the U.S. government, private businesses and non-governmental aid organizations.

There are no independently verifiable estimates of the number of Iraqi soldiers killed during the first several weeks of the war, and no official estimates of civilian casualties.

Bush recently estimated the Iraqi dead at somewhere near 30,000.

A London-based human rights group called Iraq Body Count estimates that at least 33,638 Iraqi civilians have been killed as a result of the war and up to 37,754 may have died, based on the group's independent tabulation of deaths confirmed in media reports.

The number includes civilians killed by insurgent attacks as well as operations by U.S. and coalition forces.

The U.S. taxpayers' tabAmericans have spent $250 billion on military operations and reconstruction efforts in Iraq, a war that is currently costing the Pentagon roughly $6 billion a month, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

This spending does not include so-called fixed costs that are part of Pentagon spending — such as pay for the troops — but accounts for only the direct war costs, such as bonus pay for combat operations, as well as fuel, munitions and other war-related expenses.

The war's true price tag, however, will include expenses not included in this reckoning, particularly the long-term costs of providing lifetime health care to soldiers wounded in the war or suffering from mental health issues related to the conflict, recurring expenses certain to range in the billions of dollars per year.

Nor do these costs include the interest on the additional debt incurred to finance the war.

"There will be tail costs," said U.S. Comptroller General David Walker, head of the Government Accountability Office, a congressional agency that oversees federal spending. "There will be costs that will be coming down the road."

Billions of dollars in tanks, aircraft, communications gear and other military equipment has been worn out, destroyed or given to new Iraqi forces during the conflict. "

Some replacement funds are included in the Pentagon's current spending. But military officials say billions in additional spending will be needed to bring inventories of critical gear back up to pre-war levels.

U.S. image abroadAs bloodshed and destruction have mounted, the war has undercut America's image among other countries around the world.

"After the war in Iraq, the image of the United States plummeted in most countries and has only recovered in a few," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center, a nonpartisan opinion monitoring group in Washington.

Bush led the country to war on the claim that Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons and was working to reconstitute earlier efforts to build a nuclear weapon. No stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction were found, nor has evidence of a viable nuclear weapons program surfaced. Bush has said the intelligence he received in the lead-up to the war was faulty.

Those failings have undercut U.S. efforts to press for international sanctions against Iran, which is pursuing a nuclear program that Bush fears could produce weapons, and for diplomatic pressure on nuclear-minded North Korea.

A Sliding Scale For Victory (LAT)

By Doyle McManus

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

As the conflict in Iraq enters its fourth year and civil war threatens, the Bush administration is again working to lower expectations.

WASHINGTON — Three years ago, as they ordered more than 150,000 U.S. troops to race toward Baghdad, Bush administration officials confidently predicted that Iraq would quickly evolve into a prosperous, oil-fueled democracy. When those goals proved optimistic, they lowered their sights, focusing on a military campaign to defeat Sunni-led insurgents and elections to jump-start a new political order.

As the conflict enters its fourth year today, the Bush administration faces a new challenge: the prospect of civil war. And, in response, officials again appear to be redefining success downward.

If Iraq can avoid all-out civil war, they say, if Baghdad's new security forces can hold together, if Sunni Arabs, Shiites and Kurds all participate in a new unity government, that may be enough progress to allow the administration to begin reducing the number of U.S. troops in the country by the second half of this year.

In increasingly sober public statements — and in slightly more candid assessments from officials who insisted that they not be identified — the administration is working to lower expectations.

"It may seem difficult at times to understand how we can say that progress is being made," President Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address, acknowledging that much of the recent news from Iraq has been bad. "But … slowly but surely, our strategy is getting results."

"We may fail," said a senior official directly involved in Iraq policy. "But I think we're going to succeed. I think we're going to nudge this ball down the road…. It's not going to be easy, and it's going to take time."

The more sober tone is not entirely new; officials, from Bush on down, have tacitly acknowledged for more than a year that trying to stabilize Iraq is proving more difficult than they expected when they launched the war in 2003.

But independent foreign policy analysts say they see signs of a more fundamental shift in the administration's position — a creeping redefinition of U.S. goals in Iraq that increasingly allows for the possibility that the nation may remain unstable for years to come.

"It isn't going to be perfect," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said last month. "It isn't going to be pretty. It isn't going to look like the United States of America. It's going to be an Iraqi solution politically, and Iraqi solution economically and an Iraqi solution from a security standpoint."

"Initially, we were going to stay until the insurgency was defeated," noted James F. Dobbins, a former special envoy under Presidents Clinton and Bush. "About a year ago, we amended that in a fairly important way by saying we were going to stay until the Iraqi government and its army and police were capable of coping with the insurgency. We redefined victory in terms of the Iraqis' capability instead of the defeat of the insurgency."

"Now even that measure of success has proven elusive," said Dobbins, who is now with Rand Corp. "At this point I think we would be content if we could diminish our presence, allow the Iraqis to simply hold their own against the insurgency and prevent the country from rupturing into an even more serious civil war than the one that now exists."

The violence between Sunni and Shiite Arabs in recent weeks, which increased after the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, touched off what one official called "a moment of fear" within the administration — a sense that events in Iraq could spiral beyond any measure of U.S. control.

In the aftermath of the bombing, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said, "We have opened the Pandora's box…. There is a concerted effort to provoke civil war."

And Rumsfeld, asked whether U.S. forces would intervene in an intra-Iraqi conflict, said, "The plan is to prevent a civil war, and to the extent one were to occur … from a security standpoint, have the Iraqi security forces deal with it to the extent they're able to."

Before the recent violence, U.S. military officials said they hoped to reduce the number of troops in Iraq from about 130,000 to about 100,000 over the year. Officials said last week that the violence could slow the U.S. drawdown but that they still expected some troop reduction to occur.

The good news, Rumsfeld and other officials noted, was that U.S.-trained Iraqi security forces did not disintegrate, and Iraqi political leaders, particularly in the Shiite community, quickly intervened to stop the violence from escalating further.

But the senior official said the U.S. strategy of nurturing a unity government and building multi-ethnic Iraqi security forces was still dangerously vulnerable.

"Sectarian violence … is not going down as [quickly] as we would like to see," he said. "A surge further in sectarian violence, way below what I would call a civil war, is still enough to really threaten what we're trying to do there, because it strengthens the militias, it strengthens the radicals, it weakens the security forces."

The most important immediate step, President Bush and other officials said, is for Iraqi politicians from all three major communities to form a unity government. "I urge them … to form a government that can confront the terrorist threat and earn the trust and confidence of all Iraqis," Bush said Saturday.

But that is proving difficult. Sunni and Kurdish leaders are unhappy with the decision by the Shiite bloc, the largest in the new parliament, to reelect Ibrahim Jafari for the post of prime minister. U.S. officials are unhappy with the choice, too; many of them consider Jafari incompetent and divisive. The result, at least in the short run, has been a political deadlock.

"They have to step up to the plate," the senior official said, reflecting the administration's frustration with the Iraqi leaders. "They cannot just sit aside and press their short-term interests."

Unless a unity government succeeds, said a civilian advisor to the Pentagon, "you are heading for a de facto independent Kurdistan, a Shia Iraq that is very close to the Iranians and a Sunni Iraq which is rebellious in perpetuity."

One of the major goals of U.S. policy in Iraq has been to avoid choosing sides. But that goal may be slipping away, outside analysts said.

"In a sense, as your own forces diminish, you have to choose sides," Dobbins said. "We may be forced to do that. We already have to some degree."

"The Sunnis already see us as having chosen sides," said Steven Biddle, a former professor at the U.S. Army War College who is at the private Council on Foreign Relations.

Biddle has argued that by building new Iraqi security forces dominated by Shiites and Kurds, the United States in effect has armed and trained two of the sides in the Iraqi conflict. The Sunnis, he wrote in a recent article, "perceive the 'national' army and police force as a Shiite-Kurdish militia on steroids."

"I think we're in a civil war now. We've been in a civil war for more than a year. It's just a civil war that's being fought at low intensity," he said in an interview.

Instead of trying to build Iraqi security forces quickly, Biddle argues, the United States should slow down its training program, slow its own military withdrawal, and concentrate on strengthening political leaders — especially among the Sunnis — who can make compromises.

But Biddle acknowledges that there is no political support in the United States for a longer or larger troop deployment.

"If we had the troops, I'd increase the troops," he said. "But we don't have the troops."

Administration officials say that waning U.S. public support for the war has become one of their major concerns, if only because Iraqis on all sides increasingly wonder how long the Americans will stay.

A poll released last week by the Pew Research Center found that public support for keeping U.S. troops in Iraq had reached its lowest point since the 2003 invasion. Half of the respondents said they wanted to bring U.S. troops home as soon as possible, compared with 44% who said the troops should stay "until the situation is stabilized."

Reflecting the increasingly partisan cast of the issue, Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, in the Democratic response to Bush's radio address Saturday, called on the president to give the Iraqi government more responsibility for security "so our troops can responsibly be redeployed."

"The administration's dangerous incompetence has made the job harder," she said.

A former senior official said that he did not expect political pressure to affect Bush's decisions on Iraq this year but that the 2008 presidential election could be a different story.

"There is deep concern in the White House that 2008 will be a referendum on Iraq," he said. "I don't think the president will be affected by the congressional elections. But in 2007, at some point, does he say, 'I'm going to do what's right, no matter what the political consequences?' Or does he say, 'We gave the Iraqis every chance; we can't want a successful Iraq more than the Iraqis want it?'

"Leaving Iraq in its current state would be a very serious strategic setback for us," he said. "It would be a defeat. We can dress it up. We can try to recover from it. But it's a defeat."

The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)

By Nina Kamp, Michael O'Hanlon And Amy Unikewicz

AS we reach the third anniversary of the start of the war, the confusion on the ground in Iraq seems to have spread to American generals' public pronouncements. Last Monday, just days after saying that pacification efforts with the Iraqis were going "very, very well," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told an audience that Iraq is "a place that is having some real difficulties right now" and that "everything is in place if they want to have a civil war." Unfortunately, an examination of trends in Iraq backs up General Pace's later, more sober comments.

The country's economy continues to disappoint. Although it had a fairly quick recovery in 2003 and early 2004, when gross domestic product was restored to Saddam Hussein-era levels, violence and instability have prevented much further progress. And while subsidies for gasoline and some other goods, which have been costing the Iraqi government about $10 billion a year, or a third of gross domestic product, have been reduced, projections that the country's economy will grow by 10 percent a year for the rest of the decade look increasingly suspect. Current growth sputters along at less than 5 percent despite sky-high prices for oil exports. Most utilities (except telephones and Internet services) are still performing below Baathist-era levels. Unemployment remains very high.

Politically, Iraqis have been stalemated in forming a new government since the impressive Dec. 15 elections, primarily over issues like ensuring fair distribution of Iraq's oil revenue and devising ways to reintegrate lower-level former Baathists into society. This political inertia reinforces the widespread Sunni Arab sense of estrangement. And it contributes to remarkably high levels of Sunni Arab approval for violence against coalition troops (almost 90 percent) and even against their own government.

Paradoxically, most of what good news there has been this winter is on the security front. American troop fatalities in Iraq have declined relative to last fall's typical levels. Fatalities among Iraqi security forces have also gone down, as have car bombings. Unfortunately, civilian casualties have been as high as ever and, since the Feb. 22 bombing of the Samarra mosque, sectarian violence is worse than at any time since the invasion.

All that said, according to public opinion polls, more than 60 percent of Iraqis (though very few Sunni Arabs) remain bullish on the future. And Iraqi security forces continue to improve, with far higher percentages having reached the upper half of the four-tier readiness rating system. These statistics may point to the possibility of a troop drawdown strategy for the United States — but while a strategically passable outcome still seems within reach, it is increasingly hard to believe that there are the makings of a major success for American foreign policy in Iraq.

Change Of Heartland (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, March 19, 2006

On the third anniversary of the invasion of Iraq, many Indianians are no longer strongly behind the war

SOUTH BEND, Ind. -- The third anniversary of the Iraq invasion unleashed a surge of pessimism at a local farmers' market here, where stalwart Republicans, standing amid aisles of produce and miracle cures, said President Bush has messed up a war that looks more like Vietnam every day.

"It's chaos," said Roger Madaras, who voted twice for Bush. "How many more people are going to be killed? We were going in to free the people of Iraq, but as far as I'm concerned, a lot of them are worse off today than they were under the dictatorship."

Madaras, the owner of a plumbing company, said he believed Bush when the president declared major combat to be over in May 2003, and is "disgusted" that Bush's rhetoric was hollow. And he is far from alone.

Support for Bush and his handling of Iraq is sharply eroding across the American heartland, where the overcast skies and the muddy fields of late winter matched a sense of gloom about Bush and the war.

This month, the Indianapolis Star released poll findings that Bush's approval rating among Indiana voters stood at 37 percent -- a drop of 18 points over the past year. The numbers echoed national polls, but were particularly shocking in a state that has not voted for a Democratic presidential candidate since 1964, and where Democratic presidential contenders often do not bother to campaign.

"A 37 percent approval rating in Indiana for a Republican president is unheard of," said Brian Howey, who runs a newsletter for Indiana state political insiders. "Those are Bill Clinton or John Kerry numbers in Indiana. So there is something seriously awry going on right now."

In scattered rural diners and small-town restaurants adorned with 9/11-vintage American flag posters, support for the troops remains high. But many in Indiana also say the war has not turned out the way they thought it would three years ago, and they question whether Bush has what it takes to lead the troops into a happy ending.

Standing behind the counter where she sells bird houses and seed at the farmers' market, Beverly Beisel said she is increasingly fearful that Iraq will inevitably fall apart as soon as US soldiers leave -- making a mockery of the deaths sustained until then.

"It's not going well, that's for sure," Beisel said. "I don't like that fact that we started it. I thought Bush was actually going after the terrorists, wherever they were. We thought they had weapons that they were hiding."

Beisel said she doesn't blame Bush because "he can only deal with the intelligence he was given" and still supports him because she opposes abortion. But she added that plenty of her friends think "we should get out of there and they're probably sorry they voted for him."

Drinking coffee at Louie's Café in LaPorte, Ken Schreiber, who commands respect among the regulars because he coached the local high school baseball team to seven state championships, said he doesn't understand why the administration never sent enough troops in to stabilize Iraq's security.

Schreiber said he primarily blames the "liberal media" and "partisan politics" for the president's free-falling poll numbers. But he also blames Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld for giving Bush "some bad advice" about how Iraqis would "kiss our feet" for ridding them of Hussein.

"I'm frustrated like everyone else is frustrated," he said. "It's a lingering war like Vietnam. But I still don't think it was a mistake to go in."

As more and more Hoosiers find themselves making the comparison that only liberals and antiwar protesters made a year ago -- Iraq is like Vietnam -- some say they are also starting to doubt Bush's competence to protect America from terrorism on the home front.

John Lackman, a retired manager at an aircraft wheels and brakes factory who was eating breakfast at a table near Schreiber, said the slow federal response to the Hurricane Katrina disaster last year gave many pause.

"That New Orleans situation just piled it on top of the Iraq War," Lackman said. "The security issue is paramount in everyone's mind. If they couldn't respond adequately to that situation, how are they going to respond if there's a dirty bomb?"

Others sharply disagreed, saying local officials were primarily to blame for the New Orleans disaster. But there was nearly unanimous incredulity across Indiana at Bush's support for a deal that would have put a Dubai company in charge of six US ports.

Many connected the Dubai ports row to a state controversy -- Republican Governor Mitch Daniels's efforts to lease the Indiana Toll Road to a foreign firm for the next 75 years. Support for Daniels, a former top aide to Bush, is just as low as it is for the president.

"People don't think Indiana should sell its toll road to foreigners, and they don't want someone with a turban running our ports," said Denny Thomas, a retired trucker sitting near video poker machines at the back of a smoke-filled tobacco bar in LaPorte.

Daniels, who ran in 2004 on the slogan "My Man Mitch," as Bush once referred to him, has also drawn fire for ramming through a law requiring Indiana to join the rest of the country on daylight saving time. The measure is wildly unpopular in rural areas.

Pouring coffee behind the bar of Allie's Café in South Bend, restaurant owner Chuck Sulok -- a self-declared "partisan supporter" of both Bush and Daniels -- said he fears what the "double whammy" of Bush's and Daniels's unpopularity could do in the coming election.

If Democrats can pick up 15 seats, they can retake control of the US House of Representatives for the first time since the Republican tidal wave of 1994, when the GOP picked up 54 seats. Sulok says today's atmosphere in Indiana reminds him of 1994 in reverse.

"The mid-term elections are coming and it scares me to death, speaking as a partisan Republican," he said. "There's a difference between regular dissatisfaction and a dissent that will move an election. There's that feeling in the air."

Joe Donnelly hopes Sulok's fears are well-founded. Donnelly, a local lawyer, is running for Congress against a Republican incumbent, Chris Chocola, in a rematch from 2004. He lost last time by 9 points -- but that was when the Iraq War was still young.

Donnelly said the drop in support for Bush and his handling of the war could swing the election his way, accusing Chocola of being a "rubber stamp" for the administration. Chocola, whose campaign netted $600,000 in a Bush-headlined fund-raiser in February, did not respond to an interview request.

"Truly, everyone out here wants the Iraq mission to succeed," Donnelly said. "But everyone is becoming more concerned and uncomfortable. What we need are Congress people who will ask President Bush tough questions, not be rubber stamps."

John Roos, a political science professor at the University of Notre Dame, said the dissatisfaction with Bush's record in Iraq might hand the 2006 election to Democrats by persuading disgruntled Republicans across the American heartland to stay home.

"It's not that they have become Democrats, and it's not that they have decided the war on Iraq and especially the war on terrorism is wrong," Roos said. "The people of Indiana just think [Bush] is not very good at being president."

Waiting to be seated at Allie's Café, Lee Connett, a retired automotive engineer, said he wondered about the Iraq War from the beginning. He thought it seemed like a diversion from the hunt for the Al Qaeda leader, Osama bin Laden.

But he voted for Bush anyway because he couldn't stand Kerry, the Democratic nominee. Now, he said, as it becomes ever more clear that "Bush doesn't have a plan" for Iraq, he doesn't know what he should do.

"I voted for Bush in 2000 and in 2004 . . . because he seemed like the lesser of two evils as I saw it at the time," Connett said. "How could anyone know he was going to do what he's done? He's not settled anything in Iraq and we're getting no clue as to what the outcome is going to be."

All the talk lately about Bush and the problems with Iraq bemuses Susan Grimes, a waitress at the South Junction Café, a lonely outpost at the intersection of state roads 6 and 35. Grimes said listening to her customers complain has turned her off politics.

"I hear all these people come in and say: 'That President Bush, we got to get that guy out of there.' But you ask them who they voted for, and they hush up because they were the ones who voted him in. He's their boy."

Bush Using Straw-Man Arguments In Speeches (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, March 19, 2006

"Some look at the challenges in Iraq and conclude that the war is lost and not worth another dime or another day," President Bush said recently.

Another time he said, "Some say that if you're Muslim you can't be free."

"There are some really decent people," the president said earlier this year, "who believe that the federal government ought to be the decider of health care ... for all people."

Of course, hardly anyone in mainstream political debate has made such assertions.

When the president starts a sentence with "some say" or offers up what "some in Washington" believe, as he is doing more often these days, a rhetorical retort almost assuredly follows.

The device usually is code for Democrats or other White House opponents. In describing what they advocate, Bush often omits an important nuance or substitutes an extreme stance that bears little resemblance to their actual position.

He typically then says he "strongly disagrees" — conveniently knocking down a straw man of his own making.

Bush routinely is criticized for dressing up events with a too-rosy glow. But experts in political speech say the straw man device, in which the president makes himself appear entirely reasonable by contrast to supposed "critics," is just as problematic.

DOJ_NMG_0018843

Because the "some" often go unnamed, Bush can argue that his statements are true in an era of blogs and talk radio. Even so, "'some' suggests a number much larger than is actually out there," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania.

A specialist in presidential rhetoric, Wayne Fields of Washington University in St. Louis, views it as "a bizarre kind of double talk" that abuses the rules of legitimate discussion.

"It's such a phenomenal hole in the national debate that you can have arguments with nonexistent people," Fields said. "All politicians try to get away with this to a certain extent. What's striking here is how much this administration rests on a foundation of this kind of stuff."

Bush has caricatured the other side for years, trying to tilt legislative debates in his favor or score election-season points with voters.

Not long after taking office in 2001, Bush pushed for a new education testing law and began portraying skeptics as opposed to holding schools accountable.

The chief opposition, however, had nothing to do with the merits of measuring performance, but rather the cost and intrusiveness of the proposal.

Campaigning for Republican candidates in the 2002 midterm elections, the president sought to use the congressional debate over a new Homeland Security Department against Democrats.

He told at least two audiences that some senators opposing him were "not interested in the security of the American people." In reality, Democrats balked not at creating the department, which Bush himself first opposed, but at letting agency workers go without the usual civil service protections.

Running for re-election against Sen. John Kerry in 2004, Bush frequently used some version of this line to paint his Democratic opponent as weaker in the fight against terrorism: "My opponent and others believe this matter is a matter of intelligence and law enforcement."

The assertion was called a mischaracterization of Kerry's views even by a Republican, Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record) of Arizona.

Straw men have made more frequent appearances in recent months, often on national security — once Bush's strong suit with the public but at the center of some of his difficulties today. Under fire for a domestic eavesdropping program, a ports-management deal and the rising violence in Iraq, Bush now sees his approval ratings hovering around the lowest of his presidency.

Said Jamieson, "You would expect people to do that as they feel more threatened."

Last fall, the rhetorical tool became popular with Bush when the debate heated up over when troops would return from Iraq. "Some say perhaps we ought to just pull out of Iraq," he told GOP supporters in October, echoing similar lines from other speeches. "That is foolhardy policy."

Yet even the speediest plan, as advocated by only a few Democrats, suggested not an immediate drawdown, but one over six months. Most Democrats were not even arguing for a specific troop withdrawal timetable.

Recently defending his decision to allow the National Security Agency to monitor without subpoenas the international communications of Americans suspected of terrorist ties, Bush has suggested that those who question the program underestimate the terrorist threat.

"There's some in America who say, 'Well, this can't be true there are still people willing to attack,'" Bush said during a January visit to the NSA.

The president has relied on straw men, too, on the topics of taxes and trade, issues he hopes will work against Democrats in this fall's congressional elections.

Usually without targeting Democrats specifically, Bush has suggested they are big-spenders who want to raise taxes, because most oppose extending some of his earlier tax cuts, and protectionists who do not want to open global markets to American goods, when most oppose free-trade deals that lack protections for labor and the environment.

"Some people believe the answer to this problem is to wall off our economy from the world," he said this month in India, talking about the migration of U.S. jobs overseas. "I strongly disagree."

Analysis: Envoy Dives Into Iraq Diplomacy (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

Zalmay Khalilzad spends a lot of time these days in a soundproof room at the U.S. Embassy, sitting in front of television cameras and repeating a single message: Iraq must have a unity government and Americans must be patient until that happens.

The 54-year-old, Afghan-born U.S. envoy — a snappy dresser with a soft-spoken, easy demeanor — has become the increasingly effective face of the Bush administration's campaign to restore American confidence in the Iraq mission.

Yes, he will acknowledge, mistakes have been made. Yes, Iraq is beset with sectarian and insurgent violence.

But no, he insists, the situation is not hopeless. The United States must soldier on, pressing for a political solution — a democratic outcome to snuff out the savagery.

According to the U.S. argument, formation of an Iraqi government acceptable to and representative of all major ethnic and political factions would:

_Empower and legitimize the leaders of the Iraqi army and police to crush the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency in the name of all citizens, whether Sunni, Shiite or Kurd.

_Cause minority Sunnis, once satisfied they are getting a fair political shake, to turn against al-Qaida in Iraq terror cells that they have either sheltered or tolerated in their midst.

_Calm Sunni-Shiite sectarian tensions and violence as members of each community see their leaders working together to unify — rather than divide — the fractious population.

Khalilzad, born in the northern Afghan city of Mazar-i-Sharif, is unusual among his colleagues in having an instinctual ability to negotiate the tangle of Iraq's variant of Middle East politics. He understands the ways of the bazaar, the need for long talks over many glasses of tea.

And that, perhaps, accounts for his success in getting Iraq's deeply divided political leaders to sit and talk together in one room, overcoming what he calls a cultural "unwillingness" to confront each other directly on issues that concern them directly.

"Their preference seems to be to talk indirectly and to talk to intermediaries," he said.

"What is encouraging to me in recent days is that they are beginning to talk to each other and directly. It seems to me ... this has been working," he added in a recent interview.

With a sly smile, he also acknowledges a bit of subterfuge — his public call for all the major Iraqi political leaders to assemble someplace outside Baghdad for round-the-clock talks "until there is an agreement and white smoke comes out of the chimney."

A day later the politicians announced they would open face-to-face negotiations — in Baghdad.

Some of them, speaking anonymously because they feared angering Khalilzad, said his arm-twisting behind the scenes is more intense.

"While you are taking your time with a government, we (Americans) have lost lives and money. You need to hurry up," one of them quoted Khalilzad as saying.

Said another, again quoting the ambassador: "Your failure (to form a government) means failure of the whole American policy in the region, a failure for President Bush. There is a major crisis and you must hurry."

So far, however, the meetings reportedly haven't progressed much beyond talking about talks.

There have been inconclusive discussions about forming a national security council to take major decisions out of the hands of individual politicians. That would have allowed Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who faces intense opposition from Sunnis, Kurds and some fellow Shiites, to serve a titular second term with his powers much diminished.

The difficulty in forming a new government had been widely reported to center on al-Jaafari's candidacy to stay on as prime minister. But after three sessions over the past week, the politicians spoke of problems far more widespread than the dispute over al-Jaafari.

"The political crisis that is surrounding us is much deeper than that," said Planning Minister Barham Saleh, a Kurd. "There is no doubt that there is sectarian and ethnic entrenchment in the country even while politicians try to overcome that."

But Khalilzad appears, on the surface at least, unfazed by the difficulties as he urges patience from a U.S. population increasingly eager to be done with Iraq.

"These conversations have been the most serious that I have seen since I've been here in the course of the last seven or eight months," he said. "I think it will take a few more weeks."

Then would come the test of the U.S. theory that a unity government can solve Iraq's problems.

What We've Gained In 3 Years In Iraq (WP)

By Donald H. Rumsfeld

Some have described the situation in Iraq as a tightening noose, noting that "time is not on our side"and that "morale is down." Others have described a "very dangerous" turn of events and are "extremely concerned."

Who are they that have expressed these concerns? In fact, these are the exact words of terrorists discussing Iraq -- Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and his associates -- who are describing their own situation and must be watching with fear the progress that Iraq has made over the past three years.

The terrorists seem to recognize that they are losing in Iraq. I believe that history will show that to be the case.

Fortunately, history is not made up of daily headlines, blogs on Web sites or the latest sensational attack. History is a bigger picture, and it takes some time and perspective to measure accurately.

Consider that in three years Iraq has gone from enduring a brutal dictatorship to electing a provisional government to ratifying a new constitution written by Iraqis to electing a permanent government last December. In each of these elections, the number of voters participating has increased significantly -- from 8.5 million in the January 2005 election to nearly 12 million in the December election -- in defiance of terrorists' threats and attacks.

One of the most important developments over the past year has been the increasing participation of Iraq's Sunni community in the political process. In the volatile Anbar province, where Sunnis are an overwhelming majority, voter turnout grew from 2 percent in January to 86 percent in December. Sunni sheiks and religious leaders who previously had been sympathetic to the insurgency are today meeting with coalition representatives, encouraging Iraqis to join the security forces and waging what violent extremists such as Abu al-Zarqawi and his al-Qaeda followers recognize as a "large-scale war" against them.

The terrorists are determined to stoke sectarian tension and are attempting to spark a civil war. But despite the many acts of violence and provocation, the vast majority of Iraqis have shown that they want their country to remain whole and free of ethnic conflict. We saw this last month after the attack on the Shiite shrine in Samarra, when leaders of Iraq's various political parties and religious groups condemned the violence and called for calm.

Another significant transformation has been in the size, capability and responsibility of Iraqi security forces. And this is vitally important, because it is Iraqis, after all, who must build and secure their own nation.

Today, some 100 Iraqi army battalions of several hundred troops each are in the fight, and 49 control their own battle space. About 75 percent of all military operations in the country include Iraqi security forces, and nearly half of those are independently Iraqi-planned, Iraqi-conducted and Iraqi-led. Iraqi security forces have a greater ability than coalition troops to detect a foreign terrorist's accent, identify local suspects and use force without increasing a feeling of occupation. It was these Iraqi forces -- not U.S. or coalition troops -- that enforced curfews and contained the violence after the attack on the Golden Dome Shrine in Samarra. To be sure, violence of various stripes continues to slow Iraq's progress. But the coalition is doing everything possible to see this effort succeed and is making adjustments as appropriate.

The rationale for a free and democratic Iraq is as compelling today as it was three years ago. A free and stable Iraq will not attack its neighbors, will not conspire with terrorists, will not pay rewards to the families of suicide bombers and will not seek to kill Americans.

Though there are those who will never be convinced that the cause in Iraq is worth the costs, anyone looking realistically at the world today -- at the terrorist threat we face -- can come to only one conclusion: Now is the time for resolve, not retreat.

Consider that if we retreat now, there is every reason to believe Saddamists and terrorists will fill the vacuum -- and the free world might not have the will to face them again. Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis. It would be as great a disgrace as if we had asked the liberated nations of Eastern Europe to return to Soviet domination because it was too hard or too tough or we didn't have the patience to work with them as they built free countries.

What we need to understand is that the vast majority of the Iraqi people want the coalition to succeed. They want better futures for themselves and their families. They do not want the extremists to win. And they are risking their lives every day to secure their country.

That is well worth remembering on this anniversary of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

A Top-Down Review For The Pentagon (NYT)

By Paul D. Eaton

Fox Island, Wash.

DURING World War II, American soldiers en route to Britain before D-Day were given a pamphlet on how to behave while awaiting the invasion. The most important quote in it was this: "It is impolite to criticize your host; it is militarily stupid to criticize your allies."

By that rule, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld is not competent to lead our armed forces. First, his failure to build coalitions with our allies from what he dismissively called "old Europe" has imposed far greater demands and risks on our soldiers in Iraq than necessary. Second, he alienated his allies in our own military, ignoring the advice of seasoned officers and denying subordinates any chance for input.

In sum, he has shown himself incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically, and is far more than anyone else responsible for what has happened to our important mission in Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld must step down.

In the five years Mr. Rumsfeld has presided over the Pentagon, I have seen a climate of groupthink become dominant and a growing reluctance by experienced military men and civilians to challenge the notions of the senior leadership.

I thought we had a glimmer of hope last November when Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, faced off with Mr. Rumsfeld on the question of how our soldiers should react if they witnessed illegal treatment of prisoners by Iraqi authorities. (General Pace's view was that our soldiers should intervene, while Mr. Rumsfeld's position was that they should simply report the incident to superiors.)

Unfortunately, the general subsequently backed down and supported the secretary's call to have the rules clarified, giving the impression that our senior man in uniform is just as intimidated by Secretary Rumsfeld as was his predecessor, Gen. Richard Myers.

Mr. Rumsfeld has put the Pentagon at the mercy of his ego, his cold warrior's view of the world and his unrealistic confidence in technology to replace manpower. As a result, the Army finds itself severely undermanned — cut to 10 active divisions but asked by the administration to support a foreign policy that requires at least 12 or 14.

Only Gen. Eric Shinseki, the Army chief of staff when President Bush was elected, had the courage to challenge the downsizing plans. So Mr. Rumsfeld retaliated by naming General Shinseki's successor more than a year before his scheduled retirement, effectively undercutting his authority. The rest of the senior brass got the message, and nobody has complained since.

Now the Pentagon's new Quadrennial Defense Review shows that Mr. Rumsfeld also fails to understand the nature of protracted counterinsurgency warfare in Iraq and the demands it places on ground forces. The document, amazingly, does not call for enlarging the Army; rather, it increases only our Special Operations forces, by a token 15 percent, maybe 1,500 troops.

Mr. Rumsfeld has also failed in terms of operations in Iraq. He rejected the so-called Powell Doctrine of overwhelming force and sent just enough tech-enhanced troops to complete what we called Phase III of the war — ground combat against the uniformed Iraqis. He ignored competent advisers like Gen. Anthony Zinni and others who predicted that the Iraqi Army and security forces might melt away after the state apparatus self-destructed, leading to chaos.

It is all too clear that General Shinseki was right: several hundred thousand men would have made a big difference then, as we began Phase IV, or country reconstruction. There was never a question that we would make quick work of the Iraqi Army.

The true professional always looks to the "What's next?" phase. Unfortunately, the supreme commander, Gen. Tommy Franks, either didn't heed that rule or succumbed to Secretary Rumsfeld's bullying. We won't know which until some bright historian writes the true story of Mr. Rumsfeld and the generals he took to war, an Iraq version of the Vietnam War classic "Dereliction of Duty" by H. R. McMaster.

Last, you don't expect a secretary of defense to be criticized for tactical ineptness. Normally, tactics are the domain of the soldier on the ground. But in this case we all felt what L. Paul Bremer, the former viceroy in Iraq, has called the "8,000-mile screwdriver" reaching from the Pentagon. Commanders in the field had their discretionary financing for things like rebuilding hospitals and providing police uniforms randomly cut; money to pay Iraqi construction firms to build barracks was withheld; contracts we made for purchasing military equipment for the new Iraqi Army were rewritten back in Washington.

Donald Rumsfeld demands more than loyalty. He wants fealty. And he has hired men who give it. Consider the new secretary of the Army, Francis Harvey, who when faced with the compelling need to increase the service's size has refused to do so. He is instead relying on the shell game of hiring civilians to do jobs that had previously been done by soldiers, and thus keeping the force strength static on paper. This tactic may help for a bit, but it will likely fall apart in the next budget cycle, with those positions swiftly eliminated.

So, what to do?

First, President Bush should accept the offer to resign that Mr. Rumsfeld says he has tendered more than once, and hire a man who will listen to and support the magnificent soldiers on the ground. Perhaps a proven Democrat like Senator Joseph Lieberman could repair fissures that have arisen both between parties and between uniformed men and the Pentagon big shots.

More vital in the longer term, Congress must assert itself. Too much power has shifted to the executive branch, not just in terms of waging war but also in planning the military of the future. Congress should remember it still has the power of the purse; it should call our generals, colonels, captains and sergeants to testify frequently, so that their opinions and needs are known to the men they lead. Then when they are asked if they have enough troops — and no soldier has ever had enough of anything, more is always better — the reply is public.

Our most important, and sometimes most severe, judges are our subordinates. That is a fact I discovered early in my military career. It is, unfortunately, a lesson Donald Rumsfeld seems incapable of learning.

What Will Happen Next In Iraq? (KCS)

By Ramesh Ponnuru

The Kansas City Star, March 19, 2006

"I suspect the shape of the year to come is going to depend crucially on the next few weeks, particularly on whether there's a political settlement in Iraq. If that happens, then it is possible the security situation improves. If the political situation comes unglued, then we've lost the last great, positive thing we have going for us. That is a scenario for either civil war or some kind of ignominious kind of American retreat, followed by civil war.

"There is reason to hope. The political situation has been better than the security situation. The question is whether the fact that a civil war would serve no one's real interest will ultimately exert enough pressure to keep that (civil war) from happening."

U.S. Rep. Ike Skelton

Ranking Democrat, House Armed Services Committee

"Who has a crystal ball? Two things have to happen: You have to get the security situation under control and … all the ministries have to function, and the Iraqi people have to respond positively. If those two things don't happen, Humpty Dumpty will not be put together again, and you can bet your bottom dollar you will have a melee like you have never seen before.

"The American people strongly support the troops, (but) the support for the mission is beginning to wane. With some good luck, this can all come out at the end of the day with a responsible government and with Iraq forces quelling the violence. We're going to have to have good luck along with some hard work."

Danielle Pletka

Vice president, foreign and defense studies, American Enterprise Institute

"I expect a drawdown of American troops. It's hard to misread the signals that we're getting from the administration. I think the (Iraqi) government will be formed. They're taking a long time coming together, but this is a big challenge. With the security force on ground, they're going to get better because they've got the best training ground in the world, unfortunately.

"I think instinctively the American people want to bring the troops home. They don't want to bring troops home prematurely if they sense there's a political overlay to the decision-making. If it's timed for the midterm election, that's a reasonable thing for the American people to have some skepticism about. I think Americans have enormous staying power. They'd have liked the Bush administration to have been more competent. But they're not just going to throw the Iraqi people to their fates saying, 'Whoops. Sorry. That was a mistake.' "

John Pike

Director, GlobalSecurity.org, a defense and security information Web site

"I think that over the next 12 months, the surprise-free scenario is that the American casualty rate drops by half and the American troop presence goes below 100,000. But this whole thing could fly apart in 48 hours. The whole thing could degenerate into a genocidal civil war very quickly, and political support for American troops (staying in Iraq after) getting caught in crossfire could collapse pretty fast. You could see political support for this in Washington collapse very quickly if there was no discernible purpose for the American presence there.

"I think we're going to bomb Iran over the next year or two. What impact is that going to have on Iraq? That's hard to say. It has to be in the back of everybody's mind as to how do we stay away from that probability."

Shibley Telhami

Anwar Sadat professor for peace and development, University of Maryland, and noted author of several books on the Middle East

"I opposed the war because we have the power to reshuffle the deck in Iraq, but we don't have the power to determine where the cards will fall. The cards are still falling. Once you dismantle a state, it is an uphill battle to reconstruct it. The forces at work are highly volatile and unpredictable. I wouldn't rule out that things could get better. I wouldn't rule out that things could get worse.

"The momentum is for more sectarian violence and civil war. Once you have central authority destroyed, all it takes is a determined minority that wants civil war. We have a determined minority that wants civil war. Even with the best of intentions, it is very difficult to overcome."

Paul Rieckhoff

Executive director and founder of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, a nonpartisan group that favors a strong military and encourages veterans to run for office. An Army 1st lieutenant, he served a year in Iraq as an infantry platoon leader.

"What you are going to start to see that is most alarming is the real cost of the overextension of our military. Every active duty division has been through at least once. The numbers are starting to look like a drawdown (of troops). But it's not going to be because of the political stability in Iraq or the political pressure on Bush at home. The generals are going to sit down and say to him, 'You are going to have to choose, one or the other: Continue the level of engagement or keep our homeland secure.'

"Like when you were a kid and played 'Risk,' you only have a certain number of pieces to play."

Diminishing The U.S. Footprint (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

Two important and related changes in the Bush administration's strategy for the long war on global terrorism emerged here last week. One tiptoed in quietly. The other came with trumpets blaring for political effect. It might have worked better the other way around.

The quiet change was suggested in classified briefings for friendly diplomats and visiting foreign officials: U.S. troops will be moving out of Iraq's streets and then out of Iraq's cities by the end of this year as part of a coordinated drawing down and concentration of all foreign forces. Troops from Italy and other nations will leave the country, and a reduced British force will redeploy into a smaller area of operational responsibility.

This is part of a new internal exit strategy that President Bush hinted at in Monday's Iraq speech. U.S. forces will stay in Iraq beyond 2006 to fight al-Qaeda and other Islamic extremists who are using Iraq as a platform for terrorism. Iraqi units -- operating with U.S. logistical assistance from remote locations and embedded command help -- are to be given primary responsibility for containing the domestic insurgency. This is what Bush calls Iraqis standing up to allow Americans to stand down.

Drawing lines between global and local terrorists will be a difficult task, as U.S. officials privately acknowledge. And Iraqi security forces and their political leaders, deadlocked in an intensifying power struggle, still must demonstrate they can carry out their part of the internal exit strategy.

But on its face, that strategy is a coherent way of reducing the foreign occupation footprint that fuels much of the conflict in Iraq. It realistically scales down what Iraqi units can be expected to accomplish: a long-term containment of terrorist attacks to a level that does not destroy the country's fraying ethnic and sectarian balances, rather than a quick final victory over the rebels. Finally, an internal exit is consistent with the administration's newest National Security Strategy white paper, released with fanfare Thursday.

The White House has struggled since Sept. 11, 2001, to define with precision both the enemy that Americans confront and the path to victory they must take in the war on terrorism. The Bush team gets closer with this exercise, which portrays the long war as a global ideological struggle that hinges on a battle of ideas within and about Islam.

That is change: The words "ideology" and "Islam" were each mentioned only twice, and in passing, in the 12,629-word version of the strategy document issued in 2002. They are at the conceptual heart of this year's paper (longer by one-third), which argues that Washington and its allies must "counter the lies behind the terrorists' ideology" by empowering "the very people the terrorists most want to exploit: the faithful followers of Islam. . . . Responsible Islamic leaders need to denounce an ideology that distorts and exploits Islam for destructive ends and defiles a proud religion."

Bush himself steered drafters away from any discussion of Islam in the earlier paper, I am told, and his concern about attacking another religion is reflected in a caveat this year that "the War on Terror is a battle of ideas . . . not a battle of religions." But this year's realistic acknowledgment of the decisive role of moderate Muslims in defeating al-Qaeda and its allies is a welcome adjustment.

The heavy emphasis on ideology -- explicitly al-Qaeda's and implicitly Bush's -- is less useful. By proposing democracy as a cure-all for the vast frustrations and delusions of al-Qaeda's target audience, the White House skips over a lot of the hard work that must still be done to shape the military and political battlefields of the long war, trying instead to rally U.S. and foreign support for Iraq and Afghanistan.

A new tone of realism about those conflicts has taken hold in internal administration discussions of the way forward. Nothing could reassure Americans more than publicizing that change.

The intensity of the power struggle in Baghdad was brought home to me when my phone rang shortly after a column reporting that Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari is fighting to keep his job was published last week. The president of Iraq, Jalal Talabani, was calling to say that he, too, is dug in: The Shiite alliance that backs Jafari should present an alternative candidate so a "national unity" government can be formed "in the next two weeks."

Talabani, an acquaintance of 30 years, would not discuss his reasons for opposing Jafari now. But speaking in English, he emphasized that the presidency needs new powers to block "extreme demands from the other side."

As they say, stay tuned.

Bleakness In Baghdad (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

At this moment, one of the most dangerous since World War II, America's perils are exacerbated by the travails of a president indiscriminately despised by Democrats and increasingly disregarded by Republicans. What should he do?

First, concentrate the public's mind on the deepening dangers beyond Iraq. Second, regarding Iraq, accentuate the negative and eliminate the positive -- that is, emphasize the dangers of failure and de-emphasize talk about Iraq's becoming a democracy that ignites emulative transformation in the Middle East.

The dangers? Iran's regime proceeds with its drive for nuclear weapons, unfazed by threats of "isolation." North Korea has received less attention lately than have Denmark and Dubai. In Afghanistan, according to Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, "insurgents now represent a greater threat to the expansion of Afghan government authority than at any point since late 2001." That government has an army of only 35,000 for a country nearly 50 percent larger than Iraq. The insurgency, by draining the government's energy, serves the lords of the heroin trade that accounts for at least a third of Afghanistan's gross national product.

But more than any presidency in living memory, George W. Bush's will be judged by a single problem -- Iraq, where on May 30 the war will be twice as long as was U.S. involvement in World War I. Today the impotence of Iraq's quasi-government is prompting ethnic recleansing: The government is too weak to prevent private groups from pursuing coercive reversals of Saddam Hussein's various ethnic cleansings. And in the absence of law and order, Iraqis seek safety in sectarian clustering.

Maples delicately says that although Iraq is not "at this time" in a civil war, "the underlying conditions" for such a war "are present." But civil wars do not usually begin with an identifiable event, such as the firing on Fort Sumter, or proceed to massed, uniformed forces clashing in battles like Shiloh. Iraq's civil war -- which looks more like Spain's in the 1930s -- began months ago.

In Spain, the security forces were united and in three years were victorious. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Gen. John Abizaid, U.S. commander in the Middle East, recently said that Iraqi forces would cope with a civil war "to the extent they're able to" (Rumsfeld) and "they'll handle it with our help" (Abizaid). Their problematic assumption is that Iraq's security forces have a national loyalty and will not fracture along the fissures of Iraq's sectarian society.

Tom Ricks, military correspondent for The Post, has doubts. He recently returned from his fifth visit to Iraq. In March 2003 he thought that the invasion was a strategic mistake in the struggle against terrorism. His assessment of subsequent events is the title of his book, coming in September: "Fiasco." Now, however, he thinks that a U.S. withdrawal would leave chaos that might lead to radical Islamists acquiring what they most want: Saudi oil fields and Pakistani nuclear weapons. So America, he thinks, needs a plan to reduce fatalities to two or three a week, then two or three a month.

But who, he wonders, will control the likes of Moqtada al-Sadr? Imagine, Ricks says, another cleric, the Rev. Al Sharpton, controlling the Bronx with a militia he can call into the streets at any time. Last Monday, when Bush again celebrated Iraq's progress from tyranny to December's "elections for a fully constitutional government," this was life in Iraq, as reported by the New York Times:

"Shiite vigilantes seized four men suspected of terrorist attacks, interrogated them, beat them, killed them and left their bodies dangling from lampposts. . . . In Sadr City, the Shiite slum in Baghdad where the terrorist suspects were executed, government forces have vanished. The streets are ruled by aggressive teenagers with shiny soccer jerseys and machine guns. They set up roadblocks and poke their heads into cars and detain whomever they want. . . . 'This is our government now,' [a retired teacher] said, nodding toward Mr. Sadr's glowering face on television."

Conditions in Iraq have worsened in the 94 days that have passed since Iraq's elections in December. And there still is no Iraqi government that can govern. By many measures conditions are worse than they were a year ago, when they were worse than they had been the year before.

Three years ago the administration had a theory: Democratic institutions do not just spring from a hospitable culture, they can also create such a culture. That theory has been a casualty of the war that began three years ago today.

The Stuff That Happened (NYT)

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

Three years ago, the United States invaded Iraq. We can all run the story through our minds: Shock and Awe, Coalition of the Willing, Mission Accomplished, looting, "Stuff happens," no W.M.D., suicide bombers, purple fingers, blasted shrine.

Many who supported the invasion have taken this anniversary to argue that it all would have been worthwhile if things had been run better. They argue that if the coalition forces had been large enough to actually secure the country, to keep insurgents from raiding Saddam Hussein's ammunition depots, to give the people a sense of safety, the country might well be on the road to a hopeful future.

We doubt it. The last three years have shown how little our national leaders understood Iraq, and have reminded us how badly attempts at liberation from the outside have gone in the past. Given where we are now, the question of whether a botched invasion created a lost opportunity might be moot, except for one thing. The man who did the botching, Donald Rumsfeld, is still the secretary of defense.

The generals on the ground understood what a disaster they were creating in the pell-mell race to Baghdad, which left in its wake an entire country full of places where Saddam Hussein's loyalists could regroup and prepare to carry on a permanent war against the Americans and their fellow Iraqis. As the new book "Cobra II" by Michael Gordon of The Times and Bernard Trainor underscores, the generals in the field were overruled by directives from Washington, where military decisions were being made by men who were guided not by reality, but by their own beloved myths about what Iraq was like and how the war was going to be won.

Chances are that at the time George W. Bush did not have an inkling of how badly he was being served by the decision makers at the Pentagon. But the fact that Mr. Rumsfeld continues to hold his job tells us that Mr. Bush doesn't care, that he prefers living in the same dream world that his secretary of defense inhabits.

In their wishful thinking, Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld undoubtedly tell themselves what they tell us: that the Iraqi people are better off than they were under the brutal dictator, that the Iraqi security forces are gradually learning how to take over defense of their own country and that a unified government is still a good possibility. It's true that many Iraqis are better off. Others are in far worse straits — their homes have been ruined, their relatives killed, their jobs evaporated and their ability to walk the streets in safety obliterated. Women's rights are being threatened in the south, and sectarian warfare has put families with mixed Shiite-Sunni ancestry at risk in their own neighborhoods. It is hard to quantify relative degrees of misery and pain in these circumstances. But unlike the horrors of Saddam Hussein, the horrors of the present can be laid at America's doorstep.

If the mission in Iraq was to create a stable democracy in the heart of the Middle East and inspire neighboring countries to follow the same path, the results have been crushingly bad — unless Mr. Bush regards the election of Palestinian terrorists as the leaders in Gaza and the West Bank as a step forward. Iran is extending its sway by the hour. In Afghanistan, American forces are too thin to do much more than protect the central government in downtown Kabul.

The idea that Iraqi security forces are poised to take over the job of protecting the people in a unified country is almost ludicrous. Many of those forces are actually sectarian militias that have been armed by the coalition forces, but not changed by them. So far, attempts at creating a government that could bring the country some modicum of stability have fallen apart. There are no leaders with the strength or credibility or even desire to rally anyone but their own co-religionists or ethnic group.

When Americans ask themselves whether anything has been accomplished in Iraq, they do take note that there have been no terrorist attacks on American soil since 9/11. That has been an enormous blessing, for which law enforcement officials can offer no explanation other than somewhat perplexed guesses. It's possible that the chaos in Iraq has distracted Al Qaeda, diverting its energy to fomenting civil war between Sunnis and Shiites in the heart of the Middle East. If that is so, we may have bought short-term peace while creating a training ground for terrorists and a no man's land where they can operate with impunity.

The Iraq debacle ought to serve as a humbling lesson for future generations of American leaders — although, if our leaders were capable of being humbled, they could have simply looked back to Vietnam. For the present, our goal must be to minimize the damage, through the urgent diplomacy of the current ambassador and forceful reminders that American forces are not prepared to remain for one day in a country whose leaders prefer civil war to peaceful compromise.

While we are distracted by picking up the pieces, there is no time to imagine what the world might be like if George Bush had chosen to see things as they were instead of how he wanted them to be three years ago. History will have more time to consider the question.

Shock, Awe And Humility (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

THREE YEARS AGO TODAY, Iraqis were "shocked and awed" by the power of the U.S. military. Today, Americans are shocked and awed by its limits. If the "cakewalks" of the 1980s and 1990s — Grenada, the Gulf War, Kosovo — restored America's belief in its omnipotence, so badly shaken in Vietnam, the occupation of Iraq has been a humbling letdown.

With a mere 38% of the public still thinking that the war is going well, and more than 2,300 U.S. troops dead, it's become fashionable for the war's initial supporters to have second thoughts. We opposed the decision to go to war. But we will resist the temptation to be fashionable and will take this opportunity to at least concede that the Bush administration's actions were rooted in a strain of American idealism most often identified with Woodrow Wilson. The decision to topple Saddam Hussein's regime was a Wilsonian attempt to preserve the notion of collective security; even more idealistically, it was an attempt to create an oasis of American-style democracy and prosperity that would alter the complexion of the entire region.

So much for the vision. The reality has been — to use a term from another unpopular war — a quagmire. Bush's messianic idealism was never justified, and in any event the administration's flawed execution would have undermined his purpose. The list of gaffes is by now distressingly familiar: the flawed intelligence on weapons of mass destruction, the lack of sufficient troops, the tainted contracting process and so on.

To be fair, Washington has persevered in its quest to create a representative democracy in Iraq. But American surprise at the unfolding Sunni-Shiite schism, and our lack of preparedness to deal with the early dismantlement of the Iraqi military, have made the world's reigning superpower look, once again, oddly naive.

And though it pledges to "stay the course" in Iraq, the Bush administration has long since fled the battlefield of ideas. It embarrassingly resorts only to Orwellian talk of a "war on terror" instead of addressing real issues, and its claims of relentless success are not to be taken seriously.

Most opponents of the war are hardly in a position to gloat about American difficulties in Iraq. Russia, France and Germany all cynically manipulated the run-up to the war for their own purposes, and they comforted Hussein by allowing him to believe that the international community would never take concerted action against him. And much of the mocking by Bush critics about the supposed absurdity of the administration's claims about weapons of mass destruction is revisionist nonsense. As the New York Times reported last Sunday, Hussein's own top military commanders were stunned to learn three months before the start of the war that they had no WMD at their disposal. There is a Shakespearean quality to the tale of the dictator bluffing his way to his own demise, and it's hard for those of us who opposed the war to bemoan his removal.

As it enters its fourth year, the war in Iraq defies simplistic characterizations from both ends of the political spectrum. The heroism of U.S. forces and of ordinary Iraqis going about their daily lives is inspiring. But the future of Iraq remains shrouded in gray uncertainty.

Washington Post, March 19, 2006

The heat, which is like living under a french-fry lamp, like standing in front of the world's biggest hair dryer, like sitting in a sealed car on the hottest summer day in Washington with the heater blasting and someone throwing sand in your face.

The mud, which follows the hot season, cold, slimy, sticky mud that makes you wish it would turn hot again.

The green that erupts after a spring rain and astounds you the first time you see it. The blue of the timeless sky above and beyond all the troubles. The black of the inky desert night, thickly dusted with stars and galaxies.

The eyes of the children.

These are some of the things they remember from their service in Iraq.

Over the past year, The Washington Post conducted in-depth interviews with 100 of the more than 500,000 veterans of the war. They included men and women, officers and enlisted, active-duty and reserves, combat and support troops. The questions were open-ended. The intent was to hear from them, in their own words, what the experience was like.

They remembered the camel spiders, big, fast and scary-looking. The sand flies, scorpions, mosquitoes and flying crickets. The long, hard days -- 12-hour shifts that easily turn into 20-hour shifts when they don't turn into round-the-clock marathons.

They remembered the roaring metal of System of a Down and Adema, the throbbing rap of Public Enemy and 50 Cent, the soldier-celebrating anthems of Toby Keith:

And I can't call in sick on Mondays/When the weekend's been too strong/I just work straight through the holidays/And sometimes all night long. . . .

Stringing Xbox cables from bunk to bunk to play Madden football or Tony Hawk skateboarding games in the two-man residential trailers known as "cans." Visiting the "hadji marts," clusters of enterprising Iraqis who sell everything from bootleg DVDs to rotgut alcohol on the roadside just beyond the wire of nearly every camp. Watching an entire season of "The Simpsons" or "CSI" or "Saved by the Bell" on your laptop. Watching your baby grow up via e-mail and webcam.

Wondering how honest to be with the folks back home. You don't want them to worry. So you try to sound cheerfully vague and remind them to send gummy candies, which don't melt, rather than chocolates, which do. But all that loving deception ends in a whoosh if a mortar hits during a telephone call to Mom.

Iraq was bad, nearly all of them agreed. "Not knowing day to day what was going to happen." "Hard to figure out who the enemy was." "Never being able to relax." "The rules are that there are no rules."

But it was not bad in the ways they see covered in the media -- the majority also agreed on this. What they experienced was more complex than the war they saw on television and in print. It was dangerous and confused, yes, but most of the vets also recalled enemies routed, buildings built and children befriended, against long odds in a poor and demoralized country. "We feel like we're doing something, and then we look at the news and you feel like you're getting bashed." "It seems to me the media had a predetermined script." The vibe of the coverage is just "so, so, so negative."

No two sets of memories were identical. This almost goes without saying, but not quite, because it underscores a point made by many of the veterans. Some of the deepest impressions left over from Iraq were not the externals -- the sights, sounds, smells, scenes -- but the internal marks. In Iraq, they saw, did and endured things they hadn't seen, done or imagined before, and this affected each one uniquely.

"Each individual over there has his own little war he is fighting," Army medic Joe Drennan explained. "No two people are going to have the same experiences." These personal wars add up to the war they share.

* * * A lot depended on when they were over there.

The invasion -- three years ago today -- was a blur, pulsing with excitement and wired on Adderall. Invasion vets remembered villages of blank-faced Iraqis lining the roads as the armor sped past, and ranks of empty Iraqi tanks bombed out in the desert, and busloads of men in civilian clothes suddenly opening fire, and a sandstorm so thick they could hardly see their hands in front of their faces.

Arriving in Baghdad, "I had an Iraqi citizen come up to me," said Lance Cpl. Daniel Finn, a Marine infantryman. "She was a female. She opened her mouth and she had no tongue. She was pointing at the statue" of Saddam Hussein. "There were people with no fingers, waving at the statue of Saddam, telling us he tortured them. People were showing us the scars on their backs."

After the initial victory came lean months when the war had too much death and not enough infrastructure. Troops slept in their armored trucks -- if their trucks were armored. They ate cold chow and drank hot water and dug pit toilets where they suffered "Saddam's revenge." They scraped the grime from their skin with baby wipes mailed from home. No one had planned for so many Americans to live in Iraq for so long.

Little by little, the cans arrived with their cushioned bunks and air conditioning. Showers and restrooms were built. Apart from the improvised explosive devices, the ambushes, the suicide bombers and the mortar attacks, life became sort of bearable. Rec centers opened with large-screen TVs and air-hockey tables. Dining halls began serving hot food and icy sodas.

Once-a-week phone calls home gave way to broadband Internet connections. Movie theaters and coffee bars opened. Gyms were built on most bases.

"The great stress reliever was exercise" -- veterans reported this again and again. Opportunities for sex apparently varied from one part of the country to another, and drinking was forbidden. A few veterans admitted that they had a swig, or more, of bootlegged or smuggled booze. But the most common way to vent the tension was to pump iron and work the cardio machines for an hour or two at the end of a long day.

With a few exceptions, the veterans described a highly professional, almost spartan force, characterized by resilient morale and good discipline. "I didn't touch a girl or alcohol for seven months, and that was tough," said Sgt. Christopher Johnson of the Marine Reserve. Many said they were ready to return to Iraq.

* * * In some ways, they talked about a war much like all wars for all troops in all times. It was a test, personal and elemental. To understand it, you must go through it; no words could entirely convey the experience to those who were not there. Many veterans described a moment, different for each person, when the test boiled down to a single yes-or-no question -- again, slightly different for each person.

Would you fight or flee? Would you crack under pressure? Would you shoot or freeze? Was it better to know that you hit your target, or not to know?

Army Staff Sgt. Christopher Day spoke of wondering "what I would do when I start getting shot at. Will I fire back or curl in a ball? And sure enough, I fired back right away."

The reason he fired back was also timeless. "It was not so much for myself, but for the guys beside me," Day said. "I was shooting and trying to kill the people that were trying to kill my friends."

He used the word "friends." Others preferred family terms. GIs talked about their "brothers." Officers spoke of their "kids." The intense bonds they formed had little to do with like-mindedness and everything to do with shared risk and mutual dependence.

"Soldiers are nonpartisan," explained Staff Sgt. Larry Gill of the National Guard. "We could give a rat's heehaw about same-sex marriage or other issues. We're given a job to do, and you go out and do your job. Because if you don't, someone's going to get hurt or die."

The officers are often gung-ho. "We are professionals," said Capt. Tyler McIntyre of the Army headquarters staff. "If you just step back, give us some breathing space, let us do our job, we'll get it done."

The enlisted troops, sometimes less so. You "meet a lot of active-duty hoorah guys and then some of us who were National Guardsmen who weren't so sure why we were there," said Spec. Amy Capistran, a mechanic with the Virginia National Guard. In other ways, it has been a war like no other.

Civilian contractors performed many of the support roles that would have been handled by GIs in past wars. Some of these were menial jobs few would have wanted. Other contractors did security work. To many troops, it didn't seem fair that these mercenaries earned big salaries and could party after work.

Technology shaped the war experience in ways both good and bad. The distance between troops and their families was closed by e-mail and satellites and instant messages and blogs. But officers worried constantly that families might discover bad news inadvertently. The bad news as of this weekend was 2,313 killed and 17,124 wounded.

The presence of women in a wider variety of roles also sets the Iraq war apart. Commanders have struggled, in some cases, to know how to manage a coed military. 1st Lt. Tanya Lawrence-Riggins of the Army National Guard said she and the other women in her unit had to bathe outdoors, screened by parked trucks, because an active-duty commanding officer didn't want them in the showers.

Other women complained that every friendship they formed with a male soldier was grist for gossip. "The rumor mill was horrific," said National Guard Lt. Connie Woodyard, whose husband served at another base in Iraq. "I was just like, 'I'm not getting that much sex! If I were, I'd like war a whole lot more.' "

* * * The difference between a hot day and a cold day in Iraq is more than 100 degrees. The historical sites are among the oldest in the world -- the ruins of Babylon, Nineveh and Ur. The poverty in some places is appalling. Iraq is an extreme land, where American troops must cope with extremity.

Extremes of doubt: "It was hard to figure out who the enemy was. Everyone practically looks the same and dresses the same. You didn't know who was a terrorist and who was not," said Spec. Greg Seely, a Virginia National Guardsman.

Extremes of emotion: "The bombs were everywhere," said Army Staff Sgt. John Thomas. "You feel like you are in a movie. You drive through the town, you see the women out in the fields, and children and other people are on the roofs watching. They are waiting on the roofs to see you get blown up."

Extremes of angst: "It's a lot harder than what a lot of people think, especially if you have a family," said Navy Corpsman Nathanial Slenker. "You're worried about your family. About the friends that you're there with. You worry about yourself and your ability to keep handling situations. You're constantly worrying."

Iraqis See Long Road To Recovery (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraqis interviewed on the streets of Baghdad on the eve of the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion said it will take at least a decade, maybe longer, to get their country on its feet.

After three years of war and with no signs of the conflict in Iraq ending soon, many Iraqis said they had lost confidence in their political leadership's ability to pull the country together.

"Saddam [Hussein] was a dictator, it was one-party rule, but now we have 60 parties running the country," said 55-year-old Falah Hassan, referring to the multiple political factions that make up the main political alliances in the national assembly. Tomorrow marks the third anniversary of the invasion that toppled Saddam.

"We don't want to say Saddam is better than this, but the situation is bad," said Mr. Hassan, fingering his Muslim prayer beads as he stood in the entrance of his small hardware store in Baghdad's busy shopping district of Karrada.

"It will not be less than 10 years" before Iraq is back to normal, and we will once again feel safe, Mr. Hassan said.

For 30-year-old Ayad Khaz Ali, who works in Baghdad's leather district selling custom-made leather coats, getting rid of Saddam was like being let out of a cage.

"We felt happy when the dictator fell, but the ones who took that happiness away are the terrorists," he said, adding that business had dropped off as death and violence has dominated the streets.

"We just blame our government and security systems, because they are not doing anything to get rid of the terror here in Iraq," Mr. Ali said.

But he denied that there was a civil war.

"Our brothers are getting killed every day, Shi'ites and Sunnis. But [civil war] must start from the bedroom, because there are a lot of mixed marriages here -- that will never happen," he said.

Despite the mistakes Mr. Ali felt the American-led coalition has made in Iraq, such as disbanding the army, he called on them to stay until Iraq had a leader with a "steel fist" capable of stopping the violence.

"If they left now, it would be a victory for the terrorists," he said.

Others say civil war is already under way, and point out that even repeated curfews have failed to stop sectarian slayings and car bombs that continue to explode daily in the capital.

"Civil war exists right now, but it has not been announced," said Ali Faris, who works in a cigar shop in the once-upscale business district of Arasat.

"It will take 10 years or more to fix Iraq -- if we don't break out in full-scale civil war," he said.

Mr. Faris said the Americans are the only ones who have enough power to roll back the violence. "If the U.S. destroyed the Soviet Union, can they not fix Iraq?" he asked.

The United States currently has about 130,000 troops in Iraq, and last week deployed to the Baghdad area an additional battalion task force from its "call-forward force" in Kuwait.

Life is much more peaceful in the Shi'ite dominated south and Kurdish north, with businesses open late and few of the horrific bombs and attacks that prevail in the strongly Sunni and religiously mixed areas of central Iraq.

Najeeb Hanoudi, an Iraqi Catholic in his 70s who grew up side by side with Muslims in the now-troubled city of Mosul, said the solution to Iraq's lethal triple insurgency of nationalists, former Ba'athists and al Qaeda was not easy, but it was possible.

"They can be bought off," he said, smoking calmly in a Baghdad hotel coffee shop. "You can buy people here by three methods: money, women and food. Every Iraqi, including myself, is amenable to this sort of treatment." All except the al Qaeda group, led by the Jordanian-born Islamic extremist Abu Musab Zarqawi, he said.

"They are the most dangerous. They don't care about human life. They murder, they decapitate, and I don't know why," Mr. Hanoudi said.

A supporter of the Americans when they first arrived in Iraq and their removal of Saddam, Mr. Hanoudi is now much more reserved. His son was shot by U.S. troops, and despite U.S. attempts to help, his son now lies in a vegetative state.

"The current situation is chaotic, dangerous and very unpredictable in every aspect. I'm very sad that it has turned out to be like that," he said, sipping some milky coffee.

After an hour of talking, Mr. Hanoudi concluded: "I might have given a gloomy and pessimistic picture, but still, in the depths of my heart, I am cautiously optimistic for a better future, for freedom, prosperity and democracy for my children and grandchildren."

In military action yesterday, American and Iraqi troops pushing through a desolate area of Iraq's Sunni Arab heartland rounded up dozens more suspected insurgents, including the purported killers of a television journalist, U.S. and Iraqi officials told the Associated Press yesterday.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, a dozen more bodies were found as a shadowy war of Shi'ite-Sunni reprisals went on, and Shi'ite Muslim pilgrims heading to the holy city of Karbala again came under attack, with a roadside bomb killing one and wounding at least five, the AP reported.

How Do You Say Clueless? (WP)

By Muean Aljabiry

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

The noise of the C-130 was deafening. One week after the liberation of Iraq, I was bound for Baghdad. The plane's gray and red colors and the crew's khaki uniforms were in sharp contrast to the attires of the 20 or so passengers: State Department types in suits and ties, women in Eddie Bauer outfits, a few men in blue jeans. At the tail end of the plane, a young woman in uniform, her legs dangling from the edge, was "manning" a gun.

Bottled water and foam ear plugs were distributed to us. The tall cowboy from Oklahoma sitting next to me volunteered to show me how to knead the foam, in order to insert the plugs in my ears. I thanked him and introduced myself. Noticing my accent or the peculiarity of my name, he asked in a loud voice: "Where from?"

I mumbled a few words about being from Northern Virginia and added that I was born in Najaf.

He looked at me as if recalling someone he had known before. "Oh, that's India, right? Never been there, but someday I will." He shook my hand firmly and I learned that Bill was an Army Reserve lieutenant colonel being deployed to Baghdad to work with a unit dealing with civil affairs.

On the bus from the airport in Baghdad, I felt a mixture of exhilaration and nervousness. How, I wondered, would I reach the family with whom I had lost contact since the start of this war? They were unaware of my coming and I had no idea as to their safety or well-being.

The last time I had been on that road was back in October 1981, during the Iraq-Iran war, when, with a broken spirit, I had left Baghdad for the last time. After I had made "Rasheed Street," a film about the history of Baghdad's famous main street, Saddam Hussein's henchmen made me an offer that they said I should not refuse: to make a big budget film with an international cast about the life of the "great leader." Once I rejected their offer, they banned my film and made my life, and that of my family, very miserable. After spending a few days in jail and having all the money in my bank account confiscated, I left, promising never to return until the monster was gone. Now, the absolute thrill of being back in a free Iraq, liberated from that hideous regime, was so overwhelming that I shoved all my anxieties aside and contemplated my task ahead.

I was assigned by the State Department to interpret for the Baghdad Conference (to establish an interim government) and later to provide language support to both Barbara Bodine and retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, the two highest officials in postwar Iraq.

I didn't know how the experiment would turn out. But as I arrived in Baghdad, I really believed the United States had an efficient, well-studied plan to put Iraq together after toppling the Saddam regime.

What I witnessed in the year or so I spent helping U.S. officials on the ground in Iraq, and what I have seen more recently, has made me doubtful about our competence for nation building, an exercise the United States initially claimed to have no interest in carrying out. Perhaps for that reason, America didn't seem to have studied Iraq's long history of repulsing occupiers. When the British attempted to build a nation in Mesopotamia at the end of World War I, it was confronted with a great revolt that continues to be a source of pride to Iraqis. I sometimes worry that, like the British enterprise, the U.S. effort to build a pluralistic, democratic society in Iraq will be remembered primarily for the insurgency it has spawned.

When we arrived from the airport, we were ushered into the Baghdad Convention Center, given flimsy mattresses and blankets and told to find a place to sleep. I tried to sleep but the acrid smell of burnt gasoline or rubber tires made it difficult to breathe. With no electricity and in the pitch darkness, everything was stirring in my mind like a film in fast forward. I imagined the voice of Lt. Col. Bill Kilgore from "Apocalypse Now" echoing across the halls of the Convention Center: "I love the smell of napalm in the morning . . . The smell, you know that gasoline smell . . . smelled like . . . victory . . . Someday this war's gonna end." Eventually I collapsed and fell into a deep, deep sleep.

The conference was reminiscent of the commotion in "Lawrence of Arabia," when the British officer T.E. Lawrence gathered the citizens of Damascus back in 1918. There were clerics in white and black turbans, men in traditional tribal headdress, and many who wore Western suits. As Garner addressed the gathering, the audience was shouting complaints about looting and the lack of security, electricity and other services. There was no semblance of order in the hall. Responding to his unruly audience's demands, Garner started assigning security functions to some of the clerics and the tribal sheiks. "Rebels, especially successful rebels, were of necessity bad subjects and worse governors," Lawrence wrote amid the chaos of liberated Damascus. It seemed that the same could be said of these Iraqi generals, clerics and chieftains.

Not long after, my new friend Lt. Col. Bill came to ask me to teach him a few words in Arabic. He said he was assigned to deal with the former Ministry of Culture and that he needed help to interact with its department heads. He inquired if Iraqis' "language" is different from that of Saudis. He wanted to know whether Iraqis say marhaba , instead of greeting each other with salaam alaikum as they do in Saudi Arabia. I managed to teach him how to say shukran, for thank you. And I promised him that learning one phrase per day would make him as good as a native speaker by the time we left Iraq. I could easily tell he did not get the cynicism in my promise.

The motorcade of the new Boss arrived at the main gate of the palace in mid-May. Many smartly dressed men and some women got out of their vehicles. I was trying to get a glimpse of this new presidential envoy, who was sent to make things right in Iraq. The gentleman in the blue suit, striped red tie and combat boots was L. Paul Bremer. He looked sharp even at this broiling temperature. I wondered how long it would be before he started dressing casually like Garner. To me, he looked like a new head of state and I knew that we'd be working closely together. I was assigned to be his interpreter.

It was the season of dreadful heat and dust storms in Baghdad. Bremer kept the massive number of Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) staff working almost nonstop. In addition to interpreting for him in his meetings with Iraqi political leaders, I kept a hectic schedule translating his documents and correspondence.

Nothing was working right in Baghdad. Electricity, water and other services were in short supply. My family, whom I had finally managed to contact, informed me of the terrible situation. They came to fetch me and on the way from the palace to their home, I asked my nephew to drive me through Rasheed Street. It was a ghost town, nothing like the lively street I had known and loved. My mind flashed to a deserted place in Arizona where they used to shoot westerns. I wondered how long it would take to transform this shabbiness into a city center like that of Beirut. U.S. resourcefulness will make this happen very soon, I told my nephew as he cursed the old regime.

At home with my family, I deeply felt the expanse that separated us for so many years. I, in the full comfort of my Virginia surroundings, and my entire family, in Saddam's abyss, were worlds apart. They complained about how bad things were. Food and services were scarce, but they all chipped in to load the dining room table with everything they knew I liked. They were joyful that the nightmare was over, but like most Iraqis lectured me that "you Americans" should do this and that in order to get Iraq moving in the right direction. I assured them of our efforts to institute democracy and revealed to them that we were forming a Governing Council. It would, I promised, lead the country into a true democracy.

My niece, Akila al-Hashimi, a French-educated senior career diplomat, declared that such a dream would unquestionably require some time. "In the conduct of our daily lives," she said, "we Iraqis must liberate ourselves of autocratic ideals, in order to make such a dream a reality." With immense enthusiasm, she pressed our family to do its share in the efforts to achieve this goal. Later, after I introduced her to Bodine and Bremer, she became a prominent member of the council.

Lt. Col. Bill came over to my office to enlist my help in finding him an interpreter. He complained that the officials of the former Ministry of Culture could not speak English. Pointing at a book on my desk, he asked, "So what is this book you are reading?"

"The bible," I started to say.

"But I thought you are Shia!" he cut me off.

I told him that the book, "The Old Social Classes and the Revolutionary Movements of Iraq," was Hanna Batatu's book on Iraq and that it was a must-read for anyone dealing with modern Iraq's political history.

Bill pulled from his back pocket a green paperback, published in the mid-'80s by Iraq's Ministry of Tourism and with a straight face told me, "All I need to know about Iraq is in here."

I yawned.

By then, the process of selecting members to the Governing Council was in full swing. Assorted Iraqi figures were delivered to the palace to be interviewed and evaluated for their political, social and economic views, as well as their attitudes toward the coalition. Often, I asked myself or my colleagues: Who nominated this person? Where did they find this woman? We had people who must have borrowed Col. Bill's book scouting cities and villages in Iraq for candidates to the "GC," as we came to call it. Those who did the recruiting had Arabic vocabularies approaching that of my friend Col. Bill, although their résumés attested to their fluency in Arabic.

From a helicopter, Baghdad looked dusty and pale ocher. In all directions, patches of palm groves dotted the landscape below. On one trip that summer, I found myself surveying the satellite dishes springing up from the roofs and wondered how TV and the Internet would affect future generations.

Iraq, I told the woman sitting across from me, finally had an open window from which to see the world. She was Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski, the commander of the Abu Ghraib prison, and she was taking a large group of coalition and U.N. officials along with several journalists to show off the newly refurbished and redecorated facility. "The sparkling cells," she told her audience that day, "are up to the highest international standards." Outside, and under the scorching sun, hundreds of inmates were gathered in an open-air camp. "Looters," she said, when a journalist asked why the inmates were sequestered there and not in the new cells. I wondered if they would furnish the prison with satellite televisions.

Iraqis are shrewd people. Those we dealt with fell into two very different groups: Those who had opposed Saddam and had just returned from exile and those who had remained in Iraq and had learned to survive by simply saying yes to anything the master said or did. As soon as those from the latter group felt a measure of safety, they unloosed an avalanche of criticism on their master. This tactic was so ingrained that they continued to use it in their dealings with us. But some U.S. officials exhibited a naivete or ignorance that was too glaring for the smart Iraqis, and communication suffered. I suspect that it continues to suffer.

One day I was invited to attend a luncheon for some Iraqi intellectuals in the convention center. The group comprised some university professors, writers, artists and clerics. They were recruited to support our efforts to convene the first session of the Governing Council. They spoke of their aspirations for the new Iraq and wondered about the makeup of the council.

"Iraq is a mosaic, very much like America," someone said. "We want to be the 51st state, and you have to help us," another pleaded. But the black-turbaned cleric from Karbala, who sat silent most of the meeting, finally spoke. "Your president had said that you will not be here one day beyond what is needed. We are very grateful to all your sacrifices to liberate us from Saddam's tyranny. You have to know that Iraq is the cradle of civilization and we gave the world a lot more than just oil. If oil is what you want, then take it and leave us to restore the structure of our society and our culture. You must start thinking of when to leave, for I swear by Allah, if you stay one day longer than what your president promised, we will fight you, men, women and children."

Everyone in the room was wordless. Lt. Col. Bill looked at me for help to break the silence.

Twenty-two men and three women formed the newly established Governing Council. They sat around a large oval table covered in green. The way they were seated was telling. The ambitious Shiite politicians Ahmed Chalabi, Ayad Allawi and Ibrahim al-Jafari sat at the head of the table. Rival Kurdish leaders Massoud Barzani and Jalal Talabani sat across from each other. Two men in tribal headgear sat at the far end of the table, while two women sat next to each other. I noticed my niece Akila sitting separately. Neither representatives of Iraq's political elites from the pre-Saddam era nor Iraqi military officers were present. Those who had not been annihilated by Saddam lived to be ignored by the Western powers. British diplomat John Sawers, the U.N. special representative Sergio Vieira de Mello and Bremer wished them success in leading the new Iraq to the shores of democracy and prosperity.

But an undertow was tugging in the other direction.

Much happened in the months that followed. Everyone in the palace worked heroically to bring a measure of stability and structure to the new Iraq. But reconstruction and budget issues took a toll and the problems of elusive electricity and long gasoline lines continued. The number of car bombs and assassinations escalated. Mortar shells started to come nearer and nearer to the Green Zone. We had insurgency in Fallujah. Al-Qaeda, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and Moqtada al-Sadr and his militia were thorny problems to reckon with and various parties maintained their own militias.

In September 2003, my niece Akila, while on her way to work, was shot in the abdomen by terrorists who attacked her two-car convoy. Bremer recently wrote that he received the news while dining in the United States with his wife and the Bushes. Mrs. Bremer suggested they pray for Akila, and they did. I went to the hospital with the CPA's surgeon general and we moved her to the Green Zone, but she later died of her wounds.

Members of the Governing Council continued to haggle endlessly over every issue. Every word and every sentence in the Transitional Administrative Law were surgically dissected into the late hours of the night. That it eventually passed to serve as the foundation for the country's first democratic constitution was one of Bremer's major achievements. I felt that finally -- despite Col. Bill, the death of Akila, the ruthless terrorists and feckless politicians -- we had done something right.

On June 28, 2004, I was in the studio dubbing a voiceover of the farewell speech delivered by Bremer; he was already on the plane leaving Iraq. A few days later, I too took the road to Baghdad's airport for my return to the United States. But this time, I promised my family and my friends that I would return. Maybe the sequel to that year would end more happily.

Fade to white.

My Iraqi Wedding (WP)

By Manal Omar

AMMAN, Jordan There was always a fear of sectarian violence in Iraq. But when I arrived in Baghdad almost three years ago, it was only that -- a fear. Back then, right after Saddam Hussein was toppled, the country was full of hope and optimism. And it was in that heady atmosphere that I found love when I met the Iraqi man to whom I am now married.

But the fear of sectarian strife became a searing reality for me last year, on the night before our wedding. Our house of celebration was transformed into a house of mourning when we learned that my husband's brother-in-law, Hussein, had been brutally murdered. As the mourners arrived, we turned away the florist and canceled the photographer. Our festival of love gave way to horror, as we realized that Hussein was just one of the many casualties of what Iraq was becoming -- a volatile mix of tribal tensions and local mafia-style killings.

A Shiite from the Kadhimiyah district of Baghdad, Hussein had been traveling in the Sunni-controlled district of Tarmiyah where he went to a bank to withdraw money. These days, when I tell Hussein's story, people stop me at this point. "What was a Shia man thinking, going to Tarmiyah?" they say. But Hussein had worked in Tarmiyah all his life. He could never have imagined that he would be attacked by armed robbers; he would never have thought that, after his body was pumped full of bullets, it would be dragged through the streets behind his killers' car. Most people didn't think like that a year ago. Now Iraqis have to think like that every day, as hope has given way to constant fear.

Killed just 12 days after his 32nd birthday, Hussein left his wife, Rana, and three children, the youngest of whom was only 6 months old. His death was one of the incidents that sparked a full-blown tribal war between the Sunnis of Tarmiyah and the Shiites of Kadhimiyah. If districts in Baghdad are resorting to bloodthirsty feuds, you can only imagine what is happening in the outlying provinces and rural areas.

These schisms among communities were predictable -- and predicted. The most painful fact is that, early on, the feuding was preventable.

Something went awry. I am continually plagued by the question of how we in the international community could have gotten this so very wrong. I believe that we have dug a grave. And it is the Iraqis who will have to lie in it.

But who will be held accountable?

As soon as I arrived in Baghdad in those fear-free days of 2003 to open the Iraq office of Women for Women International, people from all over the world began calling and writing to ask me what it was like. I used to send out an e-mail journal in response. But over the past year, I've found it increasingly difficult to record what is going on. Even before my brother-in-law's death, I felt stymied. My last journal entry was on April 19, 2005, three days after peace activist Marla Ruzicka was killed by a roadside bomb. At that moment, I realized that the loss of friends and colleagues had become overwhelming. I was losing hope.

The truth is, I used to write to share whatever success stories there were from the people of Iraq -- to try to keep the pulse of hope beating. After Marla's death, I was afraid to admit that the hope we had been clutching was becoming impossible to hold onto.

I developed a means of coping. In order to continue my aid work in Iraq, I allowed myself to fall into the comfortable shadows of denial. And for a while it worked. But however desperately I tried to stuff my head -- like an ostrich -- into the ground, the political earthquakes and violent undercurrents forced me to the surface. Then the bombing last month of the Shiite shrine in Samarra shook me out of denial. There had been signs of sectarian strife long before that: The attacks on Karbala shrines and the kidnappings of young children were reminders that nothing remains sacred in Iraq. But on that late February day, my last glimmer of hope evaporated into thin air like the gold that once shimmered on Samarra's dome.

It must be hard, from a distance, to understand how the situation deteriorated so quickly. When I speak to Westerners about the pain of watching Iraq fall apart, I usually get little sympathy. "It is war; what did you expect?" people say. But those of us who worked in Iraq saw the flame of hope. Now we watch that flame sputter and bear witness to brutal efforts to extinguish it.

When people started to discuss the possibility of civil war two years ago, I didn't believe them; I insisted that the majority of Iraqis would rise above sectarianism. People now say that I have been proven wrong. But I remember a letter I received in the early days: A young woman from Tikrit wrote that she prayed Iraqis would remember that the strength of their country was in their mosaic of religions and ethnicities. If Iraqis had been left to themselves, I tell my doubters, they would have risen above this madness.

The countless international interventions -- from neighboring countries to the coalition forces -- destabilized Iraq at a time when its people needed support from the world. Some continue to be grateful for the collapse of the Baathist regime and entertain dreams that their nation may be on the road to recovery. But for many, the Samarra bombing crushed that dream.

I wonder at the way hope evolved into fear. I had come to Baghdad to help empower Iraqi women after decades of suffering from war and sanctions. Iraqi women had a history of exercising rights in ways other women in the region could not. I was confident that, with the resources and assistance that Women for Women International provides, they would easily reclaim their status.

My background is Palestinian, but I grew up as an American and was prepared to find communities that would reject me. But from Karbala to Fallujah, from Sulaymaniyah to Baqubah, people embraced me as one of their own. Looking back, it seems only natural that there I would meet the love of my life, a fellow employee of Women for Women International.

Against that background of trust, I worked with increasing numbers of widows and abused and marginalized women. But nothing could have prepared me to see Hussein's wife, my husband's dear sister Rana, become a widow. Through her pain, I catch a glimpse into the everyday life of women struggling to overcome the trauma of war. You see, it is not only those who are killed who are casualties, but also their families.

Every day, Rana faces reminders of her loss. There are religious pressures for her to respect the Islamic mourning period, which does not allow her to leave the house for four months. She knew she would have to violate those strictures and flee with her children to Jordan to avoid the battles that erupted after their father's death. Rana also faced the economic pressures of being the sole breadwinner for her children, never having worked outside the home. Rana also joined thousands of widows in a legal battle to protect her children's right of inheritance. Some interpretations of the Koran do not permit children to inherit their father's property if the grandparents are still living. Rana and her children were now at the full mercy of Hussein's family.

Rana brings home to me the fate of thousands of other Iraqi women. Yet she considers herself lucky because she was able to bury her husband. When Rana reminds me of this good fortune, my mind floats to the wife of one of our staff members. Her husband went missing in 2004. There are no clues of what happened to him; there has been no sign of his car or his body. Every night, I fall asleep imagining his wife and two kids anxiously waiting for him. And I tell myself that at least Rana knows her husband's fate.

Now Rana lives, as I do, in Amman. In my apartment building, only two of the 12 units are occupied by Jordanians. The rest are homes for Iraqis who have fled their homeland. Of the 10 apartments, eight are occupied by people who have come to Amman after a family member was killed or, more commonly, kidnapped. Now, the entire building is in mourning over what is happening in Iraq. Just a couple of months ago, the halls and the parking lot were filled with quips about the Saddam trial, and the discussion was about who would be going back to Iraq first. Now, none of us dare speak about going back to Iraq.

Iraq Needed A Benign Dictator (WP)

Interview by Rajiv Chandrasekaran

Kanan Makiya, an Iraqi-born, MIT-trained architect, is a professor at Brandeis University and the author of "Republic of Fear: The Politics of Modern Iraq." The book, which details human rights abuses under Saddam Hussein, was published under a pseudonym in 1989. Makiya, an active member of Ahmed Chalabi's Iraqi National Congress, was among the most vocal Iraqi exiles encouraging the Bush administration to oust Hussein.

Is Iraq in the midst of a civil war ?

We're teetering on the edge of one, and I think as always, politics is going to be the deciding factor. By politics, I mean leadership politics, which has been sorely lacking in Iraq.

Before the war, many Iraqi exiles predicted that the Iraqi people would unite behind moderate leaders. Where are those leaders, and why haven't we seen more moderation?

The failure lies in the inability of Iraqi leaders to rise above their own groups and confessional allegiances. We have not had a visionary, a leader able to think beyond the self-interest of their group. So we have a politics of selfishness . . . [and] a politics of victimhood, an elevation of victimhood into a quality as though it were something in and of itself. In particular, this applies to the Shiite leadership.

Why hasn't a more unifying leader risen from the Shiite community? Where is Iraq's Nelson Mandela or Hamid Karzai ?

We're talking about a completely new elite that has had no experience of government before. They have created a Shiite political organization, identifying Shiiteness over Iraqiness. This, I feel, is the source of their failure. Their interpretation of democracy . . . is of democracy being majority rule as opposed to minority rights.

When you remove the suffocating lid of dictatorship, a dictatorship that has oppressed on the basis of ethnic identity, then it is very natural that those who have been so repressed react by being assertive -- the very thing that has been denied from the days of [Saddam] Hussein. And that is what we are watching today.

Could the Americans have done anything differently from the outset to reduce the chances of sectarian politics and civil strife we're now seeing today? Before the war, you advocated the formation of a provisional government led by Iraqis in exile. Do you still believe that was the right way to go?

There's this old thorn . . . and that is the issue of provisional government versus occupation. Occupation was the wrong formula for dealing with the transition. The U.S. government pushed aside the Iraqi opposition -- both those groups that were in exile and those groups that were inside Iraq, mainly the Kurds. The unwillingness, for instance, to involve the Kurds in deliberations on Iraq as a whole because of how that may look in the rest of the Arab world was a big mistake, I think. The unwillingness to have the Iraqis keep their army. That was another mistake. But that goes hand in glove with the idea of occupation as opposed to a provisional government like what was done in Afghanistan. So what we ended up with was the rhetoric of liberation but the reality of occupation.

Isn't it interesting that 80 to 90 percent of those very same characters who were waltzing in and out of Washington before the war today have been quote-unquote legitimized through elections. Look at the political elite, look at the names, they're all there -- the very same people. But what we have lost in the meantime is three years, a lot of hurt feelings, a lot of bad relations and so on.

The U.S. government bent over backwards in almost every arena of dealings with Iraqis to be seen as being representative. But my point is this: In the moment of transition was representativeness really more important than leadership? I know how bad it would've looked to Europe, to other parts of the world, in the United Nations, for the United States to have installed a puppet government. That's what it is -- let's call things by their name. But the United States could have remained the great benefactor who had removed Saddam . . . [and after] that interim period, there certainly would have been elections. Today you ask me . . . would we have been better off? There would have been a lot more mess in the first month and the first year, but there are certain things that might have been better.

"Occupation" in Arabic has nothing but a pejorative set of meanings, clearly with the occupation of the West Bank by Israel, Algeria by France. We don't have an example in our own history of what you might call an enabling occupation. We only have disabling ones.

Iraqis today care about electricity, they care about looting, they care about a sense of authority. These people have lived under extreme authority for 35 years. You just don't take the lid off and overnight have a democratic experiment. The lid of authority has to be changed and replaced. There is a benign kind of dictatorial authority, a transition between one and the other, which in this case could have been through a provisional government that was profoundly influenced by the United States. Now, after the fact, all of this is too late, but we might've had a different dynamic.

Before the war, you spoke to a number of senior officials in the U.S. government, including President Bush and Vice President Cheney. Do you feel that they understood the depth of the issues, the animus between Sunnis and Shiites, between Arabs and Kurds. Did they understand the complexity of Iraq ?

I honestly don't think that's the source of the problem. This animus is a creation. Look, let me give you a little example. It's almost a childish example. The other day, a good friend of mine interviewed a lady from the neighborhood to work as a cleaning person in his house and the first thing this lady did was say to the woman of the house, "Are you Sunnis or Shiites?" And it so happened that the family that was trying to hire this person was Sunni and the working woman was a Shiite. And she walked out of the house. She said, "Thank you very much," and she left. She told the guard at the end of the house, "I can't work in a Sunni house."

You may think that we're now talking about decades-old prejudices and hatred between Sunnis and Shiites, I say no. I say this is a manufactured consciousness -- new, real. Not that it was not there before. There were all kinds of latent divisions. There were all kinds of ways in which people discriminated against all kinds of other people. But that kind of a conversation has emerged as an issue because of the way Iraqi politics has developed in the last two years. It is the politicians, starting with the Governing Council, who sat down and thought of themselves as Shiites and Sunnis first, that created all of this in the first place. It goes from the top down, not from the bottom up.

Do you regret telling the president that the Iraqi people would "greet the troops with sweets and flowers? "

I regret the phrase but not the intent behind the phrase. By and large, the Iraqi people received the United States very well in the first two or three months -- before the occupation was enshrined.

Bush administration officials have indicated a desire to reduce the number of U.S. forces in Iraq this year. Do you support a reduction in troops ?

I wish they wouldn't draw down their troops so quickly.

You have written extensively about the abuses of Saddam Hussein. Saddam certainly seems to be making a mockery of the proceedings .

He is. Well, of course, he's doing what in some senses was expected of him: to deny the legitimacy of the whole process.

There's something in the design of the court, in the rules of the court that . . . were badly designed. One other thing that I think is wrong is that the case against Saddam Hussein and his henchmen has not yet been properly put. We're dealing with a case where 150 people were executed. I understand the overall strategy is to move from one case to the next case to the next case, but the result is that the Iraqi people, and the Arab world, have not yet been faced with the magnitude of his crimes as a whole.

That picture has not yet been painted by the prosecution. We're talking about an act of revenge in which the president ordered the killing of 150 people. That could apply to a hundred other presidents in some way or another.

We have not yet looked at the magnitude of the crimes of this regime -- the reason why the United States went in there and the reason why this regime was beheaded. But the reasons why this regime somehow stood out in an international community that has many unpleasant regimes in it hasn't yet been presented by anybody. And that is the central failure of this court.

Was it a mistake not to allow foreign judges and foreign prosecutors at the tribunal ?

Yeah, I always thought that was a mistake. I wanted Iraqis involved, but I wanted a meeting of the two. I knew right up front that the judicial system, the judges, were simply not up to the task.

How do you feel when your countrymen in Baghdad now have to endure hours-long blackouts, and miles-long queues for petrol, water shortages, insurgent attacks and pervasive crime? Among both Sunnis and Shiites, some of them say they yearn for the days when Saddam was in power. How does hearing that make you feel?

I feel terrible and I understand why they say that. And I blame Iraqi politicians for it.

But on the issue of electricity and blackouts, there's a part of me, there's some little part of my brain that simply doesn't understand how the most powerful country on Earth just can't simply get electricity back on in Baghdad. . . . I've heard all the explanations. I've seen the reports. I know the technical stuff, but I find it mind-blowing that that was not solved.

It's been almost three years since the liberation of Iraq. Are you disappointed with how things have turned out thus far ?

Yes, no doubt in my mind. I'm sad. I'm very sad.

One Week In Baghdad (WP)

By Zeyad

BAGHDAD

SUNDAY, March 12 A sudden whizzzzzz . . . KABOOM sent me flying from the couch where I was dozing off, watching TV.

"What was that?" my father asked from the hallway.

"Probably a mortar round," I replied. "A close one."

"Good. They're lobbing mortars at us now. What's next?" he said and went back to his bedroom.

It's almost 9 p.m., a dangerous time to go outside. Neighborhood watch teams -- young men brandishing AK-47s, pistols, RPGs and even sniper rifles -- set up checkpoints around this time. Many were referred to as the "mujahideen" or insurgents in the past. Now, they are considered defenders of our largely Sunni district against Shiite death squads and militias.

I tried to stay interested in the Steven Seagal action flick on TV, but my focus kept shifting to the occasional rumble of mortar shells outside. After a while I went upstairs to use the Internet.

Just as I set foot in my room, an intense barrage of gunfire erupted on our street. Not good. My cellphone was ringing; it was a friend who lives down our street. "It's an American patrol," he almost whispered. "I can see Humvees from where I am. And it looks like they have Iraqi police with them."

"Keep your head down for God's sake."

I went to check on my younger brother, Nabil. He was playing his guitar to a Metallica tune, oblivious to his surroundings. His room has a better view, but it's not wise to stick one's head out of a window when Americans are nearby. The street was dark, but they have night vision goggles. A sniper bullet in the head is not a fun prospect, so I lay low and tried to listen.

I did hear a radio transmission from an Iraqi police vehicle, and what sounded like an American soldier shouting. The gunfire had ceased, probably after the local vigilantes had realized it was Americans, not militias or Interior ministry forc es entering our territory. The vehicles moved away, and the alarm level dropped.

No point in trying to figure out what happened. It could wait for the morning, when people would give you different versions of the incident.

I checked the door locks and called it a night.

MONDAY "The street is blocked," my taxi driver proclaimed as we approached my stop near a bus station in the Bab Al-Sharjee district in central Baghdad. "No problem. I'll get out here," I told him, forking over his fare. He grunted, and shifted into reverse.

I skulked along the remaining 300-meter stretch of street -- the main route taken by security officials from the Green Zone to the ministries' complex, and a favorite location for bombings. I usually just take a deep breath, light a cigarette and keep moving, sticking close to the wall. To my dismay, though, I found a police pickup vehicle parked in front of the bus station. A crowded bus station is already a juicy target for suicide bombers; a police patrol is an added attraction. But one has to shrug those tho ughts aside, or we'd all be clinically crazy by now.

Thankfully, the minibus didn't take long to fill -- with a couple of ladies in abayas, their two very noisy kids, a mechanic, a laborer (from the looks of him), an old man flipping through a newspaper, two nondescript young men and me, the suburba n dentist. Our destination: a district on the outskirts of the capital.

We passed through countless checkpoints manned by Iraqi troops. This time, the soldiers just waved us through. Sometimes they stop us and ask for our IDs. I gave up carrying mine some time ago; it revealed too much information, such as tribal, regional and sectarian background. I just use my neutral work ID now.

We noticed several American Humvees blocking the street. Our driver lurched onto the sidewalk and tried to squeeze through, but an American soldier yelled at him to go back, pointing his weapon at us. Without a moment's hesitation, the driver took us down a side road. Uh oh, I thought. This is where executed, blindfolded young men turn up every other day. In one cas e, bodies were found in a minibus -- just like the one I was in.

Any other day, I would have given up and gone home, but I needed to get my salary, because I can't rely on getting to work every day next week. Preparations for the Arbaeen religious anniversary are underway, and this road will be blocked to traffic to accommodate the hordes of Shiite pilgrims heading on foot to Karbala.

TUESDAY We were engrossed in morning preparations at work when a colleague called our attention to the latest "episode" of Saddam's trial -- a form of cheap entertainment for many Iraqis against the backdrop of dreary events in Baghdad. At least it's the one thing that Iraqis of all backgrounds agree upon.

Colleagues rushed, tea mugs in hand, to take a look at TV. Our clinic director wasn't amused, but he didn't protest. After all, there are no drugs in our pharmacy, my dental chair hasn't been fixed for months -- and even if it was, there are no anesthetics.

Iraqis have lost all hope for any real justice in this god-awful country. People here have long been accustomed to taking justice into their own hands -- or forgetting it altogether. "They should just lynch him and spare us this farce," one patient remarked. His comment sparked heated debate. I've heard all the arguments so I try not to listen. Iraqis are divided over everything. They can't even agree over a dictator who ruled them with a fist of steel for 30 years.

WEDNESDAY My neighbors suggested we go out for lunch today. They are a young couple living just across the street, with two kids, a girl and a boy, ages 11 and 5. I often spend time with them in the evening during the curfew, or around tea time.

I learned from my neighbor's wife that a stray bullet injured her mother's cousin during the firefight in our street three ni ghts ago. It went right through her window and shattered her collarbone. It was tragic, considering that her son was killed just months ago by kidnappers after the old widow failed to pay his ransom of $50,000.

We discussed the issue of Abu Ghassan, who lived next door to them until he decided to take his family and relocate to Syria. He is a very well-to-do businessman and a car battery dealer. His lavish lifestyle brought him unwanted attention in our area, and it took him one failed kidnapping attempt to decide to sell up and leave.

It was an excruciating scene, watching neighbors of a lifetime carry their suitcases at dawn to board an SUV to Syria. Being forced to leave your home is not a trivial affair. The country is being stripped of its intelligentsia, and I fear that soon we will be left only with fanatics. Add to that the forced migrations of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds out of mixed areas to sectarian strongholds.

We discussed these issues over a splendid meal of masgoof (roasted fish) on a refreshing sunny day on the bank of the Tigris, in the company of family and friends.

THURSDAY If there is any advantage of the Iraq war, it would have to be the endless stream of national and religious holidays. There was a daytime curfew today because of the opening parliamentary session, and not much activity is expected during the next week as the Arbaeen holiday will be taking place.

The new parliament was sworn in today. Our bickering politicians agreed to disagree yet again, and this time it was over the oath. I sometimes can't help wondering if it was the war that has left us so divided, or have we been that way all along.

The family stayed indoors for most of the day. For my mother it was a relief. She constantly worries and calls us on our phones, asking if everything is okay.

In addition to regular and fixed holidays, it is possible to make up your own, citing an unexpected security incident as an excuse. Many have mastered that useful trick. Personally, I use it sparingly because very often, I actually do get caught up in roadblocks.

People who need to make a living from day jobs, such as laborers, grocers and taxi drivers, are not impressed with the daytime curfews and holidays. Business is already suffering because of deteriorating security, power and fuel shortages. But lazy civil servants such as myself can lie back and enjoy the fruits of "liberation."

FRIDAY A quiet day, which left me to ponder a question that haunts me: We Iraqis continue to live between the hammer of terrorists and the anvil of American, British and Iraqi security forces. But what kind of a people are we to respond by killing our own?

Iraq's Insurgents: Who's Who (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Long considered a fragmentary and disorganized collection of groups with varying tactics and aims, Iraq's insurgency is showing signs of increasing coordination, consolidation and confidence, those who study it now say. There is no consensus on the precise number of insurgent fighters, but estimates range from a few thousand to more than 50,000. The vast majority of insurgents, probably more than 90 percent, are believed to be Iraqis from the Sunni minority group that largely ruled the country before the fall of Saddam Hussein. But U.S. commanders say that most of the deadliest attacks, and particularly suicide attacks, are committed by foreigners from a range of neighboring countries, including Jordan, Syrian, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Sudan.

-- Jonathan FinerLarger Groups

The formation of the Mujahidin Shura Council , announced on Jan. 21, was a sign of the once-diffuse insurgency's consolidation around the leadership of a few large, powerful groups. It brought together the foreign-backed network of al-Qaeda in Iraq, led by Jordanian Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and several smaller, Iraqi-led groups. The council's head was said to be an Iraqi, a move made to counter the image of al-Qaeda as dominated by Arabs from elsewhere in the region. This appointment may be little more than a public relations move. The group's tactics include attacks carried out with bombs, small arms and mortar against Iraqi and American soldiers, as well as, increasingly, Iraqi civilians, most of them Shiites. Two of its "brigades," or affiliates, (the bin Malik and the Al-Ansar) are devoted solely to suicide attacks. Another, the Omar Brigade, is said to target only members of the Badr organization, a feared Shiite militia.

Ansar al-Sunnah , which means "partisans of the law," is an offshoot of a group called Ansar al-Islam, which was formed in Kurdistan but has not been heard from in many months. The vast majority of its leaders and foot soldiers are Iraqi Sunnis who adhere to a strict, fundamentalist form of Islam called Salafism, which calls for a return to the practices of early Muslims and has gained radical expression throughout the Arab world. Their tactics -- including lethal suicide attacks -- and religious underpinnings are similar to those of al-Qaeda, but the two groups are considered bitter rivals for influence within the insurgent community. Among their best-known attacks was a roadside bomb blast that killed 14 Marines and an interpreter in August, the deadliest such attack of the war.

The stated goal of the Islamic Army in Iraq is to drive the U.S. military out of Iraq. Comprised almost entirely of Iraqi Sunnis, including many still loyal to Saddam Hussein's regime and Baath Party, it is considered more nationalistic than religious in motivation. As many as three-quarters of its attacks, which include improvised bombs and kidnappings but not suicide attacks, are conducted against U.S. forces and non-Iraqi contractors. It often releases video footage of its operations. The group publishes a monthly magazine called al-Fursan and has denied rumors circulating last summer that it was in discussions with Iraqi officials about laying down its weapons. Its members reportedly include a sniper named "Juba," who gained a cult following when he was said to have killed several American soldiers in Baghdad last summer and fall.

There is some discussion as to whether the Islamic Front of the Iraqi Resistance , one of the most highly publicized insurgent organizations, is actually an armed group or something of a public relations organ for other groups. It maintains a frequently updated Web site and publishes a magazine called Jami, an acronym composed of its Arabic initials, which also mean "mosque" or "gathering." It has claimed responsibility for a number of attacks in and around the northern city of Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city.Smaller groups

Mujahidin Army : A group that has released dozens of videos of bomb, rocket and sniper attacks, most of them directed against U.S. forces. Along with the Islamic Army in Iraq, it denied reports of rapprochement talks with the Iraqi government last year. It is one of a few smaller insurgent groups that called for attacks against Danish troops in the wake of the publication by a Danish newspaper of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad last fall.

Muhammad Army : A group made up mostly of Iraqi former Baathists and a few foreign fighters, it claimed credit for the 2003 bombing of the United Nations headquarters that killed 23 people, including the organization's chief of mission.

1920 Revolution Brigades : This group, which has claimed responsibility for a number of high-profile kidnappings of Westerners and Iraqis working with U.S. forces, is named for the Iraqi uprising against the British after World War I. The group calls itself the military wing of the Islamic Resistance Movement, another insurgent organization.

Conquering Army : A new group that has emerged in the past two months through a series of videos released on the Internet and to regional television networks showing kidnapping victims confessing to various "crimes" such as working with American forces.

Swords of the Righteous : A previously unknown group that gained prominence by claiming responsibility, in videos, for the kidnapping of four Christian Peacemaker workers, one of whom, Tom Fox of Virginia, was found dead March 10.

Iraqi Vengeance Brigades : A little-known group that has released videos showing American journalist Jill Carroll, who was abducted in Baghdad in early January.

"We refuse completely to participate [in the political process], because it ultimately benefits the occupiers, their followers and their agents. Their wicked aim is to attack Islam and humiliate its people, steal their wealth and support the Jews. . . . We will take revenge against all government figures or anyone related to it or supporting it, because it is a government of unbelief. I swear by Allah that if ever my father dealt with it -- or my mother, brother, sister, cousin or my son, and everyone who is related to me -- I shall cut his throat and I will not be sorry. . . .

". . . Practically and security-wise, we control all cities of Iraq and we challenge [Prime Minister Ibrahim] al-Jafari and all who claim that there is a government in Baghdad or any other city in Iraq to go out in the streets or remove the fortifications surrounding them and bring their families from outside Iraq to live in a normal way here. We have succeeded in placing them in a prison, like in the Green Zone. Even that is not safe anymore and is bombed every day. . . . We, meanwhile, are free to go everywhere in any city and choose our targets . . . .

". . . Be sure that the American Army is living now in a swamp of blood and is suffering a state of collapse. Also, the government forces are corrupt and falling apart psychologically. It will flee and soon, as the Americans announce the withdrawal of their forces, and this will happen very soon, Allah willing. The battle of Iraq will be the beginning of other battles in the area to topple the idols allied with Satan."

--Abu Hafsa al-Ansari, chief aide to al-Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, in a Feb. 23 interview with the Lebanese magazine al-Watan al-Arabiya

"How many times have a few people overcome plenty of people? . . . America has failed in three years to defeat a few hundred mujahidin, and its disgrace is very big. The most powerful army in the world . . . equipped with very sophisticated weapons . . . has failed to control very limited numbers of [mujahidin]. Oh my God, how is that?

". . . It is Allah's work. It is this great religion with all its greatness . . . facing barbarism in its lowest form. They are Allah's people facing Satan's people. . . . it is the mujahidin versus the mercenaries. . . . it is the weapon of faith versus the arsenal of destruction."

--From a document issued by the Global Islamic Media Front, an al-Qaeda mouthpiece

"We repeat our call to the Muslim people to understand the nature of the battle; they should know the identity of their enemies and what to do with them. We must put our efforts into supporting jihad and the mujahidin, because they are the fence that pushes away the power of the scum and keeps the Muslims safe. All of us know that the Shiite attack on the Sunni sections has been stopped. . . . What stopped it was the unity of the Sunni people with their sons, the mujahidin. . . .

"The mujahidin revealed the truth of the Shiites early. . . . Blood was shed and women dishonored, mosques burned and massacred, the Koran was desecrated by burning, tearing and kicking. They will pay a high price for it, so the Shiites will have only themselves to blame."

On Scene: How Operation Swarmer Fizzled

Not a shot was fired, or a leader nabbed, in a major offensive that failed to live up to its advance billing

By BRIAN BENNETT/AL JALLAM

Four Black Hawk helicopters landed in a wheat field and dropped off a television crew, three photographers, three print reporters and three Iraqi government officials right into the middle of Operation Swarmer. Iraqi soldiers in newly painted humvees, green and red Iraqi flags stenciled on the tailgates, had just finished searching the farm populated by a half-dozen skinny cows and a woman kneading freshly risen dough and slapping it to the walls of a mud oven.

The press, flown in from Baghdad to this agricultural gridiron northeast of Samarra, huddled around the Iraqi officials and U.S. Army commanders who explained that the "largest air assault since 2003" in Iraq using over 50 helicopters to put 1500 Iraqi and U.S. troops on the ground had netted 48 suspected insurgents, 17 of which had already been cleared and released. The area, explained the officials, has long been suspected of being used as a base for insurgents operating in and around Samarra, the city north of Baghdad where the bombing of a sacred shrine recently sparked a wave of sectarian violence.

But contrary to what many many television networks erroneously reported, the operation was by no means the largest use of airpower since the start of the war. ("Air Assault" is a military term that refers specifically to transporting troops into an area.) In fact, there were no airstrikes and no leading insurgents were nabbed in an operation that some skeptical military analysts described as little more than a photo op. What's more, there were no shots fired at all and the units had met no resistance, said the U.S. and Iraqi commanders.

The operation, which doubled the population of the flat farmland in one single airlift, was initiated by intelligence from Iraq security forces, says Lt Col Skip Johnson commander of the 187 Battallion, 3rd Combat Brigade of the 101st Airborne. "They have the lead," he said to reporters at the second stop of the tour. But by Friday afternoon, the major targets seemed to have slipped through their fingers. Iraqi Army General Abdul Jabar says that Samarra-based insurgent leader Hamad el Taki of Mohammad's Army was thought to be in the area, and Iraqi intelligence officers were still working to compare known voice recordings and photographs with the prisoners in custody.

With the Interior Ministry's Samarra commando battalion, the soldiers had found some 300 individual pieces of weaponry like mortars, rockets and plastic explosives in six different locations inside the sparsely populated farming community of over 50 square miles and about 1,500 residents. The raids also uncovered high-powered cordless telephones used as detonators in homemade bombs, medical supplies and insurgent training manuals.

Before loading up into the helicopters for a return trip to Baghdad, Iraqi and American soldiers and some reporters helped themselves to the woman's freshly baked bread, tearing bits off and chewing it as they wandered among the cows. For most of them, it was the only thing worthwhile they'd found all day.

More Insurgents Detained In U.S.-Iraqi Raids (LAT)

By the Associated Press

March 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — American and Iraqi troops pushing through a desolate area of Iraq's Sunni heartland rounded up dozens more suspected insurgents, including alleged killers of a television journalist, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saturday.

The third day of the sweep through villages near Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, stirred growing unease among leading Sunni Arabs. One called it a needless "escalation" at a time of difficult negotiations over forming a broad-based government.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, a dozen more bodies were found as a shadowy war of Shiite-Sunni reprisals apparently continued. And Shiite Muslims heading to the holy city of Karbala came under attack, with a roadside bomb killing one and wounding five.

Elsewhere, an oil tanker driver was shot dead 50 miles southeast of Baghdad, and a tribal sheik was slain 30 miles west of the capital.

In a radio address the day before the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion, President Bush said the violence in Iraq "has created a new sense of urgency" among Iraqi leaders to form a government.

Those leaders — representatives of the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish blocs in Iraq's new parliament — were taking a break from negotiations to observe Monday's Shiite holiday and Tuesday's Kurdish New Year.

They are deadlocked over how to apportion the most powerful jobs in the new government, as minority blocs seek to limit domination by Shiite Muslims.

In the counterinsurgency sweep through a 100-square-mile area of semidesert northeast of the Tigris River town of Samarra, Iraqi soldiers and units of the U.S. 101st Airborne Division had detained about 80 suspected insurgents as of Saturday, said Lt. Col. Edward S. Loomis, a U.S. spokesman. Seventeen were released after questioning, he said.

Among those detained were six people, not further identified, allegedly responsible for the March 11 killing of Amjad Hameed, director of the Iraqi television station Al Iraqiya, and his driver, Iraqi officials said.

In other action, Iraqi counterinsurgency troops staged a predawn raid near Baqubah, about 30 miles north of Baghdad, touching off a clash in which two gunmen were killed, one was wounded and 18 were arrested, Brig. Saman Talabani said.

Besides ammunition and weapons, the soldiers seized computer discs of fatwas, or religious edicts, calling for the killing of Iraqi police and soldiers, he said.

At least 2,300 American military personnel have died since the Iraq war began.

Shiite Pilgrims Are Walking Targets In Sectarian Conflict (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

DOJ_NMG_0018869

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 18 — Shiite pilgrims are threading a needle of danger this week as they make their annual pilgrimage to a shrine in Karbala, in southern Iraq.

Many of them are doing it defiantly.

On Saturday, Ali Jassim, 22, was hiking along a Baghdad highway, hoisting a huge Shiite flag, wearing the distinctive all-black pilgrim's uniform and projecting full-blown Shiite pride.

"I know the Sunnis are after us," he said.

His friend, Monir Abd al-Rad, who was trudging alongside him, tried to quiet him down.

"We are all brothers," he said.

"Rubbish," Mr. Jassim shot back. "Nobody wants to say it, but there is a sectarian war. And we are its targets."

The pilgrimage route from Baghdad to Karbala cuts straight across territory so overrun by Sunni Arab insurgents that the American military calls it the Triangle of Death. This year that triangle is deadlier than ever, with Shiite-Sunni tensions peaking.

Hundreds of thousands of Shiite pilgrims are taking the risk, marching the 50 miles from Baghdad to Karbala to commemorate the death of Imam Hussein, the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad.

Several have already paid the price.

On Friday, eight pilgrims were shot in drive-by shootings, though American and Iraqi forces patrolled nearby.

On Saturday, a string of bombs exploded along the route, wounding several people. Several pilgrims are now making the trek with assault rifles slung across their shoulders, for the first time anyone here can remember.

The violence is part of the sectarian shadow falling across Iraq. On Saturday, more bodies turned up. Interior Ministry officials said 16 men, all unidentified, were found dead with their hands tied behind their back and bullets in their heads. In the past week, nearly 200 bodies surfaced on Baghdad's streets, many of them dumped in clusters.

The widespread suspicion is that most were victims of Shiite death squads who went on a quiet but steady killing spree after a bomb attack on a Shiite market in Baghdad one week ago.

In the past few days, American officials in Baghdad have expressed more concern about the security situation than usual.

Despite recent vows to let Iraqi forces take the lead in security matters, United States commanders initiated a large-scale helicopter offensive this week against insurgents near Samarra, the city where an important Shiite shrine was bombed Feb. 22 , the incident that set off a cycle of sectarian killings.

The helicopter operation used a mix of Iraqi and American troops. On Saturday, the military said it had captured more people suspected of being insurgents, bringing the operation's total to 80, though many were quickly released.

An Iraqi army spokesman said Iraqi soldiers had captured six suspects connected to the recent assassination of two Iraqi journalists, though it was not clear if these suspects had been swept up in the Samarra raid.

Also on Saturday, several high-ranking Iraqi officials met with the British defense minister, John Reid, who visiting Baghdad to mark the three-year anniversary of the American-led invasion of Iraq on March 20.

Iraqi leaders have been struggling to form a government of national unity and a new divisive issue has emerged: whether to empower a national security council with executive authority.

Mr. Reid urged the leaders to resolve their differences quickly. "Terrorists love a vacuum," he said at a news conference.

The Iraqi defense minister, Saadun al-Dulaimi, thanked Mr. Reid for helping oust Saddam Hussein three years ago but added, "We can't rely on friendly forces forever."

In Kirkuk, a city north of Baghdad with population of Kurds, Shiites and Sunni Arabs, three people were killed and 11 wounded in a spate of attacks on Saturday.

The American military said two American soldiers were killed by indirect fire, which usually means mortars, near Tikrit on Thursday.

Mortars also seriously injured three Iraqi children in Ramadi on Friday, according to the American military. The children were playing outside when the mortars hit.

Saddam's Philippines Terror Connection (WS)

By Stephen F. Hayes

DOJ_NMG_0018870

The Weekly Standard, March 19, 2006

And other revelations from the Iraqi regime files

SADDAM HUSSEIN'S REGIME PROVIDED FINANCIAL support to Abu Sayyaf, the al Qaeda-linked jihadist group founded by Osama bin Laden's brother-in-law in the Philippines in the late 1990s, according to documents captured in postwar Iraq. An eight-page fax dated June 6, 2001, and sent from the Iraqi ambassador in Manila to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Baghdad, provides an update on Abu Sayyaf kidnappings and indicates that the Iraqi regime was providing the group with money to purchase weapons. The Iraqi regime suspended its support--temporarily, it seems--after high-profile kidnappings, including of Americans, focused international attention on the terrorist group.

The fax comes from the vast collection of documents recovered in postwar Afghanistan and Iraq. Up to this point, those materials have been kept from the American public. Now the proverbial dam has broken. On March 16, the U.S. government posted on the web 9 documents captured in Iraq, as well as 28 al Qaeda documents that had been released in February. Earlier last week, Foreign Affairs magazine published a lengthy article based on a review of 700 Iraqi documents by analysts with the Institute for Defense Analysis and the Joint Forces Command in Norfolk, Virginia. Plans for the release of many more documents have been announced. And if the contents of the recently released materials and other documents obtained by The Weekly Standard are any indication, the discussion of the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq is about to get more interesting.

Several months ago, The Weekly Standard received a set of English-language

documents from a senior U.S. government official. The official represented this material as U.S. government translations of three captured Iraqi documents. According to this source, the documents had been examined by the U.S. intelligence community and judged "consistent with authentic documents"--the professionals' way of saying that these items cannot definitively be certified but seem to be the real thing.

The Weekly Standard checked its English-language documents with officials serving elsewhere in the federal government to make sure they were consistent with the versions these officials had seen. With what one person characterized as "minor discrepancies," they are. One of the three documents has been posted in the original Arabic on the website of the Office of the Director of National Intelligence. A subsequent translation of that document is nearly identical to the English-language text that we were given.

These documents add to the growing body of evidence confirming the Iraqi regime's longtime support for terrorism abroad. The first of them, a series of memos from the spring of 2001, shows that the Iraqi Intelligence Service funded Abu Sayyaf, despite the reservations of some IIS officials. The second, an internal Iraqi Intelligence memo on the relationships between the IIS and Saudi opposition groups, records that Osama bin Laden requested Iraqi cooperation on terrorism and propaganda and that in January 1997 the Iraqi regime was eager to continue its relationship with bin Laden. The third, a September 15, 2001, report from an Iraqi Intelligence source in Afghanistan, contains speculation about the relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda and the likely U.S. response to it.

ON JUNE 6, 2001, the Iraqi ambassador to the Philippines sent an eight-page fax to Baghdad. Ambassador Salah Samarmad's dispatch to the Secondary Policy Directorate of the Iraqi Foreign Ministry concerned an Abu Sayyaf kidnapping a week earlier that had garnered international attention. Twenty civilians--including three Americans--had been taken from Dos Palmas Resort on Palawan Island in the southern Philippines. There had been fighting between the kidnappers and the Filipino military, Samarmad reported. Several hostages had escaped, and others were released.

"After the release of nine of the hostages, an announcement from the FBI appeared in newspapers announcing their desire to interview the escaped Filipinos in order to make a decision on the status of the three American hostages," the Iraqi ambassador wrote to his superiors in Baghdad. "The embassy stated what was mentioned above. The three American hostages were a missionary husband and wife who had lived in the Philippines for a while, Martin and Gracia Burnham, from Kansas City, and Guillermo Sobrero, from California. They are still in the hands of the Abu Sayyaf kidnappers from a total of 20 people who were kidnapped from (Dos Palmas) resort on Palawan Island." (Except where noted, parentheses, brackets, and ellipses appear in the documents quoted.)

The report notes that the Iraqis were now trying to be seen as helpful and keep a safe distance from Abu Sayyaf. "We have all cooperated in the field of intelligence information with some of our friends to encourage the tourists and the investors in the Philippines." But Samarmad's report seems to confirm that this is a change. "The kidnappers were formerly (from the previous year) receiving money and purchasing combat weapons. From now on we (IIS) are not giving them this opportunity and are not on speaking terms with them."

Samarmad's dispatch appears to be the final installment in a series of internal Iraqi regime memos from March through June 2001. (The U.S. government translated some of these documents in full and summarized others.) The memos contain a lengthy discussion among Iraqi officials--from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Iraqi Intelligence Service--about the wisdom of using a Libyan intelligence front as a way to channel Iraqi support for Abu Sayyaf without the risks of dealing directly with the group. (The Libyan regime had intervened in an Abu Sayyaf kidnapping in 2000, securing the release of several hostages by paying several million dollars in ransom. Some observers saw this as an effort by Muammar Qaddafi to improve his image; others saw it as an effort to provide support to Abu Sayyaf by paying the ransom demanded by the group. Both were probably right.)

One Iraqi memo, from the "Republican Presidency, Intelligence Apparatus" to someone identified only as D4/4, makes the case for supporting the work of the Qaddafi Charity Establishment to help Abu Sayyaf. The memo is dated March 18, 2001.

1. There are connections between the Qaddafi Charity Establishment and the Abu Sayyaf group in the Philippines; meanwhile, this establishment is providing material support to them.

2. This establishment is one of the Libyan Intelligence fronts.

3. The Tripoli post has indicated that there is a possibility to form what connections are available with this establishment as it can offer the premise of providing food supplies to [Ed: word missing] in the scope of the agreement statement.

Please review . . . it appears of intelligence value to proceed into connections with this establishment and its intelligence investments in the Abu Sayyaf group.

The short response, two days later:

Mr. Dept. 3:

Study this idea, the pros and the cons, the relative reactions, and any other remarks regarding this.

That exchange above was fully translated by U.S. government translators. The two pages of correspondence that follow it in the Iraqi files were not, but a summary of those pages informs readers that the Iraqi response "discourages the supporting of connections with the Abu Sayyaf group, as the group works against the Philippine government and relies on several methods for material gain, such as kidnapping foreigners, demanding ransoms, as well as being accused by the Philippine government of terrorist acts and drug smuggling."

These accusations were, of course, well founded. On June 12, 2001, six days after Samarmad's dispatch, authorities found the beheaded body of Guillermo Sobrero near the Abu Sayyaf camp. Martin Burnham was killed a year later during the rescue attempt that freed his wife.

A thorough understanding of the relationship between Iraq and Abu Sayyaf (the name, honoring Afghan jihadi Abdul Rasul Sayyaf, means "Father of the Sword") will not come from an analysis of three months' correspondence between Manila and Baghdad in 2001. While it is certainly significant to read in internal Iraqi documents that the regime was at one time funding Abu Sayyaf, we do not now have a complete picture of that relationship. Why did the Iraqis begin funding Abu Sayyaf, which had long been considered a regional terrorist group concerned mainly with making money? Why did they suspend their support in 2001? And why did the Iraqis resume this relationship and, according to the congressional testimony of one State Department regional specialist, intensify it?

ON MARCH 26, 2003, as war raged in Iraq, the State Department's Matthew Daley testified before Congress. Daley, the deputy assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, told a subcommittee of the House International Relations Committee that he was worried about Abu Sayyaf.

"We're concerned that they have what I would call operational links to Iraqi intelligence services. And they're a danger, they're an enemy of the Philippines, they're an enemy of the United States, and we want very much to help the government in Manila deal with this challenge," Daley told the panel. Responding to a question, Daley elaborated. "There is good reason to believe that a member of the Abu Sayyaf Group who has been involved in terrorist activities was in direct contact with an IIS officer in the Iraqi Embassy in Manila. This individual was subsequently expelled from the Philippines for engaging in activities that were incompatible with his diplomatic status."

This individual was Hisham Hussein, the second secretary of the Iraqi Embassy in Manila. And Daley was right to be concerned.

Eighteen months before his testimony, a young Filipino man rode his Honda motorcycle up a dusty road to a shanty strip mall just outside Camp Enrile Malagutay in Zamboanga City, Philippines. The camp was host to American troops stationed in the south of the country to train with Filipino soldiers fighting terrorists. The man parked his bike and began to examine its gas tank. Seconds later, the tank exploded, sending nails in all directions and killing the rider almost instantly.

The blast damaged six nearby stores and ripped the front off of a café that doubled as a karaoke bar. The café was popular with American soldiers. And on this day, October 2, 2002, SFC Mark Wayne Jackson was killed there and a fellow soldier was severely wounded. Eyewitnesses almost immediately identified the bomber as an Abu Sayyaf terrorist.

One week before the attack, Abu Sayyaf leaders had promised a campaign of terror directed at the "enemies of Islam"--Westerners and the non-Muslim Filipino majority. And one week after the attack, Abu Sayyaf attempted to strike again, this time with a bomb placed on the playground of the San Roque Elementary School. It did not detonate. Authorities recovered the cell phone that was to have set it off and analyzed incoming and outgoing calls.

As they might have expected, they discovered several calls to and from Abu Sayyaf leaders. But another call got their attention. Seventeen hours after the attack that took the life of SFC Jackson, the cell phone was used to place a call to the second secretary of the Iraqi embassy in Manila, Hisham Hussein. It was not Hussein's only contact with Abu Sayyaf.

"He was surveilled, and we found out he was in contact with Abu Sayyaf and also pro-Iraqi demonstrators," says a Philippine government source, who continued, "[Philippine intelligence] was able to monitor their cell phone calls. [Abu Sayyaf leaders] called him right after the bombing. They were always talking."

An analysis of Iraqi embassy phone records by Philippine authorities showed that Hussein had been in regular contact with Abu Sayyaf leaders both before and after the attack that killed SFC Jackson. Andrea Domingo, immigration commissioner for the Philippines, said Hussein ran an "established network" of terrorists in the country. Hussein had also met with members of the New People's Army, a Communist opposition group on the State Department's list of foreign terrorist groups, in his office at the embassy. According to a Philippine government official, the Philippine National Police uncovered documents in a New People's Army compound that indicate the Iraqi embassy had provided funding for the group. Hisham Hussein and two other Iraqi embassy employees were ordered out of the Philippines on February 14, 2003.

Interestingly, an Abu Sayyaf leader named Hamsiraji Sali at least twice publicly boasted that his group received funding from Iraq. For instance, on March 2, 2003, he told the Philippine Daily Inquirer that the Iraqi regime had provided the terrorist group with 1million pesos--about $20,000--each year since 2000.

ANOTHER ITEM from the Iraq-Philippines files is a "security report" prepared by the Iraqi embassy's third secretary, Ahmad Mahmud Ghalib, and sent to Baghdad by Ambassador Samarmad. The report provides a behind-the-scenes glimpse of the Iraqi Intelligence operation in the Philippines. A cover memo from the ambassador, dated April 12, 2001, gives an overview: "The report contain[s] a variety of issues including intelligence issues and how the Philippines, American and Zionist intelligence operate in the Philippines, especially the movements of the American intelligence in their efforts to fight terrorism and recruiting a variety of nationalities, particularly Arabs."

Ghalib's report is a rambling account of a phone conversation he had with an Iraqi intelligence informer named Muhammad al-Zanki, an Iraqi citizen living in the Philippines, who is referred to throughout the document as Abu Ahmad. The embassy official is looking for information on a third person, an informer named Omar Ghazal, and believes that Abu Ahmad might have some. (To review: Salah Samarmad is the Iraqi ambassador; Ahmad Mahmud Ghalib is the embassy's third secretary, most likely an Iraqi intelligence officer and author of the "security report"; Abu Ahmad is an Iraqi intelligence informer; and Omar Ghazal is another Iraqi intelligence informer.)

As the conversation begins, Abu Ahmad tells his embassy contact that he doesn't know where Omar Ghazal is and would have told the embassy if he did. He then tells the embassy contact that when he called Omar Ghazal's aunt to check on his whereabouts, she used a word in Tagalog--walana--which means "not here." But Abu Ahmad says its connotations are not good. "That word is used when you target one of the personnel who are assigned to complete everything (full mission). Then they announce that he is traveling and so on, and that's what I'm afraid of." The Iraqi embassy contact asks him to elaborate. "I have been exposed to that same phrase before, when I asked about an individual, and later on I found out that he was physically eliminated and no one knows anything about him."

The embassy official assures Abu Ahmad that Iraqi intelligence has also lost track of Ghazal, and became alarmed when he abruptly stopped attending soccer practice at a local college. Abu Ahmad fears the worst. "I'm afraid they might have killed him and I'm very worried about him," he says, according to the report. "The method that those people use is terrible and that's why I refuse to work with them."

The Iraqi embassy official interrupts Abu Ahmad. "Who are they? I would like to know who they are."

"Didn't I tell you before who they are?"

"No."

"The office group," says Abu Ahmad.

"Which office?" asks his Iraqi embassy handler.

"A long time ago the American FBI opened up an office in the Philippines, under American supervision and that there are Philippine Intelligence groups that work there. The goal of the office is to fight international terrorism (in the Philippines of course) and they have employees from various nationalities that speak of peace and international terrorism and how important it is to put an end to terrorism. The office also has other espionage affairs involving Arab citizens to work with them in order to provide them with information on the Arabs who are living in the Philippines and also for other spying purposes."

Abu Ahmad continues: "They also monitor diplomacy, and after I tried to lessen my amount of office work, I became aware that the office group was trying to get in contact with the person who is in charge of temporary work, Malik al-Athir, when he was alone."

Abu Ahmad tells his Iraqi embassy contact, Ghalib, that "the office" was trying to recruit an Arab to monitor Arab citizens in the Philippines. The Iraqi embassy contact suggests that Abu Ahmad volunteer for the job. Abu Ahmad says he had other plans. "I am leaving after I finish selling my house and properties and will move to Peshawar [Pakistan]. There I will be supplied with materials, weapons, explosives, and get married and then move to America. Do you know that there are more than one thousand Iraqi extremists who perform heroism jobs?" The speaker presumably means martyrdom operations.

The Iraqi embassy contact asks Abu Ahmad how he knows that those people are not "Saudis, Kuwaitis, Iranians."

Abu Ahmad replies: "They are bin Laden's people and all of them are extremists and they are heroes. Do you want me to give you their names?"

"Why not? Yes, I want them," says the Iraqi embassy contact.

"I will supply you with the names very soon. I will write some for you because I am in touch with them," says Abu Ahmad.

This report raises more questions than it answers. Who is Omar Ghazal and why did he disappear? What is the "office group" and how is it connected to Americans? What happened to Abu Ahmad? Were his stated plans--moving to Peshawar to obtain weapons and explosives and then moving to the United States--just bluster to impress his Iraqi embassy handler? A way to discontinue his work for the Iraqi regime? Or was he serious? Is he here now?

A SECOND internal Iraqi file obtained by The Weekly Standard concerns relations between Iraqi Intelligence and Saudi opposition groups. The document was apparently compiled at some point after January 1997, judging by the most recent date in the text, and discusses four Saudi opposition groups: the Committee for Defense of Legitimate Rights, the Reform and Advice Committee (Osama bin Laden), People of al Jazeera Union Organization, and the Saudi Hezbollah.

The New York Times first reported on the existence of this file on June 25, 2004. "American officials described the document as an internal report by the Iraqi intelligence service detailing efforts to seek cooperation with several Saudi opposition groups, including Mr. bin Laden's organization, before al Qaeda had become a full-fledged terrorist organization." According to the Times, a Pentagon task force "concluded that the document 'appeared authentic,' and that it 'corroborates and expands on previous reporting' about contacts between Iraqi intelligence and Mr. bin Laden in Sudan, according to the task force's analysis."

The most provocative aspect of the document is the discussion of efforts to seek cooperation between Iraqi Intelligence and the Saudi opposition group run by bin Laden, known to the Iraqis as the "Reform and Advice Committee." The translation of that section appears below.

We moved towards the committee by doing the following:

A. During the visit of the Sudanese Dr. Ibrahim al-Sanusi to Iraq and his meeting with Mr. Uday Saddam Hussein, on December 13, 1994, in the presence of the respectable, Mr. Director of the Intelligence Service, he [Dr. al-Sanusi] pointed out that the opposing Osama bin Laden, residing in Sudan, is reserved and afraid to be depicted by his enemies as an agent of Iraq. We prepared to meet him in Sudan (The Honorable Presidency was informed of the results of the meeting in our letter 782 on December 17, 1994).

B. An approval to meet with opposer Osama bin Laden by the Intelligence Services was given by the Honorable Presidency in its letter 138, dated January 11, 1995 (attachment 6). He [bin Laden] was met by the previous general director of M4 in Sudan and in the presence of the Sudanese, Ibrahim al-Sanusi, on February 19, 1995. We discussed with him his organization. He requested the broadcast of the speeches of Sheikh Sulayman al-Uda (who has influence within Saudi Arabia and outside due to being a well known religious and influential personality) and to designate a program for them through the broadcast directed inside Iraq, and to perform joint operations against the foreign forces in the land of Hijaz. (The Honorable Presidency was informed of the details of the meeting in our letter 370 on March 4, 1995, attachment 7.)

C. The approval was received from the Leader, Mr. President, may God keep him, to designate a program for them through the directed broadcast. We were left to develop the relationship and the cooperation between the two sides to see what other doors of cooperation and agreement open up. The Sudanese side was informed of the Honorable Presidency's agreement above, through the representative of the Respectable Director of Intelligence Services, our Ambassador in Khartoum.

D. Due to the recent situation of Sudan and being accused of supporting and embracing of terrorism, an agreement with the opposing Saudi Osama bin Laden was reached. The agreement required him to leave Sudan to another area. He left Khartoum in July 1996. The information we have indicates that he is currently in Afghanistan. The relationship with him is ongoing through the Sudanese side. Currently we are working to invigorate this relationship through a new channel in light of his present location.

(It should be noted that the documents given to The Weekly Standard did not include the attachments, letters to and from Saddam Hussein about the status of the Iraq-al Qaeda relationship. And the last sentence differs slightly from the version provided to the New York Times. In the Weekly Standard document, Iraq is seeking to "invigorate" its relationship with al Qaeda; in the Times translation, Iraq is seeking to "continue" that relationship.)

Another passage of the Iraq-Saudi opposition memo details the relationship between the Iraqi regime and the Committee for Defense of Legitimate Rights (CDLR), founded by Dr. Muhammad Abdallah al-Massari. Once again, Dr. Ibrahim al-Sanusi, the senior Sudanese government official, was a key liaison between the two sides. Al-Massari is widely regarded as an ideological mouthpiece for al Qaeda, a designation he does little to dispute. His radio station broadcasts al Qaeda propaganda, and his website features the rantings of prominent jihadists. He has lived in London for more than a decade. The Iraqi Intelligence memo recounts two meetings involving Dr. al-Sanusi and CDLR representatives in 1994 and reports that al-Massari requested assistance from the Iraqi regime for a trip to Iraq.

In 1995, the Iraqis turned to another Saudi to facilitate their relationship with al-Massari. According to the Iraqi memo, Ahmid Khudir al-Zahrani was a diplomat at the Saudi embassy in Washington who applied for political asylum in the United States. His application was denied, and al-Zahrani contacted the Iraqi embassy in London, seeking asylum in Iraq. His timing was good. Al-Zahrani's request came just as Iraqis were stepping up efforts to establish better relations with the Saudi opposition. According to the Iraqi Intelligence memo:

A complete plan was put in place to bring the aforementioned [al-Zahrani] to Iraq in coordination with the Foreign Ministry and our [intelligence] station in Khartoum [Sudan]. He and his family were issued Iraqi passports with pseudonyms by our embassy in Khartoum. He arrived to Iraq on April 21, 1995, and multiple meetings were held with him to obtain information about the Saudi opposition.

These contacts were not, contrary to the speculation of some Middle East experts, simply an effort to keep tabs on an enemy. The memo continues, summarizing Iraqi Intelligence activities:

We are in the process of following up on the subject, to try and establish a nucleus of Saudi opposition in Iraq, and use our relationship with [al-Massari] to serve our intelligence goals.

The final document provided to The Weekly Standard is a translation of a memo from the "Republican Command, Intelligence Division," dated September 15, 2001. It is addressed to "Mr. M.A.M.5."

Our Afghani source number 11002 (his biographic information in attachment #1) has provided us information that the Afghani consul Ahmed Dahestani (his biographic information attachment #2) has talked in front of him about the following:

1. That Osama bin Laden and the Taliban group in Afghanistan are in communication with Iraq and that previously a group of Taliban and Osama bin Laden have visited Iraq.

2. That America has evidence that the Iraqi government and the group of Osama bin Laden have cooperated to attack targets inside America.

3. In the event that it has been proven that the group of Osama bin Laden and the Taliban planning such operations, it is possible that America will attack Iraq and Afghanistan.

4. That the Afghani consul heard of the relation between Iraq and the group of Osama bin Laden while he was in Iran.

5. In the light of what has been presented, we suggest to write to the committee of information.

This document is speculative in parts, and the information it contains is third-hand at best. Its value depends on the credibility of "source number 11002" and of Ahmed Dahestani and of the sources Dahestani relied on, all of which are unknown.

We are left, then, with three small pieces to add to a large and elaborate puzzle. We will never have a complete picture of the Iraqi regime's support for global terrorism, but the coming release of a flood of captured documents should get us closer.

A new and highly illuminating article in Foreign Affairs draws on hundreds of Iraqi documents to provide a look at the Iraq war from the Iraqi perspective. The picture that emerges is that of an Iraqi regime built on a foundation of paranoia and lies and eager to attack its perceived enemies, internal and external. This paragraph is notable:

The Saddam Fedayeen also took part in the regime's domestic terrorism operations and planned for attacks throughout Europe and the Middle East. In a document dated May 1999, Saddam's older son, Uday, ordered preparations for "special operations, assassinations, and bombings, for the centers and traitor symbols in London, Iran and the self-ruled areas [Kurdistan]." Preparations for "Blessed July," a regime-directed wave of "martyrdom" operations against targets in the West, were well under way at the time of the coalition invasion.

Think about that last sentence.

US Puts Iraqi Documents On The Web (BOS)

By Hiawatha Bray

The Boston Globe, March 19, 2006

Goal is to speed up translation of files

Joseph Shahda of Randolph earns his living as an engineer. But in his spare time, he's an intelligence agent, working to ferret out the truth about the regime of deposed Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein.

When the US government on Thursday began publishing captured Iraqi government documents on the Internet, Shahda eagerly began to translate the files into English and publish them on a conservative website.

"I feel a sense of duty," said Shahda, a native of Lebanon who supports President Bush's decision to invade Iraq. "I think it's a duty for people who know Arabic to translate the documents."

US officials hope that thousands of other Arabic speakers feel the same. Goaded by Congress, Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte has begun to release millions of pages of captured files online in an unprecedented effort to harness the Internet to disseminate raw intelligence material. There, anybody with a knowledge of Arabic can download the files and translate them for the world.

It's the same "open source" principle that drove the successful development of the Internet and of powerful free software like the Linux operating system. Instead of hiring a team of brilliant professionals to analyze Iraqi documents in secret, the open source systems will use hundreds of clever amateurs, who'll publish their work for anyone to analyze and improve upon.

"Workers control the means of production, but without all that tedious communism," said Glenn Reynolds, a law professor at the University of Tennessee and author of "An Army of Davids," a book that shows how the Internet encourages public activism.

US intelligence officials say nearly all the documents released have been given at least a cursory reading by Arabic experts. Beth Marple, Negroponte's deputy press secretary, said amateur translators won't find any major surprises, such as proof Hussein hid stockpiles of chemical weapons.

Still, conservative bloggers, eager to bolster the case for going to war against Iraq, have long argued for release of the documents. They gained a powerful ally last month in Michigan Republican Pete Hoekstra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. In an interview with blogger Andrew Marcus, Hoekstra called for Negroponte to release the documents online. "Unleash the power of the Net," Hoekstra said. "Let the blogosphere go." Kansas Republican Pat Roberts, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, backed Hoekstra's proposal.

Within hours of the first release of documents, Shahda posted his first translation on the conservative website Free Republic. It was an Iraqi intelligence report of an interview with an Afghan informant that suggests -- but does not prove -- agents of Al Qaeda and the Taliban were active in Iraq before the Sept. 11 attacks.

According to an intelligence official who declined to be identified, Negroponte plans to release all documents that have no further intelligence value. Files that might help apprehend members of the Iraqi insurgency will remain under wraps. So will files that could violate the privacy or harm the reputations of innocent people. For instance, the Hussein regime used rape as a method of torture, and the government won't release documents containing the names of Iraqi rape victims. Nor will it release files mentioning Iraqi-Americans or other US citizens, such as journalists.

The remaining documents, the official said, will mainly provide insights into Hussein's rule. "This stuff needs to be laid bare because it helps the democratic process in Iraq, like it did in South Africa, like it did in Germany," he said.

At least one Iraqi blogger agrees. "We are currently trying to organize a network of bilingual Iraqi bloggers to translate as many of the documents as possible," said "Omar," a Baghdad dentist who publishes IraqTheModel, which is widely read in the United States. Omar will not reveal his full name because his support for the overthrow of Saddam Hussein could put him in danger of death.

While conservative US bloggers, and some Iraqis, are eager to translate and read the Iraq documents, some prominent liberal bloggers scoffed at the release. "To me, this is just more evidence that the Bush administration doesn't take national security seriously," wrote Markos Moulitsas Zúniga, founder of the popular Daily Kos website. "Why doesn't our government have enough translators to handle this job?"

Jonathan Singer, weekend editor of the liberal site MyDD.com, was equally dismissive. "The Hussein documents are not of great interest to me," said Singer, "for the simple reason that they simply reinforce the notion that the Bush administration cherry picks intelligence to suit their needs."

Demonstrations Mark Third Anniversary Of Iraq Invasion (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

About 1,000 people gathered near Times Square yesterday, in one of dozens of energetic and often unfocused rallies held in cities across the United States and around the world to protest the third anniversary of the United States invasion of Iraq.

Yesterday's protests, like those held to mark each of the two previous anniversaries of the March 2003 invasion, were vigorous and peaceful but far smaller than the large-scale marches that preceded the war, despite polls showing lower public support for the war than in years past and anemic approval ratings for President Bush, himself a focus of many of the protesters.

But the Iraq war itself — though the obvious inspiration for the march — was noticeably less central to the proceedings than in previous years. The rally in Times Square featured dozens of speakers on topics ranging from relations with Iran to the treatment of Hurricane Katrina refugees.

"No group owns the day," said Dustin Langley, a spokesman for the Troops Out Now Coalition, which helped organize protests in New York, Boston, Washington, Los Angeles, Atlanta and other cities. "Whoever you are, be out there on the streets."

Tens of thousands of people marched in Rome, while officials in London reported a crowd of 15,000. Other demonstrations occurred in Greece, Turkey, Spain, Brazil, Australia and Canada.

One of the biggest protests in the United States was held in San Francisco, for decades a hub of antiwar sentiment. The police there estimated the crowd gathered outside City Hall at 6,000. Many chanted slogans opposing Mr. Bush, and most appeared to hail from a distinctly grayer demographic than that of other protest events.

"There are not enough young people here," said Paul Perchonock, 61, a medical doctor from the Bay Area. "They don't see themselves as having a stake."

In his weekly radio address, President Bush defended the administration's record in Iraq, saying that the country's decision to depose the regime of Saddam Hussein was "a difficult decision—and it was the right decision." He pledged to "finish the mission" despite calls for withdrawal.

Today marks the third anniversary of the invasion.

In Washington, a relatively small crowd of about 300 people gathered at the United States Naval Observatory, where Vice President Dick Cheney lives.

Debbie Boch, 52, a restaurant manager from Denver, said she and two friends bought plane tickets to Washington two months ago, before the demonstration had been planned. It was the fifth protest march she attended since the war began, she said, and among the smallest.

"It's very disappointing, especially in Washington, D.C.," she said. "You think this is the place where people come to make things happen. I'm just not sure why there aren't more people hear today."

But other marchers took solace from recent opinion polls showing public opinion slowly drifting against the war.

"Three years ago, folks thought we were crazy; two years ago, people still thought we were crazy," said the Rev. Graylan Scott Hagler, a minister at Plymouth Congregational United Church of Christ in Washington. "We know now that most of the American people do not believe that we are crazy anymore."

In New York, protesters gathered on three lanes of Broadway south of 42nd Street, after the city denied the organizers permission to set up near an armed services recruitment office. Mounted police patrolled the avenue, while dozens of police officers attempted to keep traffic moving on the street and sidewalk.

The demonstrators, bundled against the cold and confined by police fences to a two-block stretch, came from as close as Chelsea and as far away as South Korea. Quakers mixed with communists and labor organizers with high school students, as antiwar entrepreneurs hawked T-shirts under the sultry gaze of a Calvin Klein model, reclining in a massive billboard advertisement overhead.

"I am just sick and grief stricken that we are continuing this war in Iraq," said Julie Finch, 63, who lives in Manhattan. "I mourn every soldier that dies. This war was based on lies."

A nearby Starbucks — a chain once disparaged by the anti-globalization protesters from which today's antiwar movement draws some inspiration — served as a warming hut and bathroom station for the protesters, even serving up a latte or two to placard-brandishing customers. Journalists conducted interviews in the heated vestibule of a Gap store on 42nd Street until a security guard asked them to move.

A recorded message from Mumia Abu-Jamal, an inmate in Pennsylvania and a left-wing cause célèbre, drifted across the speakers as garbled as the service announcements emanating from subway speakers in the station below ground.

Around 2:30 p.m., the rally turned into a march, as those gathered walked around the corner down 42nd Street, bound for the United Nations. They moved slowly, sprawling the length of two crosstown blocks, with a few Katrina refugees at the column's front. At the back, Devin Kyle, 26, and Tonia Shoumatoff, 50, carried a 20-foot banner reading, simply, "May Peace Prevail."

"Rather than fight hatred with hatred," Mr. Kyle said, "I came here to be a peaceful presence."

Anti-War Rallies Mark Iraq Anniversary (WP/AP)

By Paul Burkhardt, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

NEW YORK -- Thousands of anti-war protesters took to the streets around the world Saturday, marking the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq with demands that coalition troops leave immediately.

Wael Musfar of the Arab Muslim American Federation addressed more than 1,000 people who gathered in Times Square near a military recruiting station, which was guarded by police.

"We say enough hypocrisy, enough lies, our soldiers must come home now," Musfar said from a parked flatbed truck. Participants chanted, "Stop the U.S. war machine, from Iraq to Korea to the Philippines."

Many attendees emphasized that they support the troops. "I have friends in Iraq and I just want them to know that I may not be able to support them there, but I can here," said Jose Avila, 36.

Protesters in Chicago marched down Michigan Avenue to a Saturday night rally at downtown's Daley Plaza. Police estimated that more than 7,000 people took part, but said there were no arrests.

"I'm against this war, I'm against the torture," said protester Martha Conrad, 54, of Chicago. "We're doing this for the people of Iraq."

One bystander, with a red, white and black Iraqi flag flung across his shoulders, said he came to show he backed President Bush's policies in Iraq. "I support freeing Iraqis from tyranny," said 33-year-old Ryan Stiles of Chicago.

Protests also were held in Australia, Asia and Europe, but many events were far smaller than organizers had hoped. In London, police said 15,000 people joined a march from Parliament and Big Ben to a rally in Trafalgar Square. The anniversary last year attracted 45,000 protesters in the city.

"We are against this war, both for religious reasons and on a humanitarian basis, too," said Imran Saghir, 25, a Muslim student who attended the London rally.

Britain, the United States' strongest supporter in the Iraq war, has about 8,000 troops in Iraq but plans to pull out 800 of them by May. The British military has reported 103 deaths there. More than 2,300 American troops have died in the war, which began three years ago Sunday.

In Washington, a protester wearing a Bush mask and bearing fake blood on his hands waved to passing automobiles outside Vice President Dick Cheney's residence, where about 200 people demonstrated against the war.

Rev. Graylan Scott Hagler of the Plymouth Congregational United Church of Christ said the rallies nationwide are a "tapestry of resistance."

"Most people believe we aren't crazy anymore," he said.

In Concord, N.H., nearly 300 peace activists marched about a mile from a National Guard armory to the Statehouse.

"I feel a huge sense of betrayal that I went and risked my life for a lie," said Joseph Turcott, 26, a former Marine who served in the invasion.

Other U.S. cities where protesters gathered Saturday included Boston and San Francisco.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld answered critics of the war in a guest column in Sunday's editions of The Washington Post, asserting that if Americans were to turn away from Iraq, it would be "the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis."

"It would be as great a disgrace as if we had asked the liberated nations of Eastern Europe to return to Soviet domination because it was too hard or too tough or we didn't have the patience to work with them as they built free countries," he wrote.

Rumsfeld cited rising voter participation in successive Iraqi elections, support for security forces shown by Sunni religious leaders once sympathetic to the insurgency, and rising competence of Iraqi troops as evidence of progress since the invasion three years ago.

"The terrorists seem to recognize that they are losing in Iraq," he said.

In demonstrations in several cities worldwide, protesters carried posters showing pictures of Bush, calling him the "World's No. 1 terrorist."

In Turkey, where opposition to the war cuts across all political stripes, about 3,000 protesters gathered in Istanbul, police said. "Murderer USA," read a sign in Taksim Square.

In Stockholm, Sweden, about 1,000 demonstrators gathered for a rally and march to the U.S. Embassy. One protester was dressed as the hooded figure shown in an iconic photograph from the Abu Ghraib prison.

In Copenhagen, Denmark, more than 2,000 demonstrators marched from the U.S. Embassy to the British Embassy, demanding the withdrawal of 530 Danish troops from southern Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0018879

On Sunday, up to 3,000 protesters were expected in Seoul, South Korea, which has the third-largest contingent of foreign troops in Iraq after the U.S. and Britain.

Britain's defense chief earlier urged demonstrators in London to support the Iraqi people and condemn terrorism.

"When people go on the streets of London today, I do wish just occasionally they would go out in support of the United Nations, the Iraqi people and the Iraqi democrats and condemn terrorists," Defense Secretary John Reid told British Broadcasting Corp. radio during a visit to Iraq.

Members of the Stop the War Coalition, the organizers of the London march, had little sympathy for Reed's remarks.

"Every day you hear of new deaths. Tony Blair has actually made Iraq a worse place for the Iraqi people," said Rose Gentle, whose soldier son Gordon, 19, was killed by a roadside bomb last year in Basra, southern Iraq.

Thousands Protest War's 3rd Anniversary (LAT)

By Sara Lin And Deborah Schoch, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

From Australia to Hollywood, people march to demand that troops be withdrawn.

While some brought anti-war placards and petitions to Hollywood on Saturday, a group called Veterans for Peace crafted 100 flag-draped coffins from cardboard cartons and carried them down Sunset Boulevard to mark the more than 2,300 U.S. troops killed in the Iraq war.

At MacArthur Park in Los Angeles, the American Friends Service Committee laid out 240 pairs of boots, each bearing the name of a fallen soldier from California.

And in San Francisco, protesters dressed as members of President Bush's cabinet and carried signs that read "United World Not United States" and "Stop U.S. Imperialism."

Worldwide, demonstrations started Saturday with 500 people chanting anti-war slogans in Sydney, Australia, and rolled around the world, with major protests in Pakistan, London and the United States, where more than 1,000 people gathered in New York's Times Square.

As many as 3,000 demonstrators were expected today in Seoul. South Korea has the third-largest contingent of foreign troops in Iraq, behind the U.S. and Britain. Another protest is planned outside the U.S. embassy in Kuala Lumpur, the largest city in Malaysia.

In California on Saturday, thousands of people took part in activities to show their opposition to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq that began three years ago and to call for a pullout of American troops.

As he sat in MacArthur Park next to a worn pair of black boots with a tag bearing his son's name, Fernando Suarez del Solar, 50, addressed the crowd in English and Spanish to encourage more Latinos to participate in the anti-war movement. A large image of his son was propped up behind him.

"My son died, and anything I do here will not bring him back … but I think I can save other children," he said. Suarez del Solar's son was one of the first Marines killed in the war.

Gary Russell, 61, noted that the crowd at the park was small and that not many people were heading to Hollywood to listen to speeches there.

"I agree this march is not big — not like the massive marches we had in the '60s — but in time it will happen," Russell said.

Later in the day, several thousand people marched in Hollywood to an area near the Kodak Theatre. Among them was Pablo Martin, who said he was joining an anti-war march for the first time. Martin, 32, of Los Angeles shouldered the corner of a prop coffin as he marched down Sunset Boulevard.

"I just got tired of not doing anything," he said. "I think we've all been duped, and the young, the poor, the minorities are taking the brunt of it."

Several of the protesters said they are growing discouraged at the length of the war.

DOJ_NMG_0018880

"I don't see any possible way for it to end any time soon," said Flo Webster, 73, of Woodland Hills, who held up a hand-drawn sign reading "Grandmothers for Peace," decorated with photos of her four grandchildren.

Those who addressed the crowd included Paul Haggis, who received two Academy Awards at the Kodak Theatre this month for the best picture winner, "Crash." He won for original screenwriting and was one of the producers honored for the film.

"This is my first time back to the Kodak Theatre since March 5 and I couldn't be prouder to be with all of you," Haggis said.

Actor Martin Sheen, who plays U.S. President Josiah Bartlet in the television series "The West Wing," drew some of the loudest cheers with his call to end the war.

"Let my country awake," he concluded, quoting India's first Nobel laureate, the late Rabindranath Tagore.

After Sheen's speech, Vietnam War veteran Edward Smith, 56, who opposes the war in Iraq, leaned over a metal guardrail and called out to Sheen, "Why isn't anyone up there talking about the troops?"

Sheen paused to talk to Smith, pointing out the makeshift coffins carried by the protesters. "We want them home safely," Sheen said of the troops.

In San Francisco, protesters danced in the streets and beat drums.

"It's very painful to me that our country is doing this and killing innocent people," said Joan Emerson, 70, of Mill Valley, who attended with the group Old Lesbians Organizing for Change. "I'm against all war, and I'm very concerned that I'm responsible as an American citizen for this kind of thing happening."

Persis Karim, 33, said she was concerned that the United States might launch a preemptive strike on Iran.

"They may not do it in quite the same way as Iraq," said Karim, a professor at San Jose State University. "But the agenda of the Bush administration is to secure the region, and obviously Iran is a problem to them."

Marchers Make Slow Progress (Advocate)

Delays hinder, fail to stop war protesters

Published: Mar 19, 2006

CHALMETTE — Saturday morning went badly for a couple from Poplarville, Miss., until they found an anti-war march advancing slowly toward New Orleans.

Veteran anti-war activist Joyce Zehnle, 74, and her husband, Dick Zehnle, 72, a former corporate attorney, were waiting outside the Chalmette National Military Cemetery for the march to arrive.

The Zehnles are former college professors who said they have been demonstrating against war since the late 1960s, when they encouraged their students to oppose America's role in the Vietnam War.

But, the couple said, they had driven all over eastern New Orleans without finding any sign of the "Veterans March to New Orleans," the anti-war march that left Mobile, Ala., on Monday — bound to reach New Orleans by today, the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Organizers of the five-day march said their protest was designed to point out the link between the high human and economic cost of war in the Middle East — and the failure of the U.S. government to respond to the needs of Americans at home, particularly on the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast.

But at the moment, the only alternative to waiting at the cemetery was to get in their car for the one-hour drive back to the political isolation of their beloved ranch, deep in Mississippi.

"The land is so beautiful and it's so quiet," Joyce Zehnle said. "The people there are so good to us — and honest." Her husband nodded in agreement, again. Their neighbors made sure they had plenty of drinking water after Katrina, he said. "They are, individually, good people."

But the Zehnles' corner of Mississippi also is staunchly populated by religious conservatives, they said. The former professors lamented what they see as a lack of critical thinking among the public, especially of their government officials.

So the Zehnles lingered by the military cemetery. A chilly March wind blew. The hasps of the cemetery flagpole clanged in the background.

Moments earlier, word came that that the "Veterans March to New Orleans" was behind schedule. A spokesperson for the march said the 200 activists were about a half-hour away from a highway junction in the swampy eastern tip of Orleans Parish. The 11 a.m. rally at Chalmette cemetery was postponed until today.

A press conference scheduled for earlier Saturday morning at the Bayou Sauvage National Wildlife Refuge was apparently too late to salvage. An update was relayed to the Zehnles and three other anti-war activists gathered outside the Chalmette cemetery, two women in a car and a skinny man on a bicycle. They left; the Zehnles stayed.

The Zehnles' disappointment in the progress of the march was clear. "Chicago was better organized," Joyce Zehnle sighed, apparently recalling some past protest.

Dick Zehnle said he was looking forward to the Chalmette rally, to be keynoted by Cindy Sheehan, the mother of a soldier killed in Iraq who became contemporary America's best-known anti-war activist when she camped outside of President Bush's retreat in Crawford, Texas.

Joyce Zehnle, meanwhile, had been eagerly anticipating the Bayou Sauvage press conference, particularly an Iraq war veteran's address on the health threat that the military's use of "depleted" uranium for ammunition allegedly poses to U.S. troops and Iraqi civilians alike.

The couple's fervor against war is matched perhaps only by their passion for political activism and books, especially the works of leftward intellectuals such as Noam Chomsky, Howard Zinn, and Middle East expert Robert Fisk.

Joyce Zehnle, who grew up in New Orleans, said she was politically active in her early 20s, during the Civil Rights Era. "I sat with blacks in the back of the streetcar because I was trying to be a good Christian."

Her husband recalled that his political awakening came much later, during his 30s when he traveled through Europe and delved into Chomsky. "We are brainwashed in school," said. "We are taught American exceptionalism. We are always moral; we are always right; and God is always on our side.'"

During the Vietnam War, both said, they were professors of religious studies who encouraged their students to oppose war.

Suddenly two women drove up, an advance team from the march. The procession had reached the highway junction in eastern New Orleans, they said. The march would resume at 1 p.m. advancing toward Bayou Sauvage.

The Zehnles got into their own car, and drove east into the wildlife refuge. Hurricane debris littered both sides of Chef Menteur Highway.

A Volkswagen bus bore a large flag with a peace sign on its rear bumper. The lead car had a sign: "Abandon Iraq — not our Gulf Coast."

Newspaper photographers lined the opposite side of the road.

The Zehnles made a U-turn and pulled their car behind the caravan trailing the marchers. They inched forward behind a bus with California markings.

On the rear of the bus, a raft of bumper stickers denounced the war: "Bring them home now!;" "Bush brings out the worst in America;" "Zero Tolerance for Torture."

The Zehnles waved from their car. They seemed happier. No longer politically isolated, still retired, and very, very active.

About 600 rally in Indy on 3rd anniversary of Iraq war

Jamie Gonzalez supported her son's decision to join the Army 2 1/2 years ago to defend his nation, get an education and "have an adventure."

On Saturday, holding his photo at a peace rally in Downtown Indianapolis, Gonzalez said she now just wants her son, Jamiell, 21, to come home.

"I am so afraid he will be sent to Iraq," said the Indianapolis woman, whose son is now stationed in Kuwait, on the Iraq border. "He is serving his country, doing something he loves, but they need to bring the troops home."

Gonzalez was among about 600 people who gathered on Monument Circle to rally for peace on the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Some carried hand-lettered signs with anti-war slogans such as, "War is not the answer," and "Choose peace." Others carried flags with peace signs.

At one point, the crowd broke into a chant, "One, two, three, four, bring our troops back to our shore." Others stood quietly, clutching flowers. At another point, they released red balloons carrying the names of Indiana soldiers who had died in Iraq.

One after another, speakers criticized the war's casualties and costs. Some said the war was a crime and called for the impeachment of President Bush.

"We should not be squandering hundreds of millions of dollars on a bloody boondoggle," said longtime U.S. Rep. Andy Jacobs, a Democrat who retired in 1997. He excoriated the president and his decision to go to war.

"The war hawk who has never been to war by definition doesn't know what he is talking about," said Jacobs, a Korean War veteran, prompting cheers from the crowd. "The only Americans in any danger from Iraq are the ones who were sent there to be slaughtered."

Saturday's gathering was more than triple the size of last year's rally, a sign that more Americans are growing tired of the war, said Heather Allen-Garde, a member of Progressive Indiana, one of several groups that organized the event.

"I think people realized this is costing us incredible amounts of money we don't have, and we are losing a lot of soldiers," Allen-Garde said.

At least 2,311 U.S. military members, including 59 people with Indiana ties, have died and more than 17,000 have been wounded since the Iraq war began. According to a recent Associated Press-Ipsos poll, only 39 percent of Americans support the way the president has handled the war. The poll also found almost four of five Americans, including 70 percent of Republicans, think Iraq is headed for civil war.

Marvin Wagner, 78, Indianapolis, a Korean War veteran, said the war is senseless.

"There are a few of us vets against the war," said Wagner. "I was in Korea. I was drafted. I know what the horror of war is. I never did get over it, and they're creating more like me."

The rally included a telephone call from peace activist Cindy Sheehan, whose anti-war vigils outside Bush's Texas ranch last year drew worldwide attention.

"We want this nightmare over," Sheehan said.

Sheehan, who was in New Orleans for another peace rally, encouraged the crowd to continue protesting and to "work for peace."

Across the street, a small group of counterprotesters held signs in support of Bush and the war, including one that said, "Honor the dead by rooting for victory."

Even some at the rally weren't sure the troops should come home.

Bridie Trozelli, 18, who moved to Indianapolis three years ago from Sweden, said she disagreed with war, "but from what I heard, if America pulls out now, it could leave (Iraq) in worse shape."

Gonzalez, however, said continuing to fight in Iraq wouldn't bring anything but more casualties on both sides.

"I think . . . the thing they could do now to make it better is to bring the troops home and peace will come sooner."

Anti-war Activist Cindy Sheehan Joins Marchers (MR)

By Ron Colquitt

Mobile Register, March 19, 2006

Still recovering from injuries suffered during a recent protest in New York City, anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan linked up with Gulf Coast peace marchers Thursday to participate in the final leg of their 140-mile trek from Mobile to New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0018883

More than 200 people are making the trek to protest the war in Iraq and what they believe is the federal government's mismanagement of the Hurricane Katrina recovery along the Gulf Coast.

The march, which began Tuesday in Mobile, includes people from along the Gulf Coast and across the nation. A BBC crew and other news organizations have been documenting the march.

Sheehan, whose son, Casey Sheehan, was killed in Iraq, said Friday that she finds the recent United States and Iraq offensive against insurgents northeast of Samarra to be "despicable."

"Number one, they don't have to escalate the war, and they need to start bringing our troops home," Sheehan said. "That is what Americans want, Iraq wants, the world wants and our soldiers want. It won't solve anything with the killing of more people, and it just makes things worse."

Sheehan, who gained national recognition as she camped outside President Bush's Texas ranch after her son was killed, said she will be speaking Sunday during a rally in New Orleans that will culminate the peace march.

She said she would have been part of the Gulf Coast protest march from the beginning had she not been injured during a protest outside the United Nations in New York. Her sister, Dede Miller, was among the marchers who left Mobile on Tuesday.

Sheehan, who is from Berkeley, Calif., said she suffered a mild concussion and injuries to her back and right arm when police outside the United Nations dragged her 15 feet.

"I can't get dragged by that arm anytime soon," she said with a laugh.

She said she's proud of her sister for participating in the Gulf Coast protest from the beginning. Miller, Sheehan said, works for Families for Peace, an organization Sheehan founded.

Sheehan said she and her sister are dedicated to working to end the war, which has now cost the lives of more than 2,300 American servicemen and women.

Sheehan said she planned to speak Friday night in Slidell, La., where marchers planned to camp.

Paul Robinson of Mobile, who helped organize the march, said marchers were led into Slidell early Friday afternoon by a five-piece, brass jazz band.

"Oh man, this has been great," said Robinson, president of the Mobile chapter of Veterans for Peace. "We added about 15 more marchers just today."

The group, which is traveling by car and by foot, left Long Beach, Miss., on Friday morning. Protesters walked at least 10 of the 30 miles between Long Beach and Slidell, he said.

Rally Calls For End To Iraq War (PPG)

By Caitlin Cleary

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 19, 2006

Marchers want soldiers home now

Several hundred people marched through the streets of East Liberty, Shadyside and Oakland yesterday to protest the war in Iraq on the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion.

The three-mile-long march, organized by the Thomas Merton Center Anti-War Committee, began with a rally at the corner of Penn and Highland avenues. Featured were several speakers and performers including Pittsburgh rock band Soma Mestizo, whose lead singer Christiane D. said, "First I'd like to say hello to all the FBI agents who've joined us today," drawing cheers and laughter from the crowd.

Last week, the Thomas Merton Center released documents its members said showed the FBI was spying on its activists.

The rally and march were peaceful, occurring without any major incidents; only one arrest was reported. Organizers reported that some 2,000 people turned out for yesterday's rally, while police offered a much lower estimate.

Friends Katee Newhaus, 13, of Dormont, and Dana Dobson, 15, of Mt. Lebanon, called the turnout "not bad," but expressed chagrin that many of their friends and classmates couldn't be bothered to show up.

"There's a lot of apathy," said Dana. "It's like, OK, would you rather have an influence on how many people are dying, or go to a party that would happen [again] next week?"

DOJ_NMG_0018884

Dana wore a T-shirt on which she had written in permanent marker "2,317; How Many More?" It was covered in 2,317 dots -- one for each American killed in the war. One of Katee's cousins was among the first American soldiers to die in Iraq.

Dave Lesako drove all the way in from Spring Hill Township in Greene County. An artist and former art teacher, Mr. Lesako held up a large drawing of cowboy boots lying in a pool of blood; he made it when the war first began.

"I figured I complain about the war all the time, I should come out and march," he said.

As for his fellow Greene County residents, he said, "even the country conservatives are questioning what's going on."

The protesters marched down Negley Avenue and along Walnut Street, past the boutiques and cafes, chanting "While you're shopping, bombs are dropping!" to the expressionless bystanders, who were clutching their Banana Republic bags or holding up camera phones to record the event.

When the group marched past the fraternity houses of Carnegie Mellon University, protester Greg Olverson half-expected to be greeted by counter-protests, like the fraternity members had staged last year.

"I remember them yelling, 'We're for the war, and Iran is next,' " said Mr. Olverson, a security guard from Pittsburgh.

The march ended at the military recruiting offices in Oakland, where protesters met with barricades and lines of police outfitted in riot gear, some on horseback, some holding police dogs. The marchers disbanded peacefully after less than an hour.

"I thought we had a great rally and a peaceful march," said Jim Kleissler, director of the Thomas Merton Center. "We really just wanted to come out and say peace is something that's part of America, and we're not going to let the FBI intimidate us."

Similar anti-war protests were staged yesterday in cities across the United States and the world.

In Concord, N.H., nearly 300 peace activists marched about a mile from a National Guard Armory to the Statehouse.

"I feel a huge sense of betrayal that I went and risked my life for a lie," said Joseph Turcott, 26, a former Marine who served in the invasion.

Protests were also held in Australia, Asia and Europe, but many events were far smaller than organizers had hoped.

In London, police said 15,000 people joined a march from Parliament and Big Ben to a rally in Trafalgar Square. The anniversary last year attracted 45,000 protesters in the city.

Worldwide Protests As War Enters 4th Year (MINNST/AP)

By Associated Press

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 19, 2006

Demonstrations demanded that all troops be withdrawn.

Thousands of war protesters took to the streets around the world Saturday, marking the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq with demands that coalition troops leave immediately.

In Minneapolis, protesters took up half of Hennepin Avenue as they marched from Lagoon Avenue in Uptown to the Basilica of St. Mary at the edge of downtown, waving signs with slogans such as "Impeach Bush" and "Support Our Troops. Bring Them Home Now!" Police estimated there were 3,500 marchers; march organizers put the number at about 4,200.

The demonstration was organized by The March 18 Coalition, an umbrella group representing various peace organizations, including Women Against Military Madness and the Iraq Peace Coalition.

"What we do by coming out here is we show the face of the resistance and the depth of the resistance," said Marie Braun, one of the organizers.

Chuck Tomlinson, who lives in the Powderhorn neighborhood of Minneapolis, said he came to the rally to be counted, heard and seen. He's been against the war since Day One. "What has changed is that the president's incompetency has exceeded my expectations, or should I say my worst fears," he said.

David Langree, a student at South High in Minneapolis, said he's upset by how secretive he believes the government has been about its true motives for the war.

In New York, Wael Musfar of the Arab Muslim American Federation addressed more than 1,000 people who gathered in Times Square. "We say enough hypocrisy, enough lies, our soldiers must come home now," Musfar said.

Protests also were held in Australia, Asia and Europe, but many events were far smaller than organizers had hoped. In London, police said 15,000 people joined a march from Parliament to a rally in Trafalgar Square. The anniversary last year attracted 45,000 protesters in the city.

In Washington, a protester wearing a President Bush mask and bearing fake blood on his hands waved to passing automobiles outside Vice President Dick Cheney's residence, where about 200 people demonstrated against the war.

In Concord, N.H., nearly 300 peace activists marched about a mile from a National Guard armory to the Statehouse. "I feel a huge sense of betrayal that I went and risked my life for a lie," said Joseph Turcott, 26, a former Marine who served in the invasion.

At Dudley Square in Boston, a few hundred protesters waved placards that read "Impeach Bush" and "Stop the War." About 6,000 protesters in San Francisco danced in the streets, beat drums and carried signs that read "Stop U.S. Imperialism."

Polls Show Public's Dwindling Support For War (SLPD)

By Bill Lambrecht

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 18, 2006

On the third anniversary of the Iraq war this weekend, more than 500 protests are scheduled around the country - including 27 in Missouri and Illinois - at a time of growing anti-war sentiment among the American public.

Thus far, the new pessimism appears to be having little effect in Washington, where Congress had approved billions of dollars more for war and a proposal to censure President George W. Bush for ordering electronic surveillance in the war on terror is drawing little support.

But an alliance of anti-war groups on Friday unveiled a well-funded effort aimed at rejecting political candidates this year who refuse to support a swift end to American involvement in Iraq.

A series of public-opinion polls published last week showed that support for the war had reached its lowest point and that Americans' view about progress in Iraq had turned starkly negative in recent weeks.

One of the polls, published on Friday by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, showed that two of three Americans disapprove of the way Bush is handling the war. For the first time, the Pew poll found that half of Americans support an immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq.

Carroll Doherty, the Pew Center's associate director, attributed the recent erosion of support for the war to doubts that U.S. troops can quell the insurgency and prevent civil war.

"The sense you get in this poll is that people don't see a lot of good options or a lot of good strategies," he said.

Bill Ramsey, a veteran organizer who is coordinating a protest rally in Forest Park on Sunday afternoon, said that he is seeing many new people involved in the St. Louis region's anti-war effort. He said that based on e-mail confirmations, he is expecting 800 people to take part in marches that culminate in a rally at the World's Fair Pavilion.

Ramsey asserted that the White House reiteration last week of its pre-emptive strike policy "is driving more people toward us."

The St. Louis protest is among more than 500 being held in all 50 states and the District of Columbia starting Sunday to commemorate the third anniversary of the Iraq invasion, according to United for Peace and Justice, a New York-based alliance of anti-war organizations. U.S. forces began bombing Iraq on March 19, 2003.

The next "soccer mom"?

The newly announced Voters for Peace is seeking five million signatures by November on a petition that reads: "I will not vote for or support any candidate for president or Congress who does not make a speedy end to the war in Iraq, and preventing any future war of aggression, a public position in his or her campaign."

A Fox News poll last week suggested that the war will be a key voting issue this year. When voters were asked what issue would determine who they supported for Congress, Iraq ranked second, just behind the category of spending and taxes.

Nonetheless, anti-war organizers have expressed frustration at what they describe as a disconnect between public sentiments and continued support for the war in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0018886

Last week, the House approved a spending package that included nearly $68 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. In the Senate, a proposal by Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., to censure the president was unpopular even among Democrats.

Allan Lichtman, a political science professor at American University and a Democratic senatorial aspirant in Maryland, attributed the war support in Congress partly to fear.

"Critics of the president are still fearful that things will turn in Iraq and that (presidential adviser) Karl Rove will chew them up in November," he asserted.

Voters for Peace soon will begin spending some of $1 million it has raised from private donors on Web advertising to support the petition effort, organizers said at a news conference on Friday.

"The peace vote is the new soccer mom," contended Voters for Peace spokeswoman Linda Schade, referring to an influential voting bloc in recent elections.

Before And After Abu Ghraib, A U.S. Unit Abused Detainees (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt And Carolyn Marshall

As the Iraqi insurgency intensified in early 2004, an elite Special Operations forces unit converted one of Saddam Hussein's former military bases near Baghdad into a top-secret detention center. There, American soldiers made one of the former Iraqi government's torture chambers into their own interrogation cell. They named it the Black Room.

In the windowless, jet-black garage-size room, some soldiers beat prisoners with rifle butts, yelled and spit in their faces and, in a nearby area, used detainees for target practice in a game of jailer paintball. Their intention was to extract information to help hunt down Iraq's most-wanted terrorist, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, according to Defense Department personnel who served with the unit or were briefed on its operations.

The Black Room was part of a temporary detention site at Camp Nama, the secret headquarters of a shadowy military unit known as Task Force 6-26. Located at Baghdad International Airport, the camp was the first stop for many insurgents on their way to the Abu Ghraib prison a few miles away.

Placards posted by soldiers at the detention area advised, "NO BLOOD, NO FOUL." The slogan, as one Defense Department official explained, reflected an adage adopted by Task Force 6-26: "If you don't make them bleed, they can't prosecute for it." According to Pentagon specialists who worked with the unit, prisoners at Camp Nama often disappeared into a detention black hole, barred from access to lawyers or relatives, and confined for weeks without charges. "The reality is, there were no rules there," another Pentagon official said.

The story of detainee abuse in Iraq is a familiar one. But the following account of Task Force 6-26, based on documents and interviews with more than a dozen people, offers the first detailed description of how the military's most highly trained counterterrorism unit committed serious abuses.

It adds to the picture of harsh interrogation practices at American military prisons in Afghanistan and Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, as well as at secret Central Intelligence Agency detention centers around the world.

The new account reveals the extent to which the unit members mistreated prisoners months before and after the photographs of abuse from Abu Ghraib were made public in April 2004, and it helps belie the original Pentagon assertions that abuse was confined to a small number of rogue reservists at Abu Ghraib.

The abuses at Camp Nama continued despite warnings beginning in August 2003 from an Army investigator and American intelligence and law enforcement officials in Iraq. The C.I.A. was concerned enough to bar its personnel from Camp Nama that August.

It is difficult to compare the conditions at the camp with those at Abu Ghraib because so little is known about the secret compound, which was off limits even to the Red Cross. The abuses appeared to have been unsanctioned, but some of them seemed to have been well known throughout the camp.

For an elite unit with roughly 1,000 people at any given time, Task Force 6-26 seems to have had a large number of troops punished for detainee abuse. Since 2003, 34 task force members have been disciplined in some form for mistreating prisoners, and at least 11 members have been removed from the unit, according to new figures the Special Operations Command provided in response to questions from The New York Times. Five Army Rangers in the unit were convicted three months ago for kicking and punching three detainees in September 2005.

Some of the serious accusations against Task Force 6-26 have been reported over the past 16 months by news organizations including NBC, The Washington Post and The Times. Many details emerged in hundreds of pages of documents released under a Freedom of Information Act request by the American Civil Liberties Union. But taken together for the first time, the declassified documents and interviews with more than a dozen military and civilian Defense Department and other federal personnel provide the most detailed portrait yet of the secret camp and the inner workings of the clandestine unit.

The documents and interviews also reflect a culture clash between the free-wheeling military commandos and the more cautious Pentagon civilians working with them that escalated to a tense confrontation. At one point, one of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's top aides, Stephen A. Cambone, ordered a subordinate to "get to the bottom" of any misconduct.

Most of the people interviewed for this article were midlevel civilian and military Defense Department personnel who worked with Task Force 6-26 and said they witnessed abuses, or who were briefed on its operations over the past three years.

Many were initially reluctant to discuss Task Force 6-26 because its missions are classified. But when pressed repeatedly by reporters who contacted them, they agreed to speak about their experiences and observations out of what they said was anger and disgust over the unit's treatment of detainees and the failure of task force commanders to punish misconduct more aggressively. The critics said the harsh interrogations yielded little information to help capture insurgents or save American lives.

Virtually all of those who agreed to speak are career government employees, many with previous military service, and they were granted anonymity to encourage them to speak candidly without fear of retribution from the Pentagon. Many of their complaints are supported by declassified military documents and e-mail messages from F.B.I. agents who worked regularly with the task force in Iraq.

A Demand for Intelligence

Military officials say there may have been extenuating circumstances for some of the harsh treatment at Camp Nama and its field stations in other parts of Iraq. By the spring of 2004, the demand on interrogators for intelligence was growing to help combat the increasingly numerous and deadly insurgent attacks.

Some detainees may have been injured resisting capture. A spokesman for the Special Operations Command, Kenneth S. McGraw, said there was sufficient evidence to prove misconduct in only 5 of 29 abuse allegations against task force members since 2003. As a result of those five incidents, 34 people were disciplined.

"We take all those allegations seriously," Gen. Bryan D. Brown, the commander of the Special Operations Command, said in a brief hallway exchange on Capitol Hill on March 8. "Any kind of abuse is not consistent with the values of the Special Operations Command."

The secrecy surrounding the highly classified unit has helped to shield its conduct from public scrutiny. The Pentagon will not disclose the unit's precise size, the names of its commanders, its operating bases or specific missions. Even the task force's name changes regularly to confuse adversaries, and the courts-martial and other disciplinary proceedings have not identified the soldiers in public announcements as task force members.

General Brown's command declined requests for interviews with several former task force members and with Lt. Gen. Stanley McChrystal, who leads the Joint Special Operations Command, the headquarters at Fort Bragg, N.C., that supplies the unit's most elite troops.

One Special Operations officer and a senior enlisted soldier identified by Defense Department personnel as former task force members at Camp Nama declined to comment when contacted by telephone. Attempts to contact three other Special Operations soldiers who were in the unit — by phone, through relatives and former neighbors — were also unsuccessful.

Cases of detainee abuse attributed to Task Force 6-26 demonstrate both confusion over and, in some cases, disregard for approved interrogation practices and standards for detainee treatment, according to Defense Department specialists who have worked with the unit.

In early 2004, an 18-year-old man suspected of selling cars to members of the Zarqawi terrorist network was seized with his entire family at their home in Baghdad. Task force soldiers beat him repeatedly with a rifle butt and punched him in the head and kidneys, said a Defense Department specialist briefed on the incident.

Some complaints were ignored or played down in a unit where a conspiracy of silence contributed to the overall secretiveness. "It's under control," one unit commander told a Defense Department official who complained about mistreatment at Camp Nama in the spring of 2004.

For hundreds of suspected insurgents, Camp Nama was a way station on a journey that started with their capture on the battlefield or in their homes, and ended often in a cell at Abu Ghraib. Hidden in plain sight just off a dusty road fronting Baghdad International Airport, Camp Nama was an unmarked, virtually unknown compound at the edge of the taxiways.

The heart of the camp was the Battlefield Interrogation Facility, alternately known as the Temporary Detention Facility and the Temporary Holding Facility. The interrogation and detention areas occupied a corner of the larger compound, separated by a fence topped with razor wire.

Unmarked helicopters flew detainees into the camp almost daily, former task force members said. Dressed in blue jumpsuits with taped goggles covering their eyes, the shackled prisoners were led into a screening room where they were registered and examined by medics.

Just beyond the screening rooms, where Saddam Hussein was given a medical exam after his capture, detainees were kept in as many as 85 cells spread over two buildings. Some detainees were kept in what was known as Motel 6, a group of crudely built plywood shacks that reeked of urine and excrement. The shacks were cramped, forcing many prisoners to squat or crouch. Other detainees were housed inside a separate building in 6-by-8-foot cubicles in a cellblock called Hotel California.

The interrogation rooms were stark. High-value detainees were questioned in the Black Room, nearly bare but for several 18-inch hooks that jutted from the ceiling, a grisly reminder of the terrors inflicted by Mr. Hussein's inquisitors. Jailers often blared rap music or rock 'n' roll at deafening decibels over a loudspeaker to unnerve their subjects.

Another smaller room offered basic comforts like carpets and cushioned seating to put more cooperative prisoners at ease, said several Defense Department specialists who worked at Camp Nama. Detainees wore heavy, olive-drab hoods outside their cells. By June 2004, the revelations of abuse at Abu Ghraib galvanized the military to promise better treatment for prisoners. In one small concession at Camp Nama, soldiers exchanged the hoods for cloth blindfolds with drop veils that allowed detainees to breathe more freely but prevented them from peeking out.

Some former task force members said the Nama in the camp's name stood for a coarse phrase that soldiers used to describe the compound. One Defense Department specialist recalled seeing pink blotches on detainees' clothing as well as red welts on their bodies, marks he learned later were inflicted by soldiers who used detainees as targets and called themselves the High Five Paintball Club.

Mr. McGraw, the military spokesman, said he had not heard of the Black Room or the paintball club and had not seen any mention of them in the documents he had reviewed.

In a nearby operations center, task force analysts pored over intelligence collected from spies, detainees and remotely piloted Predator surveillance aircraft, to piece together clues to aid soldiers on their raids. Twice daily at noon and midnight military interrogators and their supervisors met with officials from the C.I.A., F.B.I. and allied military units to review operations and new intelligence.

Task Force 6-26 was a creation of the Pentagon's post-Sept. 11 campaign against terrorism, and it quickly became the model for how the military would gain intelligence and battle insurgents in the future. Originally known as Task Force 121, it was formed in the summer of 2003, when the military merged two existing Special Operations units, one hunting Osama bin Laden in and around Afghanistan, and the other tracking Mr. Hussein in Iraq. (Its current name is Task Force 145.)

The task force was a melting pot of military and civilian units. It drew on elite troops from the Joint Special Operations Command, whose elements include the Army unit Delta Force, Navy's Seal Team 6 and the 75th Ranger Regiment. Military reservists and Defense Intelligence Agency personnel with special skills, like interrogators, were temporarily assigned to the unit. C.I.A. officers, F.B.I. agents and special operations forces from other countries also worked closely with the task force.

Many of the American Special Operations soldiers wore civilian clothes and were allowed to grow beards and long hair, setting them apart from their uniformed colleagues. Unlike conventional soldiers and marines whose Iraq tours lasted 7 to 12 months, unit members and their commanders typically rotated every 90 days.

Task Force 6-26 had a singular focus: capture or kill Mr. Zarqawi, the Jordanian militant operating in Iraq. "Anytime there was even the smell of Zarqawi nearby, they would go out and use any means possible to get information from a detainee," one official said.

Defense Department personnel briefed on the unit's operations said the harsh treatment extended beyond Camp Nama to small field outposts in Baghdad, Falluja, Balad, Ramadi and Kirkuk. These stations were often nestled within the alleys of a city in nondescript buildings with suburban-size yards where helicopters could land to drop off or pick up detainees.

At the outposts, some detainees were stripped naked and had cold water thrown on them to cause the sensation of drowning, said Defense Department personnel who served with the unit.

In January 2004, the task force captured the son of one of Mr. Hussein's bodyguards in Tikrit. The man told Army investigators that he was forced to strip and that he was punched in the spine until he fainted, put in front of an air-conditioner while cold water was poured on him and kicked in the stomach until he vomited. Army investigators were forced to close their inquiry in June 2005 after they said task force members used battlefield pseudonyms that made it impossible to identify and locate the soldiers involved. The unit also asserted that 70 percent of its computer files had been lost.

Despite the task force's access to a wide range of intelligence, its raids were often dry holes, yielding little if any intelligence and alienating ordinary Iraqis, Defense Department personnel said. Prisoners deemed no threat to American troops were often driven deep into the Iraqi desert at night and released, sometimes given $100 or more in American money for their trouble.

Back at Camp Nama, the task force leaders established a ritual for departing personnel who did a good job, Pentagon officials said. The commanders presented them with two unusual mementos: a detainee hood and a souvenir piece of tile from the medical screening room that once held Mr. Hussein.

Early Signs of Trouble

Accusations of abuse by Task Force 6-26 came as no surprise to many other officials in Iraq. By early 2004, both the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. had expressed alarm about the military's harsh interrogation techniques.

The C.I.A.'s Baghdad station sent a cable to headquarters on Aug. 3, 2003, raising concern that Special Operations troops who served with agency officers had used techniques that had become too aggressive. Five days later, the C.I.A. issued a classified directive that prohibited its officers from participating in harsh interrogations. Separately, the C.I.A. barred its officers from working at Camp Nama but allowed them to keep providing target information and other intelligence to the task force.

The warnings still echoed nearly a year later. On June 25, 2004, nearly two months after the disclosure of the abuses at Abu Ghraib, an F.B.I. agent in Iraq sent an e-mail message to his superiors in Washington, warning that a detainee captured by Task Force 6-26 had suspicious burn marks on his body. The detainee said he had been tortured. A month earlier, another F.B.I. agent asked top bureau officials for guidance on how to deal with military interrogators across Iraq who used techniques like loud music and yelling that exceeded "the bounds of standard F.B.I. practice."

American generals were also alerted to the problem. In December 2003, Col. Stuart A. Herrington, a retired Army intelligence officer, warned in a confidential memo that medical personnel reported that prisoners seized by the unit, then known as Task Force 121, had injuries consistent with beatings. "It seems clear that TF 121 needs to be reined in with respect to its treatment of detainees," Colonel Herrington concluded.

By May 2004, just as the scandal at Abu Ghraib was breaking, tensions increased at Camp Nama between the Special Operations troops and civilian interrogators and case officers from the D.I.A.'s Defense Human Intelligence Service, who were there to support the unit in its fight against the Zarqawi network. The discord, according to documents, centered on the harsh treatment of detainees as well as restrictions the Special Operations troops placed on their civilian colleagues, like monitoring their e-mail messages and phone calls.

Maj. Gen. George E. Ennis, who until recently commanded the D.I.A.'s human intelligence division, declined to be interviewed for this article. But in written responses to questions, General Ennis said he never heard about the numerous complaints made by D.I.A. personnel until he and his boss, Vice Adm. Lowell E. Jacoby, then the agency's director, were briefed on June 24, 2004.

The next day, Admiral Jacoby wrote a two-page memo to Mr. Cambone, under secretary of defense for intelligence. In it, he described a series of complaints, including a May 2004 incident in which a D.I.A. interrogator said he witnessed task force soldiers punch a detainee hard enough to require medical help. The D.I.A. officer took photos of the injuries, but a supervisor confiscated them, the memo said.

The tensions laid bare a clash of military cultures. Combat-hardened commandos seeking a steady flow of intelligence to pinpoint insurgents grew exasperated with civilian interrogators sent from Washington, many of whom were novices at interrogating hostile prisoners fresh off the battlefield.

"These guys wanted results, and our debriefers were used to a civil environment," said one Defense Department official who was briefed on the task force operations.

Within days after Admiral Jacoby sent his memo, the D.I.A. took the extraordinary step of temporarily withdrawing its personnel from Camp Nama.

Admiral Jacoby's memo also provoked an angry reaction from Mr. Cambone. "Get to the bottom of this immediately. This is not acceptable," Mr. Cambone said in a handwritten note on June 26, 2004, to his top deputy, Lt. Gen. William G. Boykin. "In particular, I want to know if this is part of a pattern of behavior by TF 6-26."

General Boykin said through a spokesman on March 17 that at the time he told Mr. Cambone he had found no pattern of misconduct with the task force.

A Shroud of Secrecy

Military and legal experts say the full breadth of abuses committed by Task Force 6-26 may never be known because of the secrecy surrounding the unit, and the likelihood that some allegations went unreported.

In the summer of 2004, Camp Nama closed and the unit moved to a new headquarters in Balad, 45 miles north of Baghdad. The unit's operations are now shrouded in even tighter secrecy.

Soon after their rank-and-file clashed in 2004, D.I.A. officials in Washington and military commanders at Fort Bragg agreed to improve how the task force integrated specialists into its ranks. The D.I.A. is now sending small teams of interrogators, debriefers and case officers, called "deployable Humint teams," to work with Special Operations forces in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Senior military commanders insist that the elite warriors, who will be relied on more than ever in the campaign against terrorism, are now treating detainees more humanely and can police themselves. The C.I.A. has resumed conducting debriefings with the task force, but does not permit harsh questioning, a C.I.A. official said.

General McChrystal, the leader of the Joint Special Operations Command, received his third star in a promotion ceremony at Fort Bragg on March 13.

On Dec. 8, 2004, the Pentagon's spokesman, Lawrence Di Rita, said that four Special Operations soldiers from the task force were punished for "excessive use of force" and administering electric shocks to detainees with stun guns. Two of the soldiers were removed from the unit. To that point, Mr. Di Rita said, 10 task force members had been disciplined. Since then, according to the new figures provided to The Times, the number of those disciplined for detainee abuse has more than tripled. Nine of the 34 troops disciplined received written or oral counseling. Others were reprimanded for slapping detainees and other offenses.

The five Army Rangers who were court-martialed in December received punishments including jail time of 30 days to six months and reduction in rank. Two of them will receive bad-conduct discharges upon completion of their sentences.

Human rights advocates and leading members of Congress say the Pentagon must still do more to hold senior-level commanders and civilian officials accountable for the misconduct.

The Justice Department inspector general is investigating complaints of detainee abuse by Task Force 6-26, a senior law enforcement official said. The only wide-ranging military inquiry into prisoner abuse by Special Operations forces was completed nearly a year ago by Brig. Gen. Richard P. Formica, and was sent to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0018891

But the United States Central Command has refused repeated requests from The Times over the past several months to provide an unclassified copy of General Formica's findings despite Mr. Rumsfeld's instructions that such a version of all 12 major reports into detainee abuse be made public.

Iraq Leaves Vet In Personal Fog Of War (WP)

By Russ Bynum

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

RICHMOND HILL, Ga. -- His 3-year-old son Nicholas' first steps, the first time Liam, his newborn, smiled _ Staff Sgt. Douglas Piper lived to see them. Then his scarred memory erased even those precious moments.

"I can't remember what they did yesterday," Piper says. "Sometimes, I can't remember what I did yesterday. The days are broken."

Iraq left the 30-year-old Piper in his own personal fog of war, one in which remembering the moments and days since April 2003 can be as confusing a puzzle as predicting his civilian future.

Three years ago, in the war's first month, Piper became one of the now more than 17,000 U.S. troops wounded in action. A grenade blast in Baghdad mangled his right eye, collapsed his right eardrum and slammed his brain against the inside of his skull.

In a conflict where explosions account for roughly two-thirds of Army combat wounds, and improved body armor and field medicine increase chances of survival, brain injuries such as Piper's are common.

At home in southeast Georgia, he drives his pickup truck, and even took a recent ski trip, despite having no depth perception after losing his eye. In public, he pops his prosthetic eye in and out of its socket without self-consciousness. He hears fine with the help of a hearing aid.

Yet his doctors tell him at least 80 percent of his short-term memory has been destroyed.

Watching "CSI" or "Law and Order" on TV with his wife, Sherry, he often has trouble following the plot. He has problems recalling the birthdates of their three boys _ Matthew, 4, Nicholas, 3, and 13-week-old Liam. He knows the route to his desk job at Hunter Army Airfield in nearby Savannah, but needs help keeping track of appointments.

Sometimes he'll walk into a room and forget what he's doing there. Other times, he'll stop talking in mid-sentence and grasp for the word.

"I'll try to point at something like, `What is that?' he says. "The names of things, the words, sometimes they're just gone."

Routine and his wife's guidance help compensate. He keeps his keys, wallet, cell phone, medications and spare prosthetic eyes in a basket on the kitchen counter so he won't lose them. Sherry Piper enters his doctor visits and other appointments into her Palm Pilot.

Still, Piper puts his injuries in perspective. Among the other wounded soldiers he met at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, there was always someone whose injuries seemed worse _ a Bradley armored-vehicle driver blinded in both eyes by a rocket-propelled grenade, a sniper who had been shot through the eye with a bullet that passed through his brain.

"I'd just think to myself, it could have been worse," Piper said, "so don't even think about complaining."

Walter Reed, home to one of eight brain injury facilities run jointly by the departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs, has treated more than 600 troops with traumatic brain injuries from Iraq and Afghanistan since 2003.

Brain injuries were diagnosed in 28 percent of wounded service members sent to Walter Reed from January 2003 to November 2005. Common effects include headaches, sleep disorders, trouble concentrating and memory loss.

After six surgeries between April 2003 and August 2005, Piper expects to be cleared for a medical discharge by the Army in the next two months.

"A part of him, I think, does yearn to stay in the military," said Kim Mayes, his medical case manager at Hunter. "He'll walk in, if he saw something on the news, and say, `Man, I wish I could go back over there.'"

Piper signed with an Army recruiter at 17, entering the service a year later in October 1994. As a teenager in Bridgewater, N.H., he saw the Army as a chance to escape the doldrums of a small town where most young men went to work manufacturing rubber gaskets at a local factory.

He passed the rigorous training required to join the elite Army Ranger regiment, and served eight years in its Hunter-based battalion. He planned on a full 20-year military career.

Then came the war _ the last thing he remembers with clarity.

He wanted to deploy to Iraq so badly that he left the Rangers because, having just joined a new company, he expected to be sidelined. As war loomed in early 2003, he transferred to the Pathfinder Company of the 6th Battalion, 101st Aviation Regiment at Fort Campbell, Ky. Eight days after he arrived, Piper left for Kuwait.

On April 13, 2003, less than month after U.S. troops crossed the Iraqi border, Piper was leading his six-man team in a hunt for weapons and munitions in southern Baghdad.

The sun was setting outside a library building where the soldiers had discovered a stockpile of small arms and mortar rounds. Piper stood outside, deciding which building to clear next.

A car passed on the street. Someone leaned out the window and lobbed a grenade, announcing an ambush with an explosion a few feet from Piper's back. The blast flung him five feet, sprawled facedown behind a Humvee.

"I didn't feel any pain or anything like that, but I saw this huge halo of blood in front of me," Piper recalled.

He reached to feel his right eye, but his hand slid straight to his ear. It felt like the side of his face had been flattened, the bones of his eye socket pulverized.

Amid the fighting, two soldiers grabbed Piper to rush him to a medivac helicopter. He insisted on giving them his ammunition and grenades first. En route to the nearest field hospital, he blacked out.

Landstuhl Regional Medical Center, an Army hospital in Germany, was Piper's first stop out of Iraq. On his third day there, he insisted doctors wheel him to a bathroom mirror so he could see his face.

"When they told me the extent of the injury, I was thinking to myself, `I'm going to have a big hole in my head,'" Piper said. "My main concern was with the boys. What would they think?"

Beneath the bandages, his skin was scabbed and bruised and his right eye had turned completely black. But his face was intact. The crushed bones of his eye socket could be repaired.

On April 21, 2003, doctors at Walter Reed removed Piper's eye and reconstructed shattered bones scattered in tiny fragments from his brow into his nasal cavity. Five months later, he was fitted for a prosthetic eye, hand-painted to match the hazel hue of his remaining eye.

Piper focused on getting used to navigating with one eye. He was often bumping into walls and objects on his right side. Once, he tripped over a bush during a stroll outside the Army hospital.

"He never once said, `Oh, great, now I'm never going to be able to do this,'" Sherry Piper said. "The day he got back from Walter Reed, we came to the airport and got in the car. I was going to drive and he said, `No, I'm going to drive.'"

The Pipers say it was several months before they started to notice symptoms of his memory loss. At first, Sherry Piper attributed it to her husband's hearing loss.

"I would just be talking to him and he wasn't paying attention. I'd say, `Did you hear what I just said?' and he'd say, `No,'" she recalled. "That's how we kind of realized he was having a problem remembering."

Neurologists confirmed Piper had frontal-lobe damage to his brain, affecting his short-term memory. Periodic testing over the past year has shown little improvement, said Mayes, his medical case manager.

Piper carried a notebook for a while, jotting lists of errands and appointments, but kept losing it. For now, he relies on his wife to keep his schedule, and phones her when he feels he's forgotten something.

Grappling with short-term memory loss hasn't stopped Piper from looking to the long-term. Several months ago, he began working in his off-duty hours as an onsite supervisor for a construction company.

He isn't sure whether he'll stick with construction, but it seemed a logical first step. He's a woodworking hobbyist, and has made bookshelves, a cedar chest and end tables for his home. He likes working outdoors, especially as a break from Army desk work.

"I've been a trigger-puller for 11 years," Piper said. "I had to figure out what I was interested in other than blowing things up."

He treats his injuries with similar humor _ deadpan matter-of-factness mixed with shock-and-awe. And the family is getting in on the act.

During a recent trip to the mall, 4-year-old Matthew asked if Piper could show his false eye to another boy who refused to believe his father had one.

"So I pop it out and clean it off and hand it to him, and he walks over there and opens his hand and goes, `See!,'" Piper said, laughing. "That boy about freaked out."

Poppy Crop Threatens Nascent Democracy (SLPD)

By Philip Dine

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 18, 2006

For now, the cabbage-green rows of small poppies in the furrowed squares of land resemble any variety of legitimate crops. In a few months, these plants will stand out as a tall sea of crimson.

Viewed from the window of a low-flying helicopter, new poppy fields come into view every few seconds, spread around a desolate landscape virtually unchanged for centuries in this remote part of Afghanistan. The houses are small, isolated and fashioned from mud, some with mud walls around them. There is no sign of mosques or schools, hospitals or stores.

This is the epicenter of poppy cultivation in Afghanistan. The nation's crop provides 87 percent of the world's opium, from which heroin is produced, according to the United Nations. Early indications are that Helmand, a province deep in southern Afghanistan bordering Pakistan, will produce half the world's supply of opium this year.

The poppies are invaluable cash crops to farmers seeking to sustain their families, but dangerous to a young Afghan democracy. An unholy alliance is emerging among farmers, drug lords, Taliban remnants and al-Qaida fighters. Intelligence sources and Afghan officials cite mounting evidence that insurgents are using drugs to wreak havoc on Afghan society - including the corrupting of public officials - while also extracting funds from drug profits for their anti-government violence.

The resulting tension was in evidence on a recent tour of the area by two U.S. gunships. The helicopters landed in a poppy field to give State Department officials and a reporter a chance to look around - for two minutes - encircled by guards with automatic weapons. The guards worry about violence, either from farmers who think their crop is threatened, or from insurgents protecting the poppy fields.

"You can get on the ground, but that's when you're the most vulnerable," warned Ed Morris, lead pilot in the U.S. military detachment providing protective cover for joint Afghanistan-American drug-eradication efforts in this area.

Drugs are already the nation's sole export of any magnitude, and threaten to turn it into a "narco-state," a country whose policies and politics are dominated by drug lords.

"The concern is that this government will fail and fall and the country will be a breeding ground for terrorists again," says Doug Wankel, director of the Counter Narcotics Task Force at the U.S. Embassy in Afghanistan. Former chief of operations for the Drug Enforcement Administration, he is a native of Bowling Green, Mo.

Poisoning "infidels"

There is also a little-noted bonus for al-Qaida in the burgeoning heroin production. Afghan sources say the terrorist group has acknowledged in private sessions its satisfaction that expanding heroin use is poisoning "infidels" in other countries. One example is a skyrocketing rate of AIDS, sparked by dirty needles, in Russia and former Soviet republics.

Kahir Ismailee of Kabul has worked for years with international groups on health, education and human rights issues in rural areas where anti-Western sentiment is strong.

He says that in the terrorists' "jihad against all Westerners, one of their tactics to ruin a society was to make them addicts, so they export heroin to the Western countries."

Ismailee says an influential Taliban cleric told him: "Drugs are illegal in Islam, but we want infidels to die."

Mohammad Nabi Hussaini directs the poppy eradication program in the Afghan Ministry of Counter Narcotics. It's dangerous work; when traveling around the country, he wears a turban to disguise himself.

"They say this, if you go to their gatherings, their religious gatherings: 'Western countries, they are sending us alcohol, they are sending us rockets - this is our rocket, poppy. This is how we can fight them,' " Hussaini says. "But they are also fighting their own people, because it brings the moral degradation of our society. It is against Islam."

And, he noted, more Afghans are becoming addicted to heroin or opium.

"It's not true that it's not our problem. It's becoming our problem," he says. "The rate of addiction will increase, I think, very badly. I believe it is something that is destroying our nation. My village has 120 families. When I was a kid, there was only one person who was taking raw opium, who was an addict. Right now in my village there are more than 12 very hard addicts."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has put it bluntly: "If we don't destroy the poppy, it will destroy us."

The last two years have been the biggest in history for opium production in Afghanistan, each topping 4,000 tons of opium, and this year looms as a third banner year. Hoping to avert another flooding of the heroin market, Afghan forces and their allies, particularly the United States, are responding strongly - if belatedly - to the threat.

Eradication is one element in a multipronged response to the mounting drug problem, an effort that also includes a range of educational, economic and legal approaches. The point man for the U.S. State Department is St. Louis native Tom Schweich, a top official for international narcotics and law enforcement who seeks to coordinate actions among Americans, Afghans and their international partners.

"The reason we went into Afghanistan was to eliminate the people who were responsible for 9/11," Schweich says. "There's now a nascent democracy here. The threats that are posed to this democracy are narcotics and terrorism. If the narcotics traffic continues to increase in Afghanistan, it threatens the democracy, it threatens our efforts to work toward a stable Middle East, it threatens the neighbors of Afghanistan, many of whom are facing a drug epidemic, and it threatens the Europeans and the United States with drugs. It really does have implications across the entire world."

The Taliban and the poppy

In some ways, the proliferation of poppy is an unintended consequence of the U.S. overthrow of the Taliban in 2001.

In earlier years, the Taliban had been content to allow the production of opium, even urging farmers to continue in defiance of the desire of the West that poppy cultivation cease - and often profiting from drug trafficking.

"The Taliban told people this was a fight against Muslims, that you should grow poppy. Even if you have no land, you should use your roof," says Asadullah Khalid, governor of Kandahar province.

But the Taliban abruptly switched gears at the start of this decade, as it faced growing international pressure to moderate its rule. Hoping to win diplomatic recognition from the West, the Taliban knew it had to make some concessions, and yielding on narcotics was the most palatable choice, Ismailee says.

In its last years in power, the Taliban clamped down on the drug trade in an effective but brutal way.

"There were executions without any transparent trials, hands were cut off, legs were severed," Ismailee says. By 2001, the extremist government had reduced the opium production to virtually nothing.

The U.S.-led removal of the Taliban removed the fear ordinary Afghans felt, spurring many to get back into poppy farming.

In addition, American and Afghan policies initially contributed to the growth of the narcotics problem. U.S. forces enlisted the support of warlords in the fight against the Taliban, turning a blind eye to their drug trafficking. After he assumed office, Karzai - hoping to solidify his hold on the country - brought some compromised provincial figures into his government.

Now, insurgents trying to weaken the U.S.-backed government find it advantageous to forge alliances with drug traffickers and encourage farmers to grow poppy - telling them "whenever the government tries to eradicate, the Taliban will be there to protect you," Ismailee says.

Insurgents also have issued warnings that those who stop growing poppy will be seen as "siding" with the government. It is no coincidence, officials say, that the areas where anti-government rebels are strongest are the same places where poppy production is at its highest.

Corruption, poverty, porous borders

Other factors have helped worsen the drug problem in Afghanistan.

Corruption, bribery and the quick release from jail of suspected drug traffickers.

Widespread poverty, which forces farmers to seek any possible means to support their families. Other crops pay a fraction of what poppies yield. And many traditional Afghanistan crops, such as fruits and nuts, were uprooted when Soviet troops destroyed trees to prevent guerrillas from hiding.

The return of Afghan refugees who had fled to Pakistan to escape Taliban rule. Some went into poppy farming on their own; others were compelled by landowners who made it a condition of their getting a parcel of land as tenant farmers.

Abysmal roads. Farmers often can't get legitimate crops to market, whereas poppy is so valuable that traffickers will come to the farmers.

The trend toward the processing of opium into heroin in Afghanistan, turning Afghans from opium exporters into heroin producers. Afghans have seen the profits to be made and, in recent years, provided necessary precursor chemicals by foreigners, began setting up their own labs to make the end product.

Porous borders that let drugs move freely into Iran, Pakistan or former Soviet republics to the north, often eventually going to Europe - which gets 90 percent of its heroin from Afghanistan.

The hardiness of the crop. Poppies require little care and little water, critical in a country suffering from massive environmental degradation and long arid periods and whose mountainside irrigation systems were largely destroyed over decades of armed conflict.

"The narcotics problem in our province is very, very complicated," said Engineer Daud, governor of Helmand, as he stood at an airfield flanked by Afghan and U.S. troops.

"Our land is productive land for narcotics, and we have more than 100 miles of border with Pakistan, with deserts and mountains," he says. "Because of the low capacity of our national police, it is difficult to control that part of the problem . Drug dealers and terrorists are carrying drugs across the border, and terrorists are getting money from narcotics."

"Both forces are mobilizing"

In the northern part of his province, people are so desperate for water that farmers trying to make a legitimate living on their tiny plots, with virtually no money for their own families, are forced to buy water to keep their chickens alive.

Daud understands why they "have the reason to cultivate cash crop like poppy," and he prefers to go after the larger and wealthy drug dealers rather than the simple growers, but the traffickers are more evasive, more powerful - and more threatening.

In many ways, Afghan officials and their international allies, preoccupied with overthrowing the Taliban and then keeping it and al-Qaida at bay, were caught off guard by the insidious drug trade and didn't get serious until relatively recently.

"The problem was . . . unique, because of its scope and because there are so many moving parts," said Craig Chretien, formerly a senior official at the Drug Enforcement Administration, where he spent 26 years in several South American countries. He is now deputy director of the counternarcotics task force at the American Embassy in Afghanistan, which is helping the Afghans tackle the problem.

"It's challenging, but is it impossible? No," Chretien says.

After a rather tepid Afghan response last year, and some faltering steps by the United States, both countries are launching a broader, better coordinated and more aggressive campaign.

The next few months will begin to signal how successful the effort is likely to be.

"We've got an increased ability to fight the drugs, and they've got an increased ability to grow the drug," Schweich says. "So both forces are mobilizing."

Editorial: Wanted: One Federal Attorney For Tri-Cities (TRICITYH)

Columbia (WA) Tri-City Herald, March 19, 2006

It is time for the U.S. Justice Department to start bearing its share of the load in the Tri-Cities.

And we don't mean by asking local prosecutors to do even more of the federal government's job than they already do.

We have had a federal judge in the Tri-Cities for the past six years, but no federal prosecutors.

It was four years ago that U.S. Attorney James McDevitt, in Spokane, promised to look into the question of assigning some federal prosecutors here instead of keeping them all based in Spokane or Yakima.

Local law enforcement and prosecutors have said for years many cases that should be tried in federal court instead are pushed down to local courts.

The result: Overload on local courts and prosecutors, more costs for local taxpayers and a cheap way out for the feds.

One program allows local prosecutors to be named special deputy U.S. attorneys so they can prosecute some cases.

That answer is too little and way, way late.

Ten local police and prosecutors have written to McDevitt to try to get something going on this besides talk.

McDevitt says Congress would have to authorize the money for the assignments.

That's even though McDevitt added several attorneys to his Spokane staff recently under the Justice Department's focus on anti-terrorism. Three of the major potential targets for terrorism are near the Tri-Cities -- Hanford, the Umatilla Chemical Depot and the dams.

Consensus on getting a federal prosecutor assigned to the Tri-Cities is persuasive. Unanimity should make it a certainty.

"We've got a federal courthouse, we've got a federal judge and we've got the criminal activity," said Kennewick Police Chief Ken Hohenberg, speaking for himself and nine other chiefs, sheriffs and prosecutors in the Tri-Cities. "We need a federal prosecutor."

In a letter to McDevitt, the 10 officials pointed out that 174 Yakima-based cases were filed in federal court in 2004, compared with only 26 Benton and Franklin County cases.

It's not that fewer federal offenses are committed in the Tri-Cities -- far from it.

Inertia is the problem. Federal attorneys prosecute crimes that occur down the street, not down the valley.

It's time for the federal government to get moving on this issue.

We do not doubt McDevitt's sincerity nor do we accuse him of being the problem.

Nor is it right to fault Congress for not authorizing money to have a prosecutor and other accouterments and officers of the federal government stationed here.

But between the two lies the only solution to a judicial and cost inequity.

McDevitt should press the case for a prosecutor in the Tri-Cities, and Congress should give him the money to make it happen.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

For Defense Attorneys, It's All About The 'cross' (HC)

By TOM FOWLER

Houston Chronicle, March 19, 2006

If you stop by the Enron trial in downtown Houston expecting to witness a Perry Mason moment, don't hold your breath.

Those instances of "gotcha," — when an attorney catches an opposing witness in a lie or draws out a weeping confession during cross-examination — aren't as common as TV legal dramas might have you believe.

In reality, cross-examination is often a dry, protracted process by which attorneys try to undermine a witness or dig for nuggets of information that support their case. It's not at all unusual for "cross," as attorneys call it, to seem random and meandering to a casual observer.

Lawyers watching the current trial said so far the cross-examination by the defense teams for Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling has had a little bit of everything: entertainment and tedium, humor and anger, precision and confusion.

The defense will get its chance to put its best arguments before the jury when the government rests its case, but any points it can score with jurors now on cross are crucial.

"Whoever goes first in making their case gets to shape the initial impression a jury gets," said David Berg, a Houston trial lawyer. "That's why you can't wait. You have to begin your case during cross."

Jurors' decision

Cross-examination is the process by which attorneys get to question a witness the opposing side puts on the stand. It's the opportunity to knock down an opponent's case as it is built.

Some studies have shown that jury verdicts in criminal cases often match the conclusions reached by the time the prosecution finishes its case. That's why defense attorneys often spend just as much time preparing an effective cross as they do preparing to put on their own arguments.

Houston attorney Dick DeGuerin said he likes to use leading questions to tell a story with cross, even though it's his opponent who is trying to tell his story.

"I think the jury is there to be entertained, in part, and to listen to something they can make sense of," DeGuerin said.

There generally are limits to what can be discussed on cross, but they differ depending on the judge overseeing the case, Berg said.

In the Enron case, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake requires attorneys to ask questions on cross that relate only to what was asked under direct questioning. That means the government largely has been able to set the agenda.

Cross may seem unfocused, with attorneys belaboring minutiae for reasons that aren't entirely clear. But Dan Hedges, a former prosecutor now in private practice in Houston, said that's not unusual in criminal cases, and actually may be necessary.

Unlike civil trials, in which attorneys usually have interviewed witnesses at great length before trial in depositions, attorneys in criminal cases face more unknowns, Hedges said.

"There's the danger of asking a question and getting a bad answer, but there's also the danger of not asking and missing out on very important information that could help your case," Hedges said.

Presenting own case

Cross has been used with varying degrees of effectiveness in the Enron trial, observers said.

In the first weeks of the trial, the defense teams were able to use it to essentially begin introducing an important part of their own case: that Enron was not the crooked and crippled enterprise the government described.

The government wanted to play excerpts of videotaped analyst and employee meetings at which Lay and Skilling allegedly made false statements, but the defense successfully argued the tapes should be played in their entirety during cross. Though it made for many boring hours in the courtroom, it allowed the defendants to show jurors what they argued was a more complete picture of a vibrant and healthy Enron.

The defense hasn't maintained that strategy of using the government's witnesses to illustrate the good points of Enron as much as it could have, however, said Joel Androphy, an attorney who has followed the trial closely. Rather, much of the cross has focused on attacks against the witnesses.

"They had a great opportunity to ask (former Chief Financial Officer Andrew) Fastow and others about Enron viability issues, about good things at the company, but I don't feel like I heard that very much," Androphy said. "I just heard and saw attack after attack. At this point, all the jurors must know about the company is that a lot of people were lying."

The attacks during cross serve a purpose, however, in that they can discredit witnesses by getting them to waver on statements made during direct questioning. That was certainly the intent in the harsh questioning of Fastow.

Fastow was grilled with blunt, argumentative and sometimes loud questions, such as, "Did you have any conscience?" He was walked back and forth through his confessed crimes. And his recollections were poked and prodded repeatedly.

The confrontational questions appeared to grab the attention of jurors early on, but later many seemed to tune out. To some observers, the shouting seemed like overdone theatrics, but Androphy said the attorneys were more sincere than they appeared.

He notes that defense attorneys such as Mike Ramsey and Daniel Petrocelli become genuinely passionate about their clients' defense, so the emotions are close to the surface during cross.

"I do that all the time, and it's not just something I'm making up," Androphy said.

The anger and outrage against Fastow was clearly designed to draw out Fastow's own anger, said Michael Wynne, a former prosecutor who has followed the trial closely. Although jurors likely have little doubt that Fastow lied regularly, the cross didn't get him to lose his composure.

"I think it was overplayed, and the defense spent too much time on it," Wynne said.

Observers said Lay attorney Chip Lewis worked a good vein of questions on his cross of former Enron executive Sherron Watkins, namely the legality of stock sales she made soon after writing her famous memo to Lay. But some noted he failed to control Watkins on the stand, letting her rattle off lengthy answers.

Skilling attorney Ron Woods did a better job of keeping Watkins in check by quickly and firmly cutting short her responses. He also kept short and direct his questions about how guilty verdicts would be beneficial for Watkins' public speaking business, observers said.

At least twice, the Skilling defense team has broken a cardinal rule of cross by asking a question apparently without knowing the answer.

It challenged the accounting knowledge of witnesses, only to stumble upon what appeared to be the revelation that the witnesses had accounting degrees.

In one instance, however, Petrocelli used that to initiate a brief discussion of accounting rules. It's a topic the government avoided during direct questioning for fear of confusing jurors. But Petrocelli may have shown that the rules are not nearly as cut-and-dried as the government would like jurors to believe.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial May Be Embarrassment For Bush (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, March 19, 2006

Lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's former top aide are signaling they may delve deeply at his criminal trial into infighting among the White House, the CIA and the State Department over pre-Iraq war intelligence failures.

In a prelude to a possible defense, the lawyers for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby also are suggesting that the State Department — not Libby — may be to blame for leaking the identity of covert CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media.

Court papers filed late Friday raise the possibility a trial could become politically embarrassing for the Bush administration by focusing on the debate about whether the White House manipulated intelligence to justify the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

The defense team stated that in June and July 2003, Plame's CIA status was at most a peripheral issue to "the finger-pointing that went on within the executive branch about who was to blame" for the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

"If the jury learns this background information" about finger-pointing "and also understands Mr. Libby's additional focus on urgent national security matters, the jury will more easily appreciate how Mr. Libby may have forgotten or misremembered ... snippets of conversation" about Plame's CIA status, the lawyers said.

Cheney's former chief of staff was indicted Oct. 28 on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about how he learned of Plame's CIA employment and what he told reporters about her.

Libby's lawyers are asking U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton for access to government documents about a 2002 trip that Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, made to the African nation of Niger at the CIA's behest and about "his wife's involvement" with that mission.

The documents relate to what prospective witnesses — including then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage and deputy White House chief of staff Karl Rove — probably would say at Libby's trial.

Noting press reports last week, the court papers say there has been speculation that Armitage told The Washington Post's Bob Woodward that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, and speculation that Woodward's source and the primary source for conservative columnist Robert Novak are the same person.

Novak disclosed Plame's identity on July 14, 2003, eight days after Wilson contended in a New York Times op-ed column that the administration twisted prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat from a nuclear weapons program.

"If the facts ultimately show that Mr. Armitage or someone else from the State Department was also Mr. Novak's primary source, then the State Department and certainly not Mr. Libby bears responsibility for the 'leak' that led to the public disclosure" of Plame's CIA identity, Libby's lawyers said.

The court filing also focused on Marc Grossman, a former undersecretary of state for political affairs who allegedly told Libby a month before Plame's identity was disclosed that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

"If Mr. Armitage or another State Department official was in fact the primary source for Mr. Novak's article, Mr. Grossman's testimony may be colored by either his personal relationship with Mr. Armitage or his concern for the institutional concerns of the state Department," Libby's lawyers wrote.

Rove — a source for Novak and Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper — is under investigation by Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald in the probe of the leak of Plame's CIA identity.

Libby's lawyers say that "either the government or the defense may call Mr. Rove as a witness at trial" and note that "the grand jury's investigation may be continuing with respect to Mr. Rove or other witnesses."

The defense says the documents it seeks will help demonstrate that the White House did not launch a concerted effort to punish Wilson by leaking his wife's identity, as administration critics have alleged.

Libby also is asking for notes from a September 2003 meeting in the White House Situation Room where Colin Powell, who was secretary of state, is reported to have said that everyone knows Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and that it was Wilson's wife who suggested the CIA sent her husband to Niger.

"The media conflagration ignited by the failure to find WMD in Iraq and in part by Mr. Wilson's criticism of the administration, led officials within the White House, the State Department and the CIA to blame each other, publicly and in private, for faulty prewar intelligence about Iraq's WMD capabilities," the court papers state.

"The government's version of events blows out of proportion the minor role Ms. Wilson actually played and in doing so creates an impression that is highly prejudicial to Mr. Libby," they say.

Wilson's accusations stemmed from President Bush's assertion in his State of the Union address on Jan. 28, 2003, that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa.

Based on his 2002 trip, Wilson said he had found it highly doubtful the nation of Niger had agreed to sell uranium yellowcake to Iraq, as alleged in intelligence provided to the CIA.

Libby's Defense To Lay Blame For Leak On State Department (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Lawyers for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the indicted former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, want access to many Bush administration documents they say will demonstrate that an undercover CIA officer played a "peripheral role" in the government's debate over prewar intelligence and that Libby had no motive to lie about her, according to new court filings.

In documents filed late Friday, Libby's attorneys cast a wide net for information that they said would help demonstrate that Libby did not discuss the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame as part of a supposed administration effort to besmirch her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV.

They wrote that they anticipated the trial would showcase testimony by a Who's Who of senior administration officials involved in the Iraq policymaking at the heart of the CIA leak investigation, including three top officials at the State Department who the lawyers asserted played key roles in the unraveling of Plame's covert CIA position. Those officials include then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his deputy secretary, Richard Armitage, and undersecretary for political affairs, Marc Grossman.

The lawyers argued that if press reports are correct that some reporters first learned of Plame's CIA connections from Armitage, then "the State Department (and certainly not Mr. Libby) bears responsibility for the 'leak' that led to the public disclosure" of Plame's CIA identity.

Libby was indicted Oct. 28 on criminal charges of perjury, obstruction of justice and lying to the FBI about how he learned of Plame's employment and what he told reporters about her. He was not, however, charged with leaking the information to the reporter who first published it, columnist Robert D. Novak.

Libby's lawyers have asserted that inaccurate statements made by him are the result of mistakes or forgetfulness caused by the long hours he put in every day dealing with the nation's most critical national security issues.

The charges against Libby resulted from an investigation -- still underway -- by Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald into whether administration officials knowingly leaked Plame's identity to Novak and other reporters after Wilson publicly contended that the administration had twisted intelligence when it asserted that Iraq had attempted to buy nuclear weapons material from Niger. Wilson's report was embarrassing because senior administration officials -- including President Bush -- had cited the alleged attempted purchase as one of the justifications for an invasion of Iraq.

In Friday's filing, Libby's lawyers, using Plame's married name of Wilson, said they "expect documents from the White House, the State Department and the CIA will corroborate Mr. Libby's account that Ms. Wilson's affiliation with the CIA was regarded throughout the government as a minor issue prior to Mr. Novak's article." They also said the papers will help them show that "Mr. Libby had no intent to lie because he did not believe that Ms. Wilson's employment status was classified."

Fitzgerald reiterated in his own filing that he believes Libby's team already has all the documents in hand that are relevant to Libby's defense, except a few that may be produced under seal.

Blowing The CIA's Cover (WT)

By Martin Schram

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

A powerful, even patriotic scoop in last Sunday's Chicago Tribune set a time machine whirring, emitting a sound somewhere between Walter Mitty's ta-pocketa-pocketa-pocketa and Yogi Berra's deja-vu-vu-vu (all over again).

This time it was the Tribune's savvy senior correspondent John Crewdson who had come to the rescue of the Central Intelligence Agency (though some of the dimmer minds in the agency might not quite see it that way) by revealing a dangerous intelligence gap.

In a March 12 investigative report, Mr. Crewdson revealed how America's enemies, armed only with a computer hooked to the Internet, could do what he did: Break the cover of 2,653 CIA employees around the world, many of them secret agents. Headline: "Internet blows CIA cover."

Three decades ago, a Newsday Washington bureau chief did a similar thing, albeit on the far more primitive, low-tech scale that was, in its way, state-of-the-art spookology for that Cold War era. In a June 6, 1974, semi-investigative (semi-luck) report, the Newsday journalist (who would come in from the cold some 32 years later to write this column) revealed how America's enemy rogues and spies, armed only with no-tech eyes, ears and shoes, could do what he did: Break the cover of a secret CIA school for spies operating in a well-appointed downtown Washington apartment building. Headline: "CIA spy school blows its cover."

Ta-pocketa-pocketa-pocketa. Deja-vu-vu-vu. Slowly, a pattern emerges. In fact, a pattern within a pattern. In both cases, the journalist revealed to the CIA an intelligence gap within its midst that stunned and embarrassed the agency -- but provided the CIA with info it needed to try to recover its secrets, post haste. And in both cases, the Chicago Tribune and Newsday journalists opted not to publish the identities or other distinguishing characteristics of the CIA operatives whose covers had been blown.

The work of the Tribune's Mr. Crewdson was truly impressive. He explained how he was able to use basic search engines and commercial online data services to discover the identities of CIA operatives, front companies and so on.

He reported CIA Director Porter Goss was said to be "horrified" at the discovery and that the agency was moving swiftly (also belatedly) to plug its intelligence gap.

The Newsday scoop three decades earlier began, frankly, with a bit of luck. A friend who lived in an apartment building near K Street told the journalist he had noticed strange comings and goings concerning an apartment on his floor. Men in business suits would come in the morning, stay a few hours and leave. No one was there at night.

It turned out that if you stood in the nearby laundry room, where walls were thin and laced with audio-friendly water pipes, you could her with bare ears what was said inside the apartment: "... KGB... " "... microdot... ." Lectures about code word greetings.

One day, you could hear the teacher or trainer explain how the others can avoid being followed. Then the day's class ended; as the 1974 Newsday article reported: "It is easy to follow the spies in training as they leave. They walk several blocks and enter another apartment building where they apparently feel very much at home. They emerge a short time later on a corner balcony several stories above the street and proceed to take in the afternoon sun. It is also easy to follow the trainer. He takes the elevator down to the basement garage and drives out in a blue sedan. The car has Virginia license plates and an Arlington, Va., inspection sticker. A check of the sticker registration reveals the trainer's true identity."

At first the CIA's spokesman gave the standard we-never-comment. But the reporter explained that wouldn't do because he had all the names and numbers adding, "If they are not ours, they are probably theirs." The CIA fessed up: "They are our guys .... It's a training exercise.... This is all rather embarrassing."

Then the CIA man asked the Newsday man for help. The operatives will want to know how they screwed up and the agency has no answer. The reporter explained all about the comings and goings, the walls and water pipes.

That Cold War mini-scoop was small time tweakery. But the Tribune gave the CIA a lifesaving gift: Disclosure of an Internet age intelligence gap that was both dangerous and discoverable.

Ta-pocketa-pocketa-pocketa. Deja-vu-vu-vu. Sadly, the pattern is frighteningly clear. The most dangerous intelligence gap of all is the one between the ears of the CIA officials whose job requires them to think it all through and prevent gaffes that could cost agents' lives or compromise the safety of us all.

Year After Shootings, Calls To Increase Judges' Security (NYT)

By John Files

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 18 — About a year after the killings of the husband and mother of a Chicago federal judge and a shooting rampage in an Atlanta courthouse that left three people dead, the safety of judges and court employees remains a serious concern for the judiciary.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said this week that three-quarters of the more than 2,000 federal judges had sought home security systems paid by the government.

The Judicial Conference of the United States, which sets policy for the federal courts, met this week for the first time under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and approved security measures.

The conference authorized security equipment and workers for federal probation and pretrial services offices, urged added training for judges' security guards and called for the Bureau of Prisons to screen all outgoing mail to judges and courts from federal prison inmates.

A spokesman for the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, David A. Sellers, said that after the killings of the family members of the Chicago judge, Joan H. Lefkow, the security focus shifted from courthouses to judges and other court employees outside court buildings.

Last May, Congress appropriated $12 million for the Marshals Service to coordinate such security, including paying for home detection systems for any federal judge who wants one. This month, the House passed an authorization for $20 million to hire additional marshals for court security and investigating threats.

"Threats and attacks against judges strike at the core of our system of justice," Judge David B. Sentelle of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said in a statement.

Judge Sentelle is also chairman of the Judicial Conference Committee on Court Security.

"Judges must be free to make judicial decisions without the fear of physical harm to themselves or to members of their families," he said.

Judge Lefkow testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee last May on increasing security for court employees.

The chairman of the committee, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat, introduced a measure in November mandating better coordination among marshals to protect judges.

Mr. Specter said the Marshals Service had been slow in adopting changes after the Lefkow shootings and had in some cases failed to cooperate fully with the federal judiciary on security.

The bill urges new criminal sanctions on people who seek to harass or intimidate judges by filing false or malicious liens against them or by knowingly posting personal information about them on the Internet with an intent to harm the judges. The bill calls for 10 years in prison for such liens and five years for posting personal information on Web sites.

The bill would also extend the authority of the Judicial Conference to redact sensitive personal information from judges' financial disclosure forms to prevent that information from being used for harassment or intimidation.

"This is a very serious problem," Mr. Specter said in an interview Friday. "There is no doubt that judges are targets, particularly for people who have been in their courtrooms who are unhappy with how they had their cases handled."

The Marshals Service did not return telephone calls on Friday.

The National Center for State Courts, which works with state and federal officials, had said some state and local courthouses had not followed standard safety measures. The group has urged courthouse personnel to do a better job of assessing threats, updating equipment and planning for emergencies.

"The federal courts are the gold standard," the president of the center, Mary McQueen, said. "Security is a very complex problem for the states because of jurisdictional differences. They don't have an integrated marshals service dedicated for security."

Ms. McQueen said the states had made "major strides forward in the last year," in developing security plans and sharing information on procedures and training.

Judge Offers Glimpse Of Potential Witnesses (LVRJ)

By ADRIENNE PACKER, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 19, 2006

Reid, Goodman on list in corruption case

During pretrial motions in the political corruption case of former Clark County Commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, a U.S. District judge offered a glimpse of the witnesses who might be called to testify.

Judge Larry Hicks rattled off potential witnesses to prospective jurors Tuesday to determine whether any of them had relationship with those who could be called to the stand during the trial, which is expected to last three months.

Among the names were Terry Lamuraglia, a former lobbyist who now works in the county's Parks and Recreation Department; attorneys Jay Brown and Joe Brown; and Peter S. Christiansen, former strip club owner Michael Galardi's longtime lawyer.

The list also includes FBI agent Joe Dickey.

During opening statements on Thursday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Schiess touched on those witnesses' roles in the government's case.

A federal indictment issued in May 2003 accuses Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey, Galardi and former Commissioners Erin Kenny and Lance Malone of bribery. The commissioners allegedly accepted cash bribes from Galardi that were delivered by Malone, in exchange for votes that furthered the success of Galardi's strip clubs, according to the indictment.

Galardi and Kenny cut deals with the government and have provided information to prosecutors.

Schiess indicated that Christiansen "knew Galardi was corruptly taking care of commissioners."

Prosecutors said Lamuraglia, another potential witness, told the government that he often accompanied Herrera to Cheetahs. According to Schiess, Lamuraglia said Herrera once returned from a private room inside the club and bragged about receiving oral sex. The government contends that Herrera not only accepted cash bribes from Galardi, but sexual favors arranged by the strip club owner.

FBI agent Dickey is expected to testify that he was in his office listening to a telephone conversation between Malone and Herrera on Sept. 21, 2001, when Herrera asked for a meeting with Malone. Malone told him to swing by the parking lot of Landry's seafood restaurant, where Malone was having lunch with Galardi.

Dickey raced down to Landry's and saw Malone exit Herrera's vehicle. Schiess said Malone had earlier pulled a velvet bag containing $30,000 cash out of Galardi's trunk and stepped inside Herrera's vehicle.

"When Malone got out of the car, he didn't get out with that bag," Schiess said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Johnson also appears on the witness list. Galardi told federal investigators that Johnson had received free lap dances and drinks at his clubs. Johnson denied the allegations, and an internal investigation conducted by the Justice Department found no evidence to back Galardi's claims.

Clark County Chief Deputy District Attorney Craig Hendricks and former Chief Deputy District Attorney Gary Guymon, who prosecutors claim received complimentary lap dances and drinks at Galardi's clubs, could also be called to the stand.

Nicole Compton, a woman Herrera dated while he was married, is also listed as a potential witness. The federal government said in 2001 that Herrera treated Compton to an expensive weekend at the Four Seasons Hotel in Newport Beach, Calif. Herrera also paid $4,000 cash for a diamond necklace he purchased for Compton.

Other witnesses on the list include Clark County Commissioners Yvonne Atkinson Gates, Bruce Woodbury, Myrna Williams and Chip Maxfield. The board members were in office during the time Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera served on the commission.

Other county witnesses include: Clark County Manager Thom Reilly; Administrative Services Director Don Burnette; former Business License Director Ardel Jorgensen; former Assistant Manager of Business Licensing Derek Dubasik; Registrar of Voters Larry Lomax; and Deputy District Attorneys Mary Anne Miller and Robert Warhola.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Las Vegas Mayor Oscar Goodman also were named at possible witnesses.

At least one dancer and a bartender at Cheetahs are on the list. Rich Buonantony, once a general manager at Jaguars, and Michael Beezley, who served as a manager at Jaguars, also might be called upon to testify.

Defense attorneys said county witnesses likely will be the first called to the stand when the trial resumes at 8:30 a.m. Monday. Burnette, the county administrative services director, is expected to be one of the first witnesses to take the stand. Burnette likely will address how the county operates in relation to zoning, commission and liquor and gaming meetings.

Data Show More Variety In Sentencing (DMR)

Des Moines Register, March 19, 2006

Some judges use too much discretion, are too lenient, critics say

In the first 13 months since federal judges were handed more freedom in sentencing, punishment disparities have developed among courthouses nationwide, new data show.

Federal prosecutors and judges in Iowa downplay the meaning of the statistics, but defense attorneys say the numbers reinforce what they have always believed: Varying judicial temperaments, combined with harsher prosecution in Iowa's northern half, can create widely different sentences for similar crimes.

"There are some judges who are far less likely to" depart from federal sentencing guidelines, said Alfredo Parrish, a defense attorney who has represented alleged criminals in both of Iowa's federal districts. "Everybody knows it."

The data, from the U.S. Sentencing Commission, indicate a new attitude among judges since a January 2005 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that gave them much more leeway in how they dole out punishment.

Nationally, judges have been 10 percentage points more likely since the change to deviate from what were mandatory sentencing rules before then. Almost always, they deviated with less-harsh sentences.

The guidelines, created in the mid-1980s because Congress wanted more uniformity in punishments, gave judges scant wiggle room. After only 13 months with "advisory" rules, Justice Department officials have urged Congress to take away judges' freedom.

William Mercer, U.S. attorney for the District of Montana, last week urged a congressional subcommittee to write new rules that would create more mandatory minimum sentences.

"There has been an undeniable erosion in the rate of compliance with the guidelines and an appreciable and troubling increase in sentencing disparities across the nation," Mercer said. "In short, both consistency and accountability are eroding."

In Iowa, that's meant a sentencing gap between two federal court districts. Previously, judges in the Northern and Southern districts followed the suggested sentences about 74 percent of the time.

Since the change, judges in Iowa's Northern District have continued to issue guideline-approved sentences in nearly 69 percent of cases. But in the Southern District, which includes Des Moines, the percentage fell to 49 percent.

Federal court authorities in Iowa argue that the numbers don't adequately reflect all the factors that go into a sentencing decision. But Steve Swift, head of a loose affiliation of northern Iowa defense lawyers, said the trend could raise the question of fairness.

"The danger, from my perspective, is that we start to get back to a world of variances in sentences, and then the question becomes, 'Is that a fair system?' " he said.

"We have these guidelines, and we tell ourselves that we're going to be handing out equal sentences, and maybe we're not."

Exact comparisons between Iowa's two districts are difficult because of differences in caseloads and in the circumstances of the crimes.

For instance, the two judges of the Northern District sentenced two defendants the first week of March. Meanwhile, three judges in the Southern District handed down 20 sentences.

None of the cases matched exactly in terms of the defendant's background, age or criminal history. But a spot comparison shows that William Edward Winn and Jodie Elaine McAtee, sentenced in separate districts on meth-making charges, drew sentences that were only slightly different: Southern District Judge Robert Pratt sentenced Winn to 16 1/2 years; northern Judge Linda Reade gave McAtee 13 years.

The issue gets more complicated when one factors in what lawyers say is a key difference between the districts - the frequency with which prosecutors ask for sentences to be reduced.

Southern District Judge Ronald Longstaff on March 3 sentenced David S. Brady to two years and nine months for marijuana trafficking. On the same day, northern Judge Mark Bennett pondered whether admitted pot distributor Kim Darby Saenz deserved the 3 1/2-year sentence that prosecutors had requested. Bennett had overshot a previous request for leniency when he sentenced Saenz to one year and eight months, which was overturned on appeal.

The federal sentencing report does not include detailed information needed to compare each judge's willingness to follow the guidelines. Federal law in most cases bans major departures unless prosecutors ask a judge to do so. The requests for special treatment usually are reserved for informants who help with other cases.

In 2004, under the old sentencing rules, Northern District prosecutors filed for leniency in 23 percent of their cases, compared with 20 percent in the Southern District.

Between Jan. 12, 2005, and Feb. 1, 2005, northern prosecutors sought lower sentences in only 14 percent of their cases, compared with 21 percent in the Southern District.

Bennett, who has criticized the stinginess of northern prosecutors on many occasions, has not yet ruled on the Saenz case and declined to be interviewed for this article.

Rich Murphy, a prosecutor for Northern District U.S. Attorney Charles Larson Sr., said the sentencing statistics are "troubling" at first glance, but he disputes any implication that his district treats anyone unfairly.

"My sense is that we're not doing anything dramatically different" this year, Murphy said. "I think it's something that ought to be studied, but I don't think you can necessarily immediately draw the conclusion that there is an increased likelihood of incarceration between one district and the other."

Murphy and Southern District U.S. Attorney Matt Whitaker questioned the value of the statistics, which are based on sometimes-incomplete case information reported to the sentencing commission. Prosecutors estimated that the numbers reflect only 60 percent to 85 percent of the work that took place.

"There are so many moving variables here," Whitaker said. "I don't think you can draw any analysis of what this says."

Reade, known among defense attorneys in the Northern District for her stiff sentences, concedes that she is "not much of a departer" from the sentencing guidelines.

Southern District judges voiced a willingness to be more lenient than the guidelines, but "even when I vary from the guidelines, I usually don't vary very far," Longstaff said.

"I think I'm still letting the guidelines be a very important factor in the sentence. I'm just not letting them be the only factor."

Frank Bowman, a law professor at the University of Missouri-Columbia who has studied the statistics, said the Iowa numbers show that "plainly, something different is happening here."

A broader point, however, is the fact that so many federal judges have proven so willing to use their new-found sentencing discretion, Bowman said.

"I don't think you can really deny the obvious, which is you have an advisory system where judges are equally free to go up and down . . . and they're going down at a rate of 22 to 1," Bowman said. "No matter how you slice it, it seems to me that you've got a judgment being expressed here that the sentences mandated by the guidelines are far too high more often than they're too low."

Odds Favor Internet Gambling (WT)

By Tim Lemke

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

In thousands of houses across the United States at this very moment thousands of people are wagering thousands of dollars on NCAA tournament basketball games without leaving their bedrooms.

Overseas, thousands of operators of thousands of Web sites are collecting a portion of each bet and adding it to the millions of dollars they have pulled in just since breakfast.

This is the phenomenon of Internet gambling, a $15 billion industry driven by the popularity of sports and the growing interest in poker. The industry is the subject of tense debate between companies looking to cash in on the American marketplace and lawmakers looking to ban online gambling.

Analysts predict online betting soon could make up as much as 10 percent of gambling worldwide.

In fact, the total value of some online-gambling companies operating overseas is comparable to that of the major traditional American casino companies -- Partypoker.com is worth about $2.4 billion more than Harrah's -- and revenues are expected to top $25 billion by the end of the decade, according to Christiansen Capital Advisors, which tracks gambling data.

Gamblers are expected to bet $4.7 billion on sports online this year. Revenue from online poker, less than $400 million worldwide in 2003, is expected to hit $4 billion. Other casino games, such as craps and roulette, are growing in popularity, as companies expand their offerings. Even bingo soon could become a $500 million game, Christiansen said.

The business of online gambling has made many people very rich. Calvin Ayre, the chief executive officer of Bodog Entertainment, an online gambling and music company based in Costa Rica, recently was featured on Forbes magazine's list of billionaires.

"It's been quite a ride," Mr. Ayre, a Canadian citizen, said last week after the taping of a televised poker tournament at his $3.5 million estate in Santiago.

That ride largely has been funded by bettors in the United States: Nearly two-thirds of all online wagers are placed by people in this country, even though most forms of Internet gambling are illegal, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Conservative lawmakers, often at the urging of religious groups, have been trying to stop online gambling since it first surfaced in the mid-1990s. Their efforts largely have been focused on updating the Wire Act of 1961, the pre-Internet-era statute that currently serves as the law governing online-gambling issues.

Their arguments mostly are the same ones they cite in opposing gambling in general: Opponents point to studies that suggest gambling increases personal debt and is responsible for higher rates of divorce, drug use and depression. However, they also argue that the Internet creates additional dangers, allowing minors to place bets and criminals to use stolen credit cards.

"We feel this type of gambling is particularly pernicious," said Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte, Virginia Republican, perhaps the most outspoken opponent of gambling on Capitol Hill.

However, advocates argue governments would reap big financial gains by making online gambling legal, regulating it and taxing it heavily.

"I could pump $1 billion into the U.S. economy right away," said Peter Carruthers, chief executive officer of BetonSports.com, which also operates out of Costa Rica and earns most of its revenue from U.S. bettors.

Furthermore, companies say, regulation would protect against many of the problems gambling opponents fear would occur if online betting is legalized in the United States.

In the United Kingdom, for instance, online gambling is legal and heavily regulated. Companies are required to use special age-verification software. All bets are recorded, and there are strict caps on the amount one person can bet at once. The operations of all Internet gambling companies are routinely audited for fraud or money laundering.

Similar regulations have been put in place in more than 80 other countries worldwide.

"[The U.S.] should regulate this, and enforce the use of software that works," said Nigel Payne, chief executive officer of London-based Sportingbet PLC, which spends time in Washington lobbying for regulation. "Do we honestly think that Americans are not going to gamble? If they honestly think they can stop people, it's an extraordinarily naive position."

The legal landscape

The Department of Justice says that online gambling is illegal and has collected millions of dollars in settlements from online payment firms, including PayPal, that have helped process bets placed on the Internet.

But shutting down gambling operations or stopping people from betting has proven tricky. U.S. laws can't stop operators working outside the country, and building a case against individual gamblers is time-consuming and not a priority.

As a result, much of the department's efforts center on pressuring credit card companies to refuse online-gambling transactions.

Legal scholars, gambling advocates and even some lawmakers said that because current laws were crafted before the Internet age and most operators are based overseas, the law is only helpful to a point.

"You've got 2,000 offshore sites," said Joseph Kelly, a professor of business law at the State University of New York in Buffalo and a specialist on gambling laws. "You have to be able to crack down on offshore operations. In my opinion, it's an exercise in futility."

Indeed, Mr. Ayre operates on the same principle: His company has no physical presence in the United States.

"We are running an Internet business, and we follow all the laws of the countries we operate in," he said. "In all these jurisdictions, what we're doing is legal. We feel we are a legal organization."

The debate over Internet gambling and U.S. law centers largely on the 45-year-old Wire Act, which was designed to crack down on sports betting by organized crime and explicitly outlaws betting on "sports or other contests" using a phone line from state to state.

However, the law says nothing about the playing of poker, blackjack or other casino-type games and was written long before the Internet was conceived.

"We're satisfied that what we're doing in the U.S. is not illegal," said John Sheperd, a spokesman for Gibraltar-based PartyGaming PLC, which pulled in $977 million in revenue last year from its Partypoker.com and Partycasino.com Web sites. "We recognize that the law was not written with the Internet in mind."

Federal legislation introduced last month by Mr. Goodlatte seeks to clarify the law to ensure that online bets are banned and to include poker and other common gambling practices.

"There needs to be a clear statement by the Congress that this is what the law is and this is what should be enforced," said Mr. Goodlatte, who claims to have more than 100 co-sponsors for his Internet Gambling Prohibition Act.

Some proposed laws target credit card companies and banks in the United States, but companies already say they can work around these measures by using foreign banks and direct-payment services, such as FirePay.

In addition, operators of online-gambling companies said Mr. Goodlatte and other lawmakers are sending mixed messages, because their legislation outlaws some activities but not others.

Mr. Goodlatte's bill, for instance, allows for online betting on horse racing and fantasy sports, exemptions that baffle online-gambling companies.

"Mr. Average is being told this is bad, Mr. Average is being told you can't do this, but Mr. Average is being told that if you bet on a horse race, it's fine," Mr. Payne said. "If you do it on a fantasy league, it's fine. If you do it on a lotto, that's fine. These are the exemptions the politician needs in order to push the bill through."

Supporters of online gambling said the new efforts from Congress are a reaction to critics who say measures against Internet gambling were killed as a result of illegal lobbying efforts.

Mr. Goodlatte blamed Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist who recently pleaded guilty to fraud and conspiracy, for working to block his Internet anti-gambling legislation in 2000. Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, nearly inserted a similar bill into lobbying-reform legislation earlier this month, and Mr. Goodlatte makes a point of referring to Mr. Abramoff when discussing his bill.

"Internet gambling has quadrupled since Jack Abramoff blocked the legislation back in 2000," Mr. Goodlatte said. "As several members of Congress were misled by him, we felt it was a great time to bring [the legislation] back."

The future

Online-gambling companies said they expect a 25 percent drop in revenues if the Goodlatte bill is passed. That figure, they said, represents the number of Americans who gamble online because they believe it is legal. The remaining gamblers will continue on, they said.

"You can't ban something Americans like doing and don't think is wrong," Mr. Ayre said.

Nevertheless, companies are expanding their company offerings to include less controversial games, such as bingo, backgammon and checkers.

Either way, it appears companies have no plans to stop collecting from U.S. bettors, regardless of what happens.

"These guys boast publicly at conferences about online sports wagers coming from the United States," Mr. Kelly, the business professor, said with a laugh. "And nobody bothers them."

Some Fear Popularity Is Weakening Amber Alerts (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WAITE HILL, Ohio, March 18 — To illustrate what has happened to the Amber Alert program, Arnold Stanko, police chief in this town of about 450 people, slowly pulls his hands apart as if stretching a piece of taffy.

Ten years after the alerts began being used in the Dallas-Fort Worth area, the system has been adopted in all 50 states. And in some, it is being used for reasons beyond its original purpose of helping find children abducted by strangers.

In Ohio, Texas and other states the program can be used when a child is taken away by a parent or family member who does not have custody, if the child is believed to be in immediate danger of injury or death.

Some law enforcement officials say they are concerned that the alerts will be overused and become less effective. They say that in some cases, it is more difficult for the authorities to decide when an alert should be issued because they have to weed out cases like those in which a parent is not a threat or cases where a child has run away.

"You don't want to be in a position where you get Amber fatigue where people say, 'It never ends, another Amber Alert,' and they tune out," said Tela Mange, spokeswoman for the Texas Department of Public Safety.

The system was created in 1996 after Amber Hagerman, 9, was kidnapped while riding her bicycle near her home in Arlington, Tex., and killed. The alerts are broadcast on radio and television and appear on cellphones at the owners' request and on highway signs.

The criteria for issuing an alert vary slightly from state to state, but the Department of Justice recommends the following minimum standards: an abduction is confirmed, the child is at risk of serious injury or death, there is enough descriptive information about the child, captor or captor's vehicle, and the child is 17 or younger.

"When it started out it was for stranger abductions," said Chief Stanko, who oversees the Northeast Ohio Amber Alert Plan from this Cleveland suburb. "Over time we learned that parents abduct their own children and kill them."

Of 17 alerts issued in northeast Ohio since 2002 through January, 9 involved children abducted by parents, family members or a live-in boyfriend, according to police records reviewed by The Associated Press.

More than 240 children have been recovered nationwide because of Amber Alert programs, and about 95 percent of children reported missing through the system are recovered, according to the National Center for Missing the Exploited Children, a private, nonprofit organization. Of 252 children who were subjects of Amber Alerts in 2004, all were found alive except five who were never located and six who were dead, the center said.

Chief Stanko emphasizes in training classes for police that officers must verify a parent's accusations about another parent before issuing an alert. But persuading 200 police departments to do that is a challenge, he said.

Law enforcement officers err on the side of caution to protect people in their work, he said, but that cannot be done with Amber Alert.

"If you erred on the side of caution, this thing would be going off all the time," Chief Stanko said.

DOJ_NMG_0018908

No Amber Alert was issued the day Gina DeJesus, 14, of Cleveland failed to return home from school in April 2004, because no one witnessed her abduction.

Gina is still missing. The lack of an alert angers her father, Felix DeJesus, who believes the public will listen even if the alerts become routine.

"The Amber Alert should work for any missing child," Mr. DeJesus said. "It doesn't have to be an abduction. Whether it's an abduction or a runaway, a child needs to be found. We need to change this law."

Statistics show the first three hours are the most critical to recovering the child alive, according to the missing children center. But law enforcement officials cannot automatically issue an alert without an investigation, said Robert Hoever, deputy director of special operations at the center.

"It's a very, very difficult balancing act that these Amber coordinators face," Mr. Hoever said. "Typically, across the country these Amber coordinators are put in a position where they're damned if they do and they're damned if they don't."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Penalties Often Go Unpaid (WT/AP)

By Martha Mendoza And Christopher Sullivan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

When a gasoline spill and explosion killed three young persons in Washington state, officials announced a record penalty against a gas-pipeline company: $3 million to send the message that such tragedies "must never happen again."

When nuclear labs across the country were found exposing workers to radiation and breaking other safety rules, assessments totaling $2.5 million were quickly ordered.

What happened next with these no-nonsense enforcement measures? Not much. The pipeline tab eventually was reduced by 92 percent, and the labs' assessments were waived as soon as they were issued.

The amount of unpaid federal fines has risen sharply in the past decade. Individuals and corporations regularly avoid large penalties for wrongdoing -- sometimes through negotiations, sometimes because companies go bankrupt, sometimes because of officials' failure to keep close track of who owes what.

These are conclusions of an Associated Press examination of federal financial-penalty enforcement across the nation, which also found:

• The government currently is owed more than $35 billion in fines and other payments from criminals and in civil cases, according to Justice Department figures. This is almost five times the amount uncollected 10 years ago -- and enough to cover the annual budget of the Department of Homeland Security. A decade ago, Congress mandated that fines be imposed regardless of defendants' ability to pay, which has added tremendously to outstanding debt.

• In 2004, federal authorities ordered $7.8 billion in 98,985 fines, penalties and restitution demands in criminal and civil cases, but collected less than half of that.

• White-collar crime cases account for the largest amount of uncollected debt. In a study, Government Accountability Office (GAO) investigators found that just 7 percent of restitution in such cases is paid.

"Fines and orders to pay restitution are an important part of how we punish convicted criminals. When so little effort is made to collect that money, we allow convicted criminals to avoid punishment for their crimes, weaken our criminal justice system and ultimately deny justice to the victims of crimes," said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat, who has pressed for closer scrutiny for years.

The AP filed Freedom of Information Act requests with a dozen federal agencies, seeking records on why and how they issue and collect administrative penalties and other assessments.

Although the government does collect billions each year in fines, penalties and restitution, success rates vary from agency to agency, region to region, case to case.

In many high-profile cases, fines are touted by authorities as proof that they are cracking down. Yet frequently those orders are quietly negotiated to just a fraction of their original amounts.

Documents provided to the AP by the Labor Department's Employment Benefits Security Administration, whose job is to protect pension and welfare benefits, showed that $2,000 was the maximum amount paid on nearly a dozen penalties ranging from $86,500 to $180,000.

Why the reductions? Officials explained that compliance is the agency's goal, and that the law allows penalties to be reduced when companies make amends. Violators who don't comply risk being referred to the Treasury Department, which can collect by seizing federal benefits.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration's written policy explains to inspectors that they can reduce penalties by as much as 95 percent, "depending upon the employer's 'good faith,' (25 percent) 'size of business,' (60 percent) and 'history of previous violations.' (10 percent)"

Federal law exempts the national nuclear laboratories from most financial liability, but the Energy Department has issued about $2.5 million in fines against Los Alamos, Livermore and Argonne national laboratories since 2000.

"This is kind of an exercise in absurdity," said Greg Mello, who heads the Los Alamos Study Group, a nuclear-disarmament activist organization in Albuquerque, N.M.

Even so, the Energy Department includes the fines in its annual reports to Congress and often announces them in press releases.

Last year, Congress tightened the rules so that as nuclear-laboratory contracts are renewed, the fine waivers are eliminated. Eventually, DOE spokesman Jeff Sherwood said, nuclear labs will have to pay imposed fines.

The reason DOE issued fines it could not collect was to show what the problems were and how bad, he said: "A $1 million fine says something different than a $10,000 fine."

When agencies can't get debtors to pay, the Justice Department may get the task of collecting a penalty. But the process is decentralized. The collection legwork falls to the 93 U.S. Attorney's Offices across the country.

Reviewing the adequacy of staffing was one of 14 recommendations made by GAO in 2001 to improve collection. A follow-up report two years ago still found "fragmented processes and lack of coordination."

The Justice Department office overseeing U.S. attorneys said it has made strides toward better coordination.

The 1996 Victims Mandatory Restitution Act requires judges to order payments regardless of a defendant's ability to pay. It's no coincidence, says Natalie Collins of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Las Vegas, that the uncollected debts have steeply increased since the law was passed.

Many people leave prison with a large debt they can't pay, she said. "We can't squeeze blood out of a turnip."

Abortion Ban Prompts Calls For Boycott (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

PIERRE, S.D., March 18 — South Dakota politicians and state agencies have been bombarded in the past few weeks with thousands of calls, letters and e-mail messages, for and against the state's recently enacted ban on nearly all abortions.

A few groups who oppose the ban have called for a tourism boycott of South Dakota, urging people to avoid attractions like Mount Rushmore; the Badlands; the annual motorcycle rally in Sturgis; and the Corn Palace, an arena in Mitchell whose walls are covered with colorful ears of corn.

The furor was prompted by the passage of the strictest abortion law in America — a ban on all abortions except to save a woman's life.

Tourism is South Dakota's second-largest industry, behind agriculture, with visitors to the state spending $809 million last year, according to the Tourism Department.

Among those calling for a boycott is the Women's Medical Fund, an abortion rights organization based in Madison, Wis. "Our message is that if they are going to treat women in this inhumane way, they can expect to pay a price," said Anne Nicol Gaylor, administrator of the group.

Billie Jo Waara, the South Dakota state tourism director, said her office had been getting a dozen or so calls a day from people on both sides of the issue. Some say they will not vacation in South Dakota, but very few had canceled previously made travel plans, she said.

Abortion Ban Likely To Go To Voters In South Dakota (MINNST)

Leader of opposition says he doesn't foresee much difficulty in getting 16,728 signatures on a petition.

Chuck Haga, Star Tribune It appears likely that South Dakota's recently adopted ban on abortions will be referred to the state's voters.

Jim Robinson, secretary of the nonprofit organization Focus South Dakota, said he expects "a large variety of groups that disagree with this extremist ban" to participate in a petition drive to keep the law from taking effect July 1 and go on the November general election ballot.

"I wouldn't anticipate too much difficulty" in obtaining the necessary 16,728 signatures, he said. "We want to make it a unified effort."

That includes discouraging out-of-state groups from taking too high a profile, Robinson said. Last week, Focus South Dakota persuaded a small abortion-rights group in Wisconsin to scuttle its plans for a petition drive to refer the law.

"It's not surprising to me at all that people around the country want to help," he said. "But we want this to be done by South Dakotans."

Kate Looby of Planned Parenthood -- whose clinic in Sioux Falls is the only facility in the state to offer abortion services -- said the organization will decide this week whether to join a referral effort or seek an injunction and challenge the law in court.

Robinson said a recent poll by Focus South Dakota showed that 57 percent of registered South Dakota voters said they would overturn the ban. But abortion opponent Leslee Unruh called those results "deceptive" and said her Abstinence Clearinghouse found in December that 64 percent of state households consider themselves anti-abortion.

Unruh said she looks forward to a statewide campaign focused on abortion.

Challenge welcomed

The abortion ban, which would allow exceptions to save the life of the mother but not for rape or incest or to preserve the mother's health, was signed on March 6 by Gov. Mike Rounds.

Supporters have said they expect and welcome a challenge, with the South Dakota statute reaching the U.S. Supreme Court and affording the justices an opportunity to overturn the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision, which established a woman's right to an abortion.

Unruh acknowledged that some abortion opponents would prefer a law that allows exceptions in cases involving rape or incest, but she expects that those people still would vote to uphold the ban, especially if they understand that women who seek help immediately after such attacks may use the so-called "morning after" pill.

"I'm not afraid to stand up for those children [conceived as a result of rape], as well," she said. "But if you go immediately to your doctor, [the alternative] is there."

Sen. Stanford Adelstein, R-Rapid City, said he's "certain" the ban will be referred to voters. He voted against the bill after proponents turned aside all amendments, including exceptions for rape and incest. "People are so angry ... I can't imagine we couldn't get enough signatures," he said from Jerusalem, where he's attending a professional meeting.

The state's tourism department reports receiving e-mails from people saying they won't visit the state because of the abortion ban. Mark Johnston, press secretary for Rounds, added, "We're hearing from people on both sides, from all over the world."

Unwed Fathers Fight For Babies Placed For Adoption By Mothers (NYT)

By Tamar Lewin

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

Jeremiah Clayton Jones discovered that his former fiancée was pregnant just three weeks before the baby was due, when an adoption-agency lawyer called and asked if he would consent to have his baby adopted.

"I said absolutely not," said Mr. Jones, a 23-year-old Arizona man who met his ex-fiancée at Pensacola Christian College in Florida. "It was an awkward moment, hearing for the first time that I would be a father, and then right away being told, 'We want to take your kid away.' But I knew that if I was having a baby, I wanted that baby."

Mr. Jones has never seen his son, now 18 months old. Instead, he lost his parental rights because of his failure to file with a state registry for unwed fathers — something he learned of only after it was too late.

Under Florida law, and that of other states, an unmarried father has no right to withhold consent for adoption unless he has registered with the state putative father registry before an adoption petition is filed. Mr. Jones missed the deadline.

Although one in every three American babies has unwed parents, birth fathers' rights remain an unsettled area, a delicate balancing act between the importance of biological ties and the undisrupted placement of babies whose mothers relinquish them for adoption.

While women have the right to get an abortion, or to have and raise a child, without informing the father, courts have increasingly found that when birth mothers choose adoption, fathers who have shown a desire for involvement have rights, too.

But to claim those rights most states require a father to put his name on a registry. While about 30 states now have registries, they vary widely. In some, fathers must actually claim paternity; in others, just the possibility of paternity. The deadlines may be 5 days after birth or 30, or any time before an adoption petition is filed.

And registries are a double-edged sword: It remains an open question whether they serve more to protect fathers' rights or to protect adoptive parents, and the babies they have bonded with, from biological fathers' claims.

"My specialty is contested adoptions, and the most common contest is where the mom wants to place the baby and the dad objects," said Martin Bauer, president of the American Academy of Adoption Attorneys. "Registries can protect men against birth mothers who won't disclose the father's name or actively lie about his identity."

Adam Pertman, executive director of the Evan B. Donaldson Adoption Institute, a nonprofit research and education group, sees it differently. "It's all smoke and mirrors," Mr. Pertman said. "How can registries work if no one's heard of them? And it's just not reasonable to expect that men will register every time they have sex."

In the early 1990's, the two-year fight over Baby Jessica and the four-year battle over Baby Richard highlighted the wrenching dramas of birth parents winning custody of babies placed with adoptive parents years earlier. The spectacle of those children being taken from the arms of the only parents they had known raised an outcry about the need for speedy, permanent placement.

While some states have long had putative father registries — New York's registry was upheld by the United States Supreme Court in 1983 — most were started in the last decade to head off late parental claims.

In many states, fewer than 100 men register each year — not surprising, adoption experts say, because most young men have never heard of the registries. One exception is Indiana, where men are notified of the registry when a birth mother names them as the father, and 50 men register a week.

Adoption lawyers say some birth mothers refuse to identify the father to forestall interference. There are no statistics on how many unmarried fathers seek to raise babies the birth mother has relinquished.

Mary Beck, a professor at the University of Missouri School of Law, said the burden of registering should be the father's.

"There are men who complain, 'What, I have to file for every woman I've had sex with?' " Professor Beck said. "But men are on notice of possible pregnancy by virtue of having had sex, and the alternative is leaving it up to the women to chase them down."

Even for registered men, the system is flawed. Because the registries are state by state, a registration means nothing if the father or mother has moved — or if the baby was surrendered for adoption in a different state specifically to avoid a challenge.

In one case, Frank Osborne of North Carolina challenged his 5-month-old son's adoption in Utah. The Utah Supreme Court rejected Mr. Osborne's claim, but a dissenting judge found it unfair that Mr. Osborne lost a child he had lived with and supported until the mother "unilaterally and clandestinely" took the boy to Utah.

Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, will address that problem in the Proud Father Act, which would create a national registry and is to be introduced in Congress later this year.

"In a perfect world, everything would be linked so that everyone could find out if a man had registered or filed for paternity," said Jim Outman, a lawyer in Atlanta who consulted on the legislation. "But in the real world, the left hand doesn't always know what the right hand is doing.

"If there's nothing in the records in their county, their state, how is an adoption agency supposed to know there's a father who's going to come forward in two years? There has to be some security for the adoptive parents and the child."

One self-made expert on the registries is Erik L. Smith, an Ohio paralegal who fathered a son in Texas and fought for paternal rights after the baby's placement with an adoptive family. In an unusual resolution, the boy, now 13, lives with the adoptive family, while Mr. Smith, a noncustodial father, has visiting rights. Mr. Smith was naturally intrigued when he heard of the Ohio registry in a class where the professor explained that babies born to unwed parents could be adopted without the father's consent unless he registered within 30 days after the birth.

"I asked if that meant that, to protect his rights, a man should register every time he has sex with a new partner, and he said yes," Mr. Smith said.

So he tried. "I called information and asked how I could contact the Ohio putative father registry, but there was no listing," Mr. Smith said. "I searched the Internet but couldn't find any address."

While Ohio's system has improved, he said, "as long as registries aren't publicized, I think they just work as a way to get rid of fathers like me."

Glenn Spraggs, a 22-year-old Cincinnati man, was recently caught short by ignorance of the Ohio registry. His girlfriend, Sharicka Watson, had a baby boy, Thomas, on Dec. 2, and Mr. Spraggs, who also has a daughter with Ms. Watson, was with her when he was born. Ms. Watson has told reporters that she discussed adoption with Mr. Spraggs, but he said he had no warning that less than two weeks after the birth, Ms. Watson would surrender Thomas for adoption.

"No one told me anything," Mr. Spraggs said. "When I found out he was gone, I called the police to see if they could help get him back, or file kidnapping charges or something, but they said there was nothing they could do because it was an adoption. By the time I heard about the registry, it was too late."

Although the Ohio registry gives men 30 days to file, a judge terminated Mr. Spraggs's parental rights when Thomas was 19 days old. After Mr. Spraggs hired a lawyer, the adoption agency returned Thomas to Ms. Watson, who now wants to raise him. A custody hearing in the case is scheduled for tomorrow.

Carol Sanger, a professor at Columbia Law School, said registries reflected a deep societal belief that unmarried fathers are irresponsible.

"If we want registries to mean anything," Professor Sanger said, "we'd have to teach them in every sex education curriculum in every school, and publicize them everywhere."

In Florida, the 2003 law creating the registry requires the State Department of Health "within existing resources" to distribute pamphlets on the registry at every office of the Health Department, the Department of Children and Families and the Bureau of Vital Statistics.

But when Barbara Busharis, a professor at Florida State University, sent students to find the brochures, they had no luck. "They couldn't find anyone who knew anything about the putative father registry," Professor Busharis said.

Mr. Jones's case illustrates the dangers of ignorance. The identity of his former fiancée is confidential, but Mr. Jones's court filings detail his struggle to prevent the adoption.

He tried to contact his ex-fiancée, who disappeared from his life when her parents took her from school and to another county. He called her friends, her brother, her pastor. He hired a Florida lawyer and filed a paternity petition the day before the baby was born, in the county where she previously lived. But that lawyer, now dead, apparently knew nothing of the putative father registry, and never mentioned registering.

Mr. Jones is appealing the termination of his rights. "I don't think there's any greater right that you could trespass on than a parent's right to his child," he said.

In her brief, Allison Perry, Mr. Jones's lawyer, called the Florida registry "a well-kept secret," with just 47 registrants for the 89,436 out-of-wedlock births in 2004. Mr. Jones, living in Arizona, had no reason to know of it. The adoption agency that alerted him to the pregnancy never mentioned it, and when the agency later sent him a letter, it enclosed information on a Florida registry for birth parents interested in a reunion when the children grew up, but nothing on the putative father registry.

Jeanne Tate, a lawyer for the adoption agency, said that because it represented the birth mother's interests, it could not advise Mr. Jones of his rights. Even the call to Mr. Jones went beyond the agency's legal obligations, she said.

"What's good about the law is that it provides clear guidance on whether a baby is or isn't free for adoption," she said, "so you don't get into those heart-wrenching situations where a baby who's been placed has to be removed."

Generally, fathers who have missed registry deadlines have lost their court cases. But Ms. Perry argues that the Florida law, applied as mechanically as in the Jones case, is an unconstitutional intrusion on men's fundamental rights.

"Jeremiah Jones did everything he could reasonably do to establish a relationship with his child," she said. "It's just inconceivable that the government can take away his child because he missed a filing deadline."

Morial Adds His Voice To Election Protests (NOTP)

By Karen Turni Bazile, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 19, 2006

Outcome likely to be contested, he says

Echoing concerns of other civil rights leaders about the fairness of New Orleans' upcoming elections, National Urban League president and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial announced a plan Saturday for out-of-town mayoral forums and outreach programs to help the city's displaced voters.

The National Coalition for Black Civic Participation plans to file a letter of objection to the U.S. Justice Department's approval Thursday of the plans for the April 22 and May 20 elections, said Morial, who was in New Orleans to attend a funeral.

The department gave advance clearance to the plans under the terms of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which requires the Justice Department to review proposed changes in voting procedures in Louisiana and other Southern states to ensure the changes don't discriminate against black voters.

The department's action drew immediate fire from several civil rights groups, which have contended for weeks that too little is being done to ensure that tens of thousands of black voters displaced by Hurricane Katrina will be able to participate in one of the most crucial elections in the city's history.

"What New Orleans and Louisiana do not need right now is another black eye because of a marred election process," Morial said. "With 30 days to go, there's ample opportunity for the plan to be corrected."

Under the current plan, Morial said, there is a strong probability there will be challenges to the April 22 primary or May 20 runoff because absentee ballots are seen as difficult for displaced voters to obtain and fill out.

Morial said the Coalition for Black Civic Participation's objections will focus on the lack of an adequate public relations effort to educate such voters.

He said his group thinks the best way to ensure a fair election is to establish out-of-state voting places, noting that similar arrangements were made for Iraqis in the United States during last year's elections for Iraq's new government.

At a special session this year, the Legislature rejected a proposal to set up satellite sites in cities such as Houston, Atlanta and Jackson, Miss., where tens of thousands of displaced voters have relocated. A federal judge also refused to order use of such sites.

Besides filing an objection to the election plans, Morial said the coalition is planning "Katrina survivor empowerment weekends" in several cities before the election.

As part of each weekend, the group will sponsor a mayoral forum and a meet-and-greet session for all candidates in all races, and it will offer information about absentee balloting and other post-Katrina issues.

The forums are scheduled for March 25 in Houston, March 31 in New Orleans, April 8 in Atlanta and April 15 in Baton Rouge. Exact locations and times have not been announced.

Under plans developed by Secretary of State Al Ater, the state's chief elections official, and the Legislature, satellite voting places will be established in 10 other Louisiana parishes, where displaced New Orleans voters will be able to cast absentee ballots in person on April 10-13 and 15 for the primary.

DOJ_NMG_0018914

In addition, information packets are being sent to displaced voters nationwide explaining how to vote absentee by mail, and the state has bought newspaper ads in many cities to tell displaced voters about the election. Many mayoral and other candidates are expected to campaign in cities where New Orleanians are concentrated.

But Morial said those plans are not sufficient. In at least one case, he said, a displaced voter's packet was sent to his flooded local home, not his post-Katrina address.

Besides avoiding problems in the New Orleans elections, Morial said, having out-of-state satellite polling places would avert problems in fall elections that will affect displaced voters from St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes and other areas devastated by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Pick For Interior Said To Show More Charm Than Substance (LAT)

By Tomas Alex Tizon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Gov. Dirk Kempthorne of Idaho is well-liked as a down-to-earth guy. But some doubt his ability to get the job done, citing a list of unfinished plans.

BOISE, Idaho — He rides motorcycles, battles a bad back, does a killer impersonation of fellow Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, and sometimes forgets to balance his checkbook.

Even those who don't like his politics call him "Dirk," the way he prefers to be addressed. And they speak of him like he's the guy next door who just happens to be governor.

But the ready smile and neighborly style of Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne don't always get the job done, some supporters and critics say. They contend that the man President Bush has picked to succeed Gale A. Norton as secretary of the Interior often exhibits more charm than substance.

Fellow Republicans and business leaders say Kempthorne, 54, knows how to create consensus but is too politically cautious. Local Democrats and environmentalists say that he is gifted at making people feel heard but that, at the end of the day, his loyalties lie squarely with development and corporate interests.

If confirmed, what kind of Interior secretary will Kempthorne be?

In the Idaho state capital, where he has been a major political player for two decades, many predict his performance will mirror that of his years as Boise mayor, U.S. senator and two-term governor — a record of mixed success with a list of unfinished projects and a whole lot of people who refer to him as a good guy.

"His charisma carries him a long way. Even when we were at odds, he was very quick to approach our group with a smile and a handshake," said Roger Singer, the executive director of the local chapter of the Sierra Club from 1995 to 2004.

"He's very good at giving the appearance that he's listening closely to what you're saying," Singer said. "In the end, his votes have fallen along the conservative party line."

Singer cites two examples:

In the mid- to late 1990s, Kempthorne successfully brokered a deal — protested by environmentalists — allowing the military to expand a training ground into the Owyhee Canyonlands in southwestern Idaho. Kempthorne also succeeded in weakening federal protection of gray wolves, shifting control to the state.

Singer fears Kempthorne would continue his long campaign to water down the federal Endangered Species Act and would support oil-drilling in the Arctic and the sale of public lands to special-interest groups. Kempthorne, Singer said, has worked to overturn President Clinton's ban on building roads in wilderness areas.

"I'd like to give him the benefit of the doubt in his new job," Singer said, "but my fear is he'll be closely aligned with Bush administration policies that have been detrimental to the environment."

DOJ_NMG_0018915

National environmental groups are harsher in their assessment. The League of Conservation Voters gave him a rating of 6 on a zero-to-100 scale.

Local political watchers view Kempthorne as a "middle of the road" Republican in an overwhelmingly conservative state. Among his critics are Republicans who say he isn't conservative enough. But many Idaho Republicans are pleased that one of their own has been tapped to be part of the president's Cabinet.

Former state Sen. Laird Noh, who led the Senate Resources and Environment Committee from the early 1980s to 2004, called Kempthorne "a good steward, a balanced steward" of the environment.

"He used considerable political skill to protect resources while also allowing for reasonable use of those resources," the former senator said.

Noh, a Republican, credited Kempthorne with engineering an agreement with the Nez Perce Tribe over its claims to the waters of the Snake River, ending a decade of sometimes acrimonious debate. The compromise resolved the tribe's water claims, preserved the state's water rights and set protections for salmon and steelhead.

The agreement is seen as one of Kempthorne's biggest accomplishments.

But Kempthorne's most loyal supporters hail from his days as Boise mayor, between 1986 and 1993. He is largely credited for revitalizing a moribund downtown.

Don Brennan, a city councilman when Kempthorne was mayor, tells how Kempthorne took the initiative. It's a story that Kempthorne likes to tell himself.

One day in 1986, the mayor assembled all the key players, including the City Council, in one room and told the group to finally make a decision on building the Boise Centre on the Grove, an open-air commercial plaza in the city's core.

Kempthorne said the media were outside and anyone who wanted to admit failure could leave. An agreement was reached shortly after.

"The people in that room didn't think they could get out," said Brennan, a Democrat. Brennan said Kempthorne was most effective in his city role. Kempthorne's successes as U.S. senator from 1993 to 1999, and as governor from 1999 to the present, have been fewer and harder-fought, Brennan said.

Kempthorne was born in San Diego and has lived in Idaho for 35 years. He earned a political science degree from the University of Idaho, where he was student body president as a junior. He and his wife, Patricia, have two grown children.

Before running for mayor, he worked as a public affairs manager for FMC Corp., a Philadelphia chemical company, and was executive vice president of the Idaho Home Builders Assn.

His election and reelection as governor came handily: He won the 1998 election by 68%, and four years later by 56%.

Kempthorne, who got to know Bush when both were governors, was considered a leading candidate to be the new administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency in 2003. The job eventually went to a career administrator, Stephen L. Johnson, but Kempthorne remained on Bush's radar. When the president visited Idaho last summer, the two went bike riding in the mountains.

Kempthorne's popularity took some hits after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks when he barricaded the Statehouse and closed off several city blocks for nearly a year. A number of downtown businesses in this city of 185,000 suffered as a result of the closures. "It was a huge overreaction," said Boise Mayor David H. Bieter, who held a town hall meeting on the issue.

In May of last year, Kempthorne bounced a couple of checks totaling $111 to his hairstylist. The governor, who earns a salary and housing allowance of more than $150,000, told the media that he and his wife had been very busy and that their finances had been drained by surgeries for his chronically bad back.

The mishap made the governor appear more down-to-earth to many Idahoans, just as his avid interest in Harley-Davidson motorcycles had.

Even his harshest critics — including Spokane, Wash., Democrat and former Idahoan Tom Keefe, who calls Kempthorne "a pleasant man in a somewhat empty suit" — often end their critiques with statements like "That doesn't mean I don't like the man."

Keefe said it wouldn't surprise him if, after Kempthorne served as Interior secretary, the former governor became "a head lobbyist for the mining industry." Mining and ranching interests have strongly endorsed Kempthorne.

Overriding disagreements with Kempthorne on economic and social matters is the sense among Idahoans that "one of our own is ready for the big leagues," said political science professor Steve Shaw of Northwest Nazarene University in Nampa, Idaho.

There's great pride that another Idaho governor could follow former Gov. Cecil D. Andrus, Interior secretary under President Carter.

Shaw said some Idaho residents saw Kempthorne as "a photogenic man who isn't much into doing the heavy, hard lifting of getting policies pushed through."

Examples include Kempthorne's unfinished campaign, which began when he was U.S. senator, to overhaul the Endangered Species Act; and his child welfare program, Generation of the Child, which critics say has fizzled.

Idaho legislators fear that Kempthorne's $34-million plan to improve Idaho parks and his $1.6-billion highway project may fall by the wayside if the governor becomes too distracted by the Cabinet appointment process.

But what will probably carry the day for Kempthorne politically is his knack for connecting with people.

Last year, Northwest Nazarene University awarded Kempthorne an honorary degree. After the reception, with the media and everybody gone, Shaw watched as Kempthorne knelt on the floor and chatted face-to-face at length with several small children.

Shaw said: "There's something very human about the man."

Senator Could Play A Smarter Hand On Energy (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Jeff Bingaman is a personable, hard-working and very smart senator. But the New Mexico Democrat doesn't appear to be much of a poker player.

Bingaman is now helping Senate Republicans and the energy industry advance one of their top goals: a bill to expand drilling for oil and gas in the Gulf of Mexico off the Florida coast. He's doing so even though Republicans are blocking the energy priorities of Bingaman and most other Democrats: more focus on conservation and renewable energy.

By helping Republicans pursue their agenda while the GOP suppresses Democratic preferences, Bingaman isn't only making a bad bargain — he's making it more difficult for the nation to craft a comprehensive plan to reduce our excessive dependence on foreign oil.

The key to greater energy independence isn't so much a scientific breakthrough as a political accommodation between the forces supporting more domestic production and those focused on greater conservation. And that won't come without the kind of hardball bargaining so far missing from the legislative maneuvering over the Florida drilling plan.

The debate on this issue is important partly because it could set the model for what are likely to be a series of confrontations over offshore drilling.

Much of the outer continental shelf has been off-limits for decades. In 1981, James G. Watt, President Reagan's chain saw of an Interior secretary, proposed to sprout oil rigs across 1 billion acres offshore; Congress, fearing oil spills and other environmental damage, blocked him by banning leasing off most of the nation's coastline.

Congress has renewed that moratorium every year since, and Presidents George H.W. Bush and Clinton reinforced it with anti-drilling directives that extend through 2012. Call it Watt's bequest to the environmental movement.

But those shields are cracking. With energy prices high and concern about energy independence higher, proposals are proliferating in Congress to reopen the outer continental shelf to drilling for natural gas or to allow states to opt out of the moratorium. Last month, the Bush administration released a draft five-year plan that envisioned substantial offshore development in the Gulf Coast, the Mid-Atlantic and off Alaska.

The next skirmish in this escalating battle is the legislation on Florida drilling, sponsored by Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.), chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, with support from Bingaman.

The bill would open a large swath of the gulf south of Pensacola and west of Tampa. Although the area isn't covered by the congressional moratorium, environmentalists and Florida's tourism industry have long opposed drilling there. Both of the state's U.S. senators, Republican Mel Martinez and Democrat Bill Nelson, are also resisting.

The administration's new plan envisions leasing about 2 million acres in the area over the next five years. But Domenici's bill would require the Interior Department within the next year to lease as much as 3.6 million acres, including areas within 100 miles of the Florida coastline.

Martinez and Nelson want to limit the gulf drilling to no more than 1.3 million acres and bar it within 150 miles of the coastline, while extending the moratorium for the rest of the outer continental shelf through 2020. But Domenici's approach recently roared through his Energy Committee on a 16-5 vote.

Even opponents concede Domenici's bill probably has majority support in the Senate. But it's uncertain that he could muster the 60 votes needed to break a filibuster by Nelson, who has threatened one. And that should provide critics leverage to negotiate.

Environmentalists want to preserve the moratorium on almost all offshore development. That's understandable: It's their job to be purists. But given the concern about foreign oil, the Republican push for greater domestic production, and the substantial resources potentially available offshore, more drilling seems inevitable.

Rather than trying to block all offshore leasing, opponents should insist that more drilling occur only as part of a comprehensive energy plan. One element of such a plan would be tight environmental protections and careful limits on the areas opened for lease. Equally important would be commitments from drilling advocates to couple any new production with serious measures to reduce demand.

That's where Bingaman has played such a questionable hand. Last year, White House officials and congressional Republicans agreed to strip from the final version of an energy bill a measure that Bingaman had steered through the Senate requiring utilities to generate 10% of their electricity from renewable energy by 2020. Last week, the Senate, on a nearly party line vote, rejected a Bingaman proposal to pump $5.3 billion more into federal spending on conservation and renewable energy. Domenici and every Energy Committee Republican voted against Bingaman.

And yet, on the Florida bill, Bingaman is providing critical bipartisan cover for the same GOP legislators who derailed his ideas.

When asked why he and other Democrats should accept more Florida drilling while their own proposals languish, Bingaman seemed surprised.

"I think you make progress where you can in this process," he said. "I have no problem supporting this as a free-standing provision."

The problem is that this Congress isn't likely to pass any "free-standing provision" promoting conservation, efficiency or alternative energy. Those priorities, essential to any long-term energy strategy, can advance only if Republicans see them as the price of increasing domestic energy production.

Greater offshore drilling would make sense in a grand bargain on energy that includes tougher fuel economy standards for vehicles and much greater support for renewable energy. But that bargain will never come if Democrats such as Bingaman give Republicans and the energy industry what they want without demanding anything in return.

Going Cold Turkey (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

SOMETIME BETWEEN now and the end of the month, the Bush administration is due to issue a revised set of fuel economy standards for "light trucks," a category of passenger cars that includes most sport utility vehicles, smaller pickup trucks and minivans. In other words, the White House is at last able to start making good on its promise to end America's "oil addiction," in a concrete way.

Unfortunately, there isn't yet any certainty that the necessary willpower exists. At the moment, the Transportation Department's tentative proposal to update the current rules requires manufacturers to raise the fuel economy standards for light trucks by only 1.8 miles per gallon over four years. That's a slower rate of improvement than is mandated at the moment. The technology exists to raise the standards much higher, much faster and not at much greater cost. Raising the standard for light trucks from the current 21 mpg to 25 mpg in 2010 and 26 mpg in 2011 would, according to a calculation by Environmental Defense, save almost as much oil annually by 2025 as we currently import from Saudi Arabia.

More important, the administration should start including heavier pickup trucks and SUVs, which, thanks to a regulatory quirk, aren't covered by minimum mileage rules at all. Again, requiring manufacturers to use available technology and to make minimal improvements could make a huge difference over time, both in saving fuel and in reducing emissions of the carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases that cause global warming.

There is no reason not to make these changes -- except cowardice. But these days, not even that is an excuse. Some 93 percent of Americans, according to one poll, support making cars and trucks more fuel-efficient. Nowadays, saving fuel is not only good for the economy, good for foreign policy and good for the environment, it's politically popular, too.

A Breath Of Fresh Air (NYT)

Clean air advocates who have had little to cheer about for the last five years finally won a big victory on Friday. In a unanimous decision, a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit struck down as illegal an attempt by the Bush administration to allow power plants and other industrial polluters to evade the Clean Air Act.

At issue was a provision of the act known as New Source Review. It requires older power plants to install modern pollution controls when they undergo physical or operational changes that increase harmful emissions. The rule was largely unused until the mid-1990's, when the Clinton administration and Northeastern states led by New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, decided to start suing companies that had upgraded their plants without installing the necessary controls. The companies complained to Vice President Dick Cheney about the costs and Mr. Cheney ordered the Environmental Protection Agency to find a way around the law.

The agency's answer was an amazing piece of regulatory casuistry that would have allowed utilities to make investments in a plant equal to one-fifth of the total cost of replacing it before the rule was applied; anything less than that was to be regarded as "routine maintenance."

This extraordinarily generous threshold would have allowed hundreds of plants responsible for thousands of illnesses to continue with business as usual. As the court noted, it would also have had the perverse effect of allowing plants that are now in compliance with the law to break it. This is not, the court added, what Congress had in mind. Ruling in favor of a coalition of states and environmental advocacy groups, the court declared that the "plain language" of the act required a much stricter approach, as the Clinton administration had devised, and that only "a Humpty Dumpty" interpretation, as the court called the E.P.A.'s position, could construe the law otherwise.

We should not expect the current E.P.A. administrators to rush the battlements with new enforcement cases. Indeed, such is Mr. Cheney's continued reach in these matters, the agency even now is seeking other, subtler ways to undermine the law. But it is nice to hear someone say that you cannot rewrite an act of Congress just because you do not like it.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Audit Critical Of FBI, Contractors (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

GAO Questions Millions in Expenses on Computer Upgrade

DOJ_NMG_0018919

The FBI and its contractors spent more than $17 million on first-class airfare, inflated labor rates, missing equipment and other questionable payments during the botched attempt to upgrade the bureau's outdated computer system, according to a new audit from congressional investigators.

The findings by the Government Accountability Office expand the controversy surrounding the FBI's Trilogy program, which cost more than $535 million but failed to produce a usable case-management system for agents because of cost overruns and technical problems.

The FBI announced this week that it would spend an additional $425 million in an attempt to finish the job. Two of the contractors singled out in the audit for inflated spending, Computer Sciences Corp. and CACI International Inc., have been chosen as subcontractors for the new system, named Sentinel.

Officials with the FBI and the project's main contractor, Lockheed Martin Corp., have vowed to implement stricter controls to avoid cost overruns and other problems in the new initiative.

The 82-page GAO report, obtained by The Washington Post, outlines a long series of questionable expenditures by contractors assigned to the Trilogy project. For example, more than 100 airplane flights costing more than $120,000 were booked at first-class or full-fare rates by CSC and others, despite government rules requiring lower-priced tickets, the report said.

Contractors also did not provide adequate documentation for millions of dollars in costs billed to the FBI, the report said. In one invoice cited by the GAO, $1.907 million out of $1.951 million was listed only as "other direct costs" by CACI.

The review also showed that CACI bought 30,000 pens and 30,000 highlighters for training sessions that were custom-made for Trilogy. Total costs: $19,705 for the pens and $32,314 for the markers.

The audit blasts the FBI and the General Services Administration for poor oversight of these and other expenditures. The report also notes that the FBI -- which has had a history of difficulty keeping track of items including guns and laptop computers -- was unable to locate more than 1,200 items purchased with Trilogy funds, including personal computers, servers and printers, valued at $7.6 million.

The FBI's struggle to modernize its computer system has been a recurring headache for Director Robert S. Mueller III and has earned it considerable criticism from lawmakers. The Sept. 11 commission said outdated computers may have contributed to missteps before the 2001 attacks and continue to hamper the FBI in combating terrorism and other crimes.

The hardware upgrade overseen by CSC was largely successful, yielding thousands of new PCs for agents. But a separate $170 million software upgrade foundered and was abandoned last year because it was over budget and did not work.

The auditors said the problems with Trilogy may well be much worse than their report shows because the review was based on only a portion of the FBI's payments to contractors. "If these weaknesses go uncorrected, future contracts, including those related to the FBI's new electronic management system initiative, referred to as Sentinel, will be highly exposed to improper payments," the auditors wrote.

That assessment echoes a warning issued earlier this week by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine, who said in a report that the FBI is at risk of repeating its Trilogy mistakes with Sentinel because of management turnover and weak financial controls.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), a frequent FBI critic and one of the senators who requested the audit, said, "It's time for the FBI to explain what assurances it has that the taxpayers will be able to recover any funds these companies owe to the government before we start paying them millions more for work on Sentinel."

The FBI said in a statement that it has tracked down more than 1,000 of the missing items and has put in place numerous checks to avoid the problems that plagued Trilogy. "We have strengthened our internal controls to avoid repeat of the issues cited by auditors, from any vendor," spokesman Michael Kortan said.

Tim Sheahan, president of the CSC division that handled the contract, said many of the airline expenses were due to short-notice trips by employees who frequently had to crisscross the country to troubleshoot problems or deliver equipment for the FBI's massive hardware upgrade. He also said expenditures were well documented.

"Think about a rolling wave of humans and stuff rolling across the United States and being deployed," Sheahan said. "I believe that the things we bought were well documented and if there was a question about something, we had the backup."

In its own letter responding to the allegations, the GSA said it accepted the GAO's recommendations for reform but disagreed with some of its conclusions regarding travel and other costs. A CACI representative did not return a telephone message yesterday.

Lockheed Martin will be paid $305 million as the main contractor for the Sentinel project. It will be required to meet benchmarks in order to be paid as the six-year project proceeds, FBI and company officials said this week. Officials hope to provide FBI agents with Internet access to some FBI databases within a year, and the entire Web-based Sentinel system is scheduled to be operating by late 2009.

FBI Questioned On $17M Computer Spending (UPI)

United Press International, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 19 (UPI) -- The U.S. federal spending watchdog has challenged the FBI over $17 million in computer expenditures and other spending on equipment that can't be located.

The audit was done by the Government Accountability Office on the FBI's Virtual Case File program, which was launched after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

In an 87-page report obtained by CNN, auditors said another $7.5 million was spent on 1,200 pieces of equipment that can't be accounted for.

However, an FBI spokesman told CNN the agency's own audit had accounted for most of the equipment.

The FBI's new Sentinel computer system will cost about $400 million, and the GAO warned in its report that unless accounting procedures are tightened, millions more could be wasted on the new project.

Many 'Concerns' Cited In Audit Of New FBI Program (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

The FBI has improved its ability to plan and manage a new information-technology project but still faces major problems in implementing the program, designed to replace a failed $170 million system, an audit says.

Known as Sentinel, the program was introduced last year as a replacement for the failed Virtual Case File system and is scheduled to be fully operational by 2009 at an expected cost of $425 million. It is part of an FBI effort to close internal communication gaps and improve information sharing with other law-enforcement and intelligence agencies.

The system will be built by Lockheed Martin Corp., the winning bidder last week on a $305 million contract. The FBI also expects to spend about $120 million evaluating the system.

The audit by the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General said that although the FBI has developed new technology-planning processes that can help the agency complete a new case- and information-management system, "several continuing concerns" remain regarding the FBI's management of the new project.

Those concerns include incomplete staffing of the Sentinel program management office, the FBI's ability to redirect funds to complete the second phase of the project without jeopardizing its mission-critical operations, and Sentinel's ability to share information with external agencies and provide a framework for other agencies' case-management systems.

The audit also raised questions about the FBI's ability to control Sentinel's costs and a lack of documentation required by the bureau's information-technology investment management processes.

In a response to the audit, the FBI said steps were being taken to ensure the system's security, design and costs.

The Virtual Case File system ended last year after the Office of the Inspector General said the project had poorly defined design requirements, lacked mature information-technology investment management and suffered from poor management and oversight.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said the FBI plans to fund the first two phases of Sentinel by seeking congressional approval to redirect funds, with the third and fourth phases funded by new appropriations. He said more than $14 million of the initial redirection will come from the bureau's counterterrorism budget, $13 million from intelligence-related activities and $2 million from its cyber division.

Previously, "the FBI lacked an effective, reliable system to track and validate the project's costs. Although the FBI stated that it is evaluating a tool to track Sentinel project costs, we view the potential weaknesses in cost control as a project risk," Mr. Fine said.

In addition, he said, the bureau has not adequately examined Sentinel's ability to connect with external systems in other Justice Department areas, the Department of Homeland Security and other intelligence agencies. He said that if "such connectivity" is not built into Sentinel's design, other agencies could be forced into costly and time-consuming modifications.

Md. First Lady's TV Talk Show Won't Be Seen In Classrooms (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Maryland first lady Kendel Ehrlich pitched the state schools superintendent a plan to air her television talk show about drug and alcohol prevention in public school classrooms, but the department eventually turned her down.

The State Education Department declined her offer after an expert on drug and alcohol prevention reviewed it and determined that it was not suitable for children. One episode, filmed on the beach and at a nightclub in Ocean City, includes sexually explicit language and brief nudity as it explores the pitfalls of drinking.

The department instead offered to distribute the videos to parents and PTAs.

Comcast Cable Communications Inc. paid Ehrlich $55,000 to host 16 episodes of "Live Right: Straight Talk on Substance Abuse," which to date has been available only in the cable provider's on-demand library.

Democrats in Annapolis said they considered the proposal the latest attempt by the Republican governor and first lady to use their clout to gain widespread television exposure and statewide name recognition.

In response to a series of taxpayer-financed tourism commercials and public service announcements that featured the governor and first lady, the legislature has included language in the budget this year that would ban the practice during the upcoming campaign season.

A spokesman for the first lady said she would not comment. State Superintendent Nancy S. Grasmick said she believes Kendel Ehrlich's goals in seeing the show distributed were in no way political but instead aimed at spreading the word about teenage drug and alcohol abuse, an issue the first lady has championed for years.

"I don't think it's politicizing the classroom," Grasmick said. "Each first lady, even Laura Bush, Hillary Clinton, they all have a piece they carve out that is a personal interest. . . . For this first lady, this is a real issue."

Grasmick said she never viewed the show and was not aware that one episode include scenes inappropriate for schoolchildren.

Most episodes feature Kendel Ehrlich interviewing authors and scientists who study alcohol abuse, and "straight talk" discussions with recovering addicts. But in one episode, a camera crew follows a group of teenagers to the beach and films them as they become drunk. They smoke cigarettes, curse and talk about such topics as pot, herpes and lesbians. A teenage girl jiggles her hips, and the camera pans to her lower torso.

The first lady appears as the host of every episode and is introduced in each show as the governor's wife. The two are shown in a photograph, hands clasped over their heads, celebrating his inauguration.

House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) raised concerns not about the show's content but about the politics of disseminating it through the schools.

"All of us like to go into classrooms and read to kids," Busch said. "What you don't do is infringe your will on the state school system. You don't try to make yourself part of the mandated curriculum."

Grasmick said the first lady raised the prospect of distributing the show in schools at the conclusion of a November PTA conference. She said "Live Right's" producer, Kris Morrissey, had subsequent talks with education department officials about broadcasting the program.

Morrissey heads a company called Chesapeake Productions and is married to a law school classmate of the first lady's. During the 2002 gubernatorial campaign, Morrissey produced a documentary filming the two major candidates in candid moments as they moved around the state.

In November, the governor appointed her husband, John Morrissey, then a Bowie lawyer, to the Prince George's District Court. Kris Morrissey declined to comment.

Her proposal never broached the subject of compensation, said JoAnne Carter, assistant state superintendent for student and school services.

Grasmick said the idea started to fall apart earlier this year when the department sent episodes out to an expert on drug and alcohol issues for his evaluation. That expert was Michael Gimbel, director of substance abuse education for the Sheppard Pratt Health System in Baltimore.

Gimbel hosts his own show on the topic, "Straight Talk," which has been airing for 17 years in Baltimore on a Fox affiliate. He did not want to give a lengthy review of the first lady's effort and did not wish to discuss the most racy episode.

"I gave them my opinion," he said. "The bottom line is, they're not going to hurt anybody. But when you do shows that are just interview shows, they can become pretty boring for people watching."

Gimbel also said he was surprised Ehrlich had been paid to produce and host the show, and not just because he had been doing the same work for free for 17 years.

"I thought this was part of her role as first lady because she had taken on the issue of drug abuse," he said, adding, "I immediately called my Fox 45 friends, and I asked for a raise."

The Next Crack Cocaine? (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

As Meth Use Grows, Officials Fear Region Is Unprepared to Deal With It

Jimmy Garza was freaking out. As officers handcuffed him inside his posh Fairfax County home on charges relating to a crystal meth addiction, the America Online administrator realized he was about to lose his $60,000-a-year job, his two cars and his freedom.

The arresting officers seemed baffled by his drug of choice. "You know, we don't have a meth problem in this area," Garza remembers one of the officers telling him that night in 2004.

"Are you kidding?" Garza, now 40, snapped back. "Wake up and look around you."

The number of methamphetamine labs and addicts in the Washington area has jumped in recent years, but law enforcement and public health officials say the region is still woefully unprepared to deal with a problem that remains under the radar.

Meth, a dangerously addictive synthetic drug that stimulates the nervous system, has infiltrated suburbs in Virginia and, to a lesser degree, Maryland; Anne Arundel County found three labs in six months last year. In the District, the drug has been used mainly by gay white men but has recently spread into the black and Latino communities and to straight teenagers as young as 15, health officials said.

For years, officials thought the Washington region might be immune to methamphetamine, which has ravaged West Coast and midwest communities for more than a decade. Some wondered if meth was just a localized problem.

But the number of seized meth labs in Maryland, Virginia and the District has increased from close to zero in 2000 to more than 80 last year. In Washington, health officials say 75 percent of patients in some clinics have abused the drug, a big increase from a few years ago.

"The jurisdictions in this area just have not picked up on the exigency regarding crystal meth," said Sgt. Brett A. Parson, commanding officer of the D.C. police gay and lesbian liaison unit.

Sounding the alarm that the meth crisis could become the next crack epidemic, some law enforcement and public health officials are pushing for a stronger response. The Drug Enforcement Administration trained more Maryland officers to dismantle meth labs last month than it did in all of 2005; a District-funded public service announcement was released last week to be aired in local clubs and on television stations.

Still, some experts said those nascent efforts are not enough to combat the spread of meth.

They call for training rank-and-file police officers to detect meth labs, the passage of legislation that would restrict the sale of ingredients used to produce the drug and prevention education in schools to teach children about its dangers.

"We really need to stop sitting around and just hoping that meth won't become the next crack cocaine," said Kevin Shipman, a manager with the District's Addiction Prevention and Recovery Administration. "We need to have a strong regional response before it's too late."

When meth, which, nationally, has been a largely rural epidemic, swept east across the nation, it hit the Shenandoah Valley hard, becoming one of the most-seized drugs in that part of the region. Labs have more recently popped up in semi-rural areas of Southern Maryland and Anne Arundel, where addicts are called "methnecks."

The labs require only simple equipment, such as bottles and tubing, which is easy to hide in almost any kind of building. The ingredients for the drug include medications containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, red phosphorous and hydrochloric acid.

The epicenter of meth use in the region is the District's gay community, where the drug showed up about five years ago and has been spreading quickly ever since, health officials said. Known as Tina in most gay circles, the drug has become the primary drug of choice, topping even alcohol among patients admitted to the Whitman-Walker Clinic, which primarily serves gay clients in the District.

"It's everywhere," Parson said. "I would defy you to find anybody in the metropolitan area who is white and gay and doesn't know one person who is using meth."

The drug is particularly troubling to medical workers in the gay community because meth is associated with risky sexual behavior. Some gay meth addicts use the Internet to find partners to use the drug and have sex -- known as party 'n' play -- encounters that sometimes turn into multiple-day sex parties.

Shipman said meth addicts are three times as likely to contract HIV as non-users because they tend to have unprotected sex and multiple partners.

Health experts say the addiction is particularly hard to treat. The National Institute on Drug Abuse says there is currently no "safe and tested" medication to treat meth addiction. Programs rely on counseling and behavioral modification.

Experts said one of the biggest problems in bringing attention to the meth problem in the area is the lack of reliable statistics on the number of users. Richard Rawson, a professor at UCLA who has been studying the drug for two decades, said public health indicators that should indicate the meth problem -- such as emergency room visits and patients in treatment -- lag five to seven years behind the emergence of the drug.

"In some places, the public health people are saying, 'Well, we're not seeing it; it's not that big a problem here,' " he said. "But that's not what the data means."

The best predictors of an emerging meth epidemic, Rawson said, are the presence of meth use in the gay community and the discovery of even small numbers of meth labs.

At the DEA's meth lab training facility in Quantico, officials have identified the growing problem in the Washington area and are admitting increasing numbers of local police officers. In a recent class for 41 state and local officers held last month, seven were from the Washington area, including Annapolis and Montgomery, Prince George's, Calvert and Fauquier counties.

"We know the growth in Maryland and Virginia is exponential," said John Michael Donnelly, chief of the training unit.

But some of the officers are concerned that most rank-and-file officers won't get this training, which is expensive and in high demand. In Prince George's alone, 10 officers are on the long waiting list.

"We've got to get more guys that are actually on the street certified in this," said a Calvert narcotics detective at the training in Quantico, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he works undercover. "I think a lot of guys are probably seeing meth but don't know what it is."

Sgt. Shawn A. Urbas, a spokesman for the Anne Arundel police, said it would be easy for officers to miss a disassembled meth lab -- which might be just a box of tubing and some beakers -- if they had never seen one before. He said that's why the department is focusing on training.

Health officials are also pushing for legislation that would restrict the sale of cold medications that contain pseudoephedrine, one of the ingredients used to manufacture meth. Virginia, like many states across the country, limits such sales, but Maryland and the District do not. Some drugstores are voluntarily restricting sales.

Some former addicts, though, said the best way to stop meth is to educate the public about its dangers. Garza said he was adamantly against drugs -- "I was totally Nancy Reagan about it" -- until a friend offered him meth and he began using it at gay clubs.

Soon he was hooked on the drug -- which causes users to stay up for days at a time -- and at one point partied for seven straight days without sleeping. "I had no idea that that first little bit would alter my life forever," he said.

But it did. After his arrest, Garza lost his job, was evicted from his home and declared bankruptcy. He was able to get treatment, though, and now works as a limo driver. His primary mission is to tell his story so that people realize the dangers of meth.

"Even though it's so obviously here, it's still very hidden. It's very hush-hush," Garza said. "But we're trying very hard to bust the secrecy off of it."

IMMIGRATION:

Rift On Immigration Widens For Conservatives And Cardinals (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

WASHINGTON

THE fierce battle over the future of America's immigration system is spilling from Capitol Hill onto the airwaves, as conservatives accuse Democrats, human rights groups and even some labor unions of trying to stymie Republican efforts to stem the tide of illegal immigration.

But in recent weeks, some commentators and prominent Republicans have turned their swords against another formidable foe in their battle to tighten the borders: the Roman Catholic Church.

Immigration has long caused friction between the church, with its advocacy for migrants, and conservatives, who want to slow illegal crossings over the Mexican border. But as Congress wrestles with the fate of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants, that tension has escalated into a sharp war of words, highlighting the divide among some Republicans and Catholics who have fought side by side on other issues like abortion and same-sex marriage.

In December, after the Republican-controlled House of Representatives passed a tough border security bill that, among other things, would make it a crime to assist illegal immigrants, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops assailed it as extremely punitive and called on its flock to oppose it. Church officials have sent lobbyists to Congress and this month parishes sent members to rallies in Chicago and Washington to push for legislation that would legalize undocumented immigrants and put them on the path to citizenship.

Some Republicans are firing back.

In February, Representative Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who opposes illegal immigration, took issue with Catholic bishops, among other religious leaders, "for invoking God when arguing for a blanket amnesty" for illegal immigrants. This month, two powerful Republican representatives, Peter King of New York and F. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, the co-sponsors of the border security bill, criticized the church leadership on "The O'Reilly Factor" on Fox News Channel, particularly Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles, who has said he would instruct his priests and parishioners to defy the legislation if it ever became law.

Meanwhile, cable news commentators Tucker Carlson and Lou Dobbs have questioned whether the church should maintain its tax-exempt status, given its political activism on immigration. And in an interview, Mr. King accused church leaders of "committing the sin of hypocrisy" in their campaign to sway Congress and Catholic voters.

"This is the left wing of the Catholic Church — these are the frustrated social workers," said Mr. King, who described himself as a practicing Catholic. "They're giving an incentive for more illegals to come here. I don't think it's right."

In fact, the Catholic leadership is united on this issue, and includes several bishops who strongly suggested in 2004 that Catholics should vote for President Bush because of his opposition to abortion. Both sides say they will continue to work together on those campaigns. But the pointed attacks by some Republicans are notable, given that the party has worked hard to woo Catholic voters in recent years. Some analysts warn that such criticism of the church and of immigrants may alienate a critical voting bloc of largely immigrant origins. But others point out that, unlike their clergy, most white, non-Hispanic Catholics remain deeply divided over immigration, and a battle seems to be emerging for their hearts and minds.

There are political implications. In preparation for the 2004 presidential election, the Bush administration cultivated church leaders, organized more than 50,000 volunteers and hired staff members to reach out to Catholic voters. The goal was to break the traditional allegiance to the Democratic Party, an affiliation that began to crumble with Ronald Reagan.

The campaign bore fruit: In 2004, a majority of Catholics voted for a Republican presidential candidate for the first time in 16 years.

But some analysts warn that Republicans need to tread carefully when they criticize the church and illegal immigrants. "The danger of this situation politically is that you'll have an entire season in which Republican politicians are saying critical things about the Catholic hierarchy," said Deal Hudson, the Republican architect of the effort to court Catholic voters in 2004. "That's not going to be helpful in terms of keeping the coalition together."

But the Rev. Richard John Neuhaus, editor of First Things, a conservative journal about religion and public life, said he doubted that the disagreement would have much impact on Catholics. He said the sexual abuse scandals had already weakened the credibility of the church leadership in the minds of some Catholics.

Republicans and the Catholic clergy have differed before on other issues — like the war in Iraq and the death penalty — without deeply affecting parishioners. And Mr. Neuhaus noted that while Catholics often connect deeply with their immigrant history, some make clear distinctions between their parents and grandparents and the more recent arrivals from Latin America.

"My hunch is that if you remove from the bracket the approximately one-third of the Catholic population that is Hispanic, that probably most other Catholics would divide on this questions pretty much as the general population does," Father Neuhaus said.

The Catholic leaders are keenly aware of the divisions among the faithful on this issue. Seventy of the 197 Catholic dioceses have formally committed to the immigration campaign, and officials are working hard to recruit the others.

Leo Anchondo, who directs the immigrant campaign on behalf of the Catholic Conference of Bishops, said the cardinals and bishops were not surprised there was a backlash against such efforts.

"Immigration has unfortunately become a very controversial topic," he said.

But Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington said he and other leaders decided they could not stay silent after witnessing the hardships endured by illegal immigrants, particularly as the wave from Latin America has surged. "This is a justice issue," he said. "We feel you have to take care of people."

Mr. Sensenbrenner, the Republican chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said Republicans had an obligation to clamp down on the border. To do otherwise, he said, would likely transform illegal immigrants into a permanent underclass in the United States.

That, he pointed out on "The O'Reilly Factor," was an undesirable option. "And I don't think it's Christian either," he said.

For Gates, A Visa Charge (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

When the Senate comes back to work next week, it is scheduled to take up the issue of immigration. And that is what brought Bill Gates to Washington for a rare visit last week.

The Microsoft billionaire does not love this capital, but he decided to add his personal voice to his Washington office's lobbying effort to expand the number of foreign-born computer scientists allowed to work in this country under a special program known as H-1B visas.

In an interview sandwiched between his meetings on Capitol Hill, Gates told me the "high-skills immigration issue is by far the number one thing" on the Washington agenda for Microsoft and for the electronics industry generally. "This is gigantic for us."

Since autumn 2003 Congress has limited the number of people admitted annually on H-1B visas to 65,000. To qualify for such a visa, an applicant must have at least a bachelor's degree, specialized knowledge and a job offer from a U.S. employer. The visa is generally good for six years, with the possibility of applying for extensions.

So great is the demand for such skills in the burgeoning high-tech world that in August 2005 the last of the visas available for fiscal 2006 were issued. That means a 14-month shutdown of the program, until October of this year. "It's kind of ironic," Gates told me, "to have somebody graduate from Stanford Computer Science Department and there's not enough H-1B visas, so they have to go back to India. . . . And I have people who have been hired who are just sitting on the border waiting."

The draft bill that Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter has been preparing for floor consideration would expand the annual H-1B limit from 65,000 to 115,000. By excluding dependents (who now are counted against the cap) from the total, it might mean the entry of as many as 300,000 people a year -- one-tenth of 1 percent of the U.S. population.

As Gates said, these are highly paid, highly qualified individuals. Salaries for these jobs at Microsoft start at about $100,000 a year. Their counterparts can be hired more cheaply in China or India, he said, but Microsoft does 85 percent of its research and development work in the United States because it wants its computer scientists interacting directly with its program managers and its marketing people on its own campus.

Gates said he has a hard time understanding the logic of those who decry the outsourcing of American jobs yet are reluctant to facilitate bringing the high-skill people who are catalysts for economic growth to this country. "People just shake their heads at what kind of a central planning system would say having 65,000 smart people come in, that's okay, but 70,000 smart people, no."

President Bush and his administration support the expansion of H-1B visas. And Gates, in turn, is enthusiastic about the White House and bipartisan congressional efforts to boost the teaching of math and science in American high schools with the long-term goal of expanding the supply of qualified Americans for these jobs.

He is backing that effort both with gifts of technology from the company and grants of $300 million a year from his foundation for innovation in high schools. "But the benefit of things like that has got a fair time lag," he said, "and the next four or five years, it really hangs in the balance: how many of these talented people we want to hire, and who want to come here, can we hire?"

The answer is by no means certain. Opposition to the H-1B program grew during the dot-com bust, when groups representing domestic electrical engineers and computer technicians argued that foreigners were taking away their jobs. In 2003 they succeeded in cutting the quota by two-thirds, from 195,000 to 65,000, and they continue to oppose its expansion.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports that unemployment among computer and mathematical operators is less than 3 percent. Gates said, "If you're graduating from a reasonable university in this country, with a degree in computer science, you have many job offers."

Still, there is reluctance -- especially in the House of Representatives -- to lift the ceiling on H-1B visas in an election year.

The House has responded to public pressure to close the borders to illegal immigration and seems incapable of distinguishing that problem from the value of encouraging high-skill workers to bring their talents to the United States.

That's why Bill Gates comes to Washington.

TAX:

Nonprofit Hospitals Face Scrutiny Over Practices (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 18 — Congressional leaders, concerned that many nonprofit hospitals are not providing enough charity care to justify their tax-exempt status, say they will set standards for the industry if it does not do so itself.

The chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, who had already been examining nonprofit groups like United Way and the American Red Cross, is broadening his focus to include nonprofit hospitals, with an eye to legislation that would clarify standards for their tax exemptions. Representative Bill Thomas, Republican of California, the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, began investigating the financial practices of nonprofit hospitals last year.

The commissioner of internal revenue, Mark W. Everson, said tax officials often found little difference between nonprofit and for-profit hospitals "in their operations, their attention to the benefit of the community or their levels of charity care."

Huge changes have reshaped the health care industry in recent years, Mr. Everson said, but the basic standard for granting tax exemptions to hospitals has changed little since 1969.

Since 1969, Mr. Thomas said, "less and less has been required for hospitals to maintain tax-exempt status."

Before 1969, the Internal Revenue Service required hospitals to provide charity care to qualify for tax-exempt status. Since then, the agency has not specifically required such care, as long as hospitals provide benefits to the community in other ways — for example, by offering health fairs, screening for cancer and cholesterol, providing emergency care, training doctors and conducting medical research.

Health insurance companies typically negotiate with hospitals to secure large discounts off hospitals' posted prices. Uninsured people, with no one to negotiate on their behalf, are often charged much more than the insured, and some hospitals have been aggressive in trying to collect payment from the uninsured.

In a letter to the American Hospital Association this week, Mr. Grassley said he had "serious concern" about their billing and debt collection practices. He also expressed concern about the high salaries of some hospital executives, their joint ventures with commercial profit-making organizations and their use of profit-making subsidiaries.

While Congress is taking the initiative, administration officials have expressed similar concerns. President Bush has strongly encouraged hospitals to disclose detailed information about their prices, and tax officials say they intend to do more audits of nonprofit hospitals.

In the last few years, low-income people around the country have filed dozens of lawsuits arguing that private nonprofit hospitals are required to provide free or reduced-price services to the uninsured. Judges have generally rejected these arguments.

In a typical ruling last year, Judge Loretta A. Preska of the Federal District Court in Manhattan wrote: "Plaintiffs here have lost their way. They need to consult a map or a compass or a Constitution because plaintiffs have come to the judicial branch for relief that may only be granted by the legislative branch."

Federal tax law does not give patients an enforceable right to affordable medical care, Judge Preska said.

Sister Carol Keehan, president of the Catholic Health Association of the United States, said that nonprofit hospitals, like for-profit institutions, tried to earn a surplus, but used more of it to "take care of unmet health needs in the community."

In the last few years, Sister Carol said, a small number of Catholic hospitals have been accused of overly aggressive collection practices. These practices, she said, "resulted more from inattention than from a deliberate decision to hound poor people."

State officials have shown a keen interest in the issue. The attorney general of Kansas, Phill Kline, said he had opened an investigation of the billing and collection practices of nonprofit hospitals after receiving complaints from consumers. Some nonprofit hospitals have hired debt collection agencies that "harass the poor," Mr. Kline said.

In Illinois, Attorney General Lisa Madigan recently proposed legislation that would require hospitals to provide a minimum amount of charity care, equivalent to 8 percent of hospital operating costs. The Illinois Hospital Association opposes the legislation, saying it would "threaten the survival of many hospitals" by imposing new financial burdens.

In Minnesota, the state attorney general, Mike Hatch, said that stronger government regulation was needed because self-regulation was not enough.

Some nonprofit hospitals and health systems in Minnesota have provided "lavish gifts" and "grossly excessive" compensation to top executives while providing "paltry levels" of charity care, Mr. Hatch said.

When members of Congress raise questions about executive pay, they sometimes point to the compensation paid by teaching hospitals in New York. Tax-exempt organizations generally have to file annual returns with the Internal Revenue Service.

These forms, which are open to public inspection, show that the president of NewYork-Presbyterian Hospital, Dr. Herbert Pardes, received more than $4.3 million in compensation in 2004, plus $1.2 million in contributions to his employee benefit plan. About half of his pay was a reward for performance in prior years, the hospital said.

Dr. Spencer Foreman, president of Montefiore Medical Center in the Bronx, received $1.1 million in compensation and $712,000 in benefits.

In an interview, Dr. Foreman said, "Congressional interest in this area is quite appropriate, and we as an industry have to come forward with a comprehensive response." But in defining the proper level of charity care, he said, it is "totally unrealistic" to apply the same mathematical formula to nonprofit hospitals in destitute urban neighborhoods and affluent suburbs.

"If a hospital provides a benefit proportional to the community's needs and the institution's resources, it meets the community benefit test," Dr. Foreman said.

Turning A Kid Into A 'Child' (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Here's a tax question: When is your child not your child?

And here's a tax answer: When he's the child of his sibling.

To speakers of the English language, this sounds like gibberish. But to speakers of the arcane language of tax, it sounds like opportunity.

So if you're a well-to-do family about to file your 2005 federal income tax, it might be worth your while to wait until you read this. It may take expert help, and not everyone will benefit, but Congress appears to have laid a nice Easter egg for some of you.

A new provision of the tax law, which was meant to make the law simpler and fairer, is turning out to have done neither. The provision involves the definition of "child" in claiming various tax breaks, and it allows some alert taxpayers to claim benefits never intended for them.

It also deprives others of benefits they have gotten in the past.

A few years back, there was a hubbub around the "discovery" that federal tax law contained five different definitions of "child." This quickly became the, um, poster child for the absurd complexity that besets taxpayers as they try to figure out what they have to pay.

So in 2004, Congress, eager to look helpful, wrote into the law a single definition, to be used by taxpayers in claiming all the various tax benefits that go with having a child. That definition became applicable on 2005 returns.

The consequences have been turning up in recent months as taxpayers and accountants apply the new rules. Many of the quirks have been reported here, in the Wall Street Journal and other publications in recent weeks. But now John Buckley, chief tax counsel for the Democrats on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, has put together a list and analysis of the winners and losers generated by the 2004 law, which he says "promises to be a large and embarrassing fiasco."

Buckley's paper is to be published in this week's issue of Tax Notes, an Arlington-based journal for lawyers and others interested in tax matters. The paper is accessible at the publication's Web site, http://www.taxnotes.org/ .

Among the more startling of Buckley's listings:

Children of well-to-do families may be able to use their siblings to claim the earned-income tax credit, which is meant for low-income working families. They may also be able to claim the $1,000 child credit, meant for middle-income parents. Or, they may more easily than in the past claim one of the tax credits aimed at moderate-income college students and their families.

In fact, such children may be able to claim benefits at no cost to their parents, who are ineligible because their income is too high or because they are subject to the alternative minimum tax, which among other things disallows personal exemptions.

To benefit, families need to have kids the right age, and at least one of the kids needs to owe tax, so across the country the impact is likely to be modest. But in high-income areas such as Washington, potential beneficiaries are likely to be more numerous.

The new rules consolidate the five definitions of child into one creature called a "qualifying child." Instead of being simply a "child" -- a concept most of us can grasp -- and getting more than half of his or her support from the taxpayer, a qualifying child, as Buckley notes, "covers a far broader range of relationships."

A qualifying child can be not only a son or daughter, he or she can be a grandchild, brother or sister, niece or nephew, foster child, stepchild or adopted child.

The qualifying child must have the same principal place of abode as the taxpayer for more than half the year. The rules indicate that temporary absences, such as for school or military service, don't count, Buckley says, adding that intent to return (or not to, if that is more advantageous) is all that is needed.

The qualifying child must also be younger than 19, or 24 if a full-time student, and must not have provided more than half of his or her own support. Note that it used to be the other way around: The taxpayer had to provide more than half the child's support. Thus, while a qualifying child can't be supporting himself, there is no longer a requirement that the taxpayer who claims him be supporting him.

Under this definition, someone can be the qualifying child of more than one taxpayer, and, while there are rules for breaking ties, the rules also allow the taxpayers to decide among themselves who gets the child-related benefits.

Now, with that in mind, consider this scenario: A well-to-do couple has a 22-year-old daughter who just finished college and has gone to work but is living at home. They also have a 16-year-old son in high school. The parents earn $200,000 a year and thus are well over the limits from the earned-income tax credit and the child credit and the Lifetime Learning credit, and are being hit by the alternative minimum tax, which means that their personal exemptions are also wiped out.

So the daughter claims her brother as her qualifying child. She can take a personal exemption for him, and if her income is within the limits (no more than $31,030 of adjusted gross income and including no more than $2,700 in investment income) she can claim the earned-income tax credit. That credit is "refundable," meaning that if it exceeds her tax liability, any remaining credit is refunded to her in cash.

And when her brother goes off to college in a couple of years, she might consider paying some of his tuition and claiming the Hope education credit.

Alternatively, if the sister is still in college and is self-supporting, she cannot be the qualifying child of her parents. But under the temporary absence rule she is regarded as still residing with her parents, so she can use her brother to claim the EITC as long as she meets the income requirements.

If none of that works -- for example, if the daughter is still a full-time student and not self-supporting, or has too much investment income for the EITC -- she could still qualify for the $1,000 child credit, assuming her brother was younger that 17 at the end of 2005. That credit phases out beginning at an income of $110,000 a year, so her parents couldn't use it.

Families with two children and parents over that limit should take a hard look at this one if one of their kids has enough income to owe taxes and the other is young enough to qualify.

In fact, "for reasons that are unfathomable," Buckley says, the law allows younger children, even infants, to use older siblings to claim the child credit, as long as the older sibling is younger than 17.

The Bush administration, in its budget proposals for next year, is asking Congress to amend the law to specify that a taxpayer cannot be the qualifying child of a younger individual. It is also asking that the law require that if a parent lived with his or her child more than half the year, only the parent could claim the child as a qualifying child, though in some cases the parent would be able to waive the tax benefit to another family member with higher income.

These fixes would save the government $2.6 billion over 10 years, the Treasury Department figures.

But, as Buckley points out, the consequences of the new definition of a qualifying child are not all windfalls for taxpayers.

The new rules have knocked many single taxpayers whose adult children live with them out of head-of-household filing status, a benefit they had been able to claim in the past.

The rules also mean that a sibling who really is caring for another sibling is disqualified from the EITC if the care-provider is younger than 19 (or 24 if a full-time student).

There also can be problems in claiming personal exemptions for some taxpayers and in qualifying for the higher education benefits.

Buckley also cautions parents that employer-sponsored medical insurance is tax-free only to employees, spouses and their dependents, so treating a child as independent could, at least theoretically, trigger higher taxable income to the parents.

Given all this, Buckley says, the logical course for Congress would be to repeal the new rules and start over.

Hurricane Katrina notwithstanding , only about half of homeowners living in some of the most flood-prone areas of the country buy federal flood insurance, a Rand Corp. study found. And most of the homeowners who do buy it do so only because it is required by mortgage lenders or others. Just 20 percent of homeowners in the most flood-prone areas buy the coverage when it isn't required, the study found.

Electronic filing of tax returns continues to rise, the Internal Revenue Service said last week. Of the 60.7 million returns filed so far this year, 71.5 percent were e-filed, compared with 69.7 percent for the same period last year. While this percentage is expected to decline as the April deadline approaches, the IRS still figures more than half of all returns will be e-filed this year. The average refund so far this year is $2,423, up $99 from last year.

A Revealing Plan (WP)

WHAT WOULD IT take to get the federal budget in balance -- honest, no-gimmick, no-fooling balance -- without raising taxes? This is a question the Bush administration would prefer not to discuss, and for good reason: It would require cuts so deep and wide as to be unimaginable as a matter of politics and unwise as a matter of policy.

How can we be sure? Well, the Republican Study Committee, a group of conservative House members, has produced an alternative budget that treads where Bush will not. And it is a helpful document, not in the sense of being realistic but for exposing the airiness of administration claims of fiscal prudence. Balance could be achieved by 2011, it shows, but only if Americans are willing to sacrifice a good chunk of their health care, education, energy, transportation and foreign aid -- in fact, pretty much all of the federal budget outside defense and veterans.

What would go? Extra unemployment benefits and training to workers who lose their jobs as a result of foreign competition, heating assistance for low-income families, family planning funds, subsidized loans for graduate students and, after 2009, funding for the federal highway program. Also, Amtrak, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, the National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Agency for International Development and President Bush's Millennium Challenge Account. Substantially reduced would be funding for low-income schools, United Nations peacekeeping forces, the National Institutes of Health and block grants to states to pay for preventive health care for mothers and children. Head Start would be frozen at 2005 levels.

Average enrollment growth in Medicaid, which provides health care to poor people, was more than 7 percent annually between 2000 and 2004, and medical inflation itself is about 5 percent. Yet this budget would limit the growth in federal spending on Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP), which provides health care to uninsured children just above the poverty line, to 4 percent per year. The result? More poor people, and more poor children in particular, would go without care.

Some of the proposed cuts, such as eliminating farm subsidies or killing NASA's moon/Mars exploration program, are sensible. But they also are highly unlikely; just think how much trouble Congress had recently agreeing to a mere $40 billion in entitlement cuts.

Altogether, the alternative budget would cut almost $700 billion over five years -- $332 billion in non-defense discretionary spending and $358 billion in entitlements -- while allowing for $299 billion in new spending on defense and veterans and $630 billion in tax cuts (extending the previous Bush tax cuts plus adjusting the alternative minimum tax). And, for discretionary spending, these cuts are from 2006 levels -- they don't even take into account how inflation over the next five years (projected to be a cumulative 11.4 percent) would further strain federal dollars.

Outside of defense, the amount spent on discretionary programs would be nearly a third less in 2011 than current spending, adjusted for inflation; it would amount to the smallest share of the economy (2.2 percent in 2011) at any time since 1962, when that number was first measured. And even that understates the magnitude of cuts required; the budget doesn't make room for war funding after the next fiscal year.

These budget cuts would be shortsighted and mean-spirited; they would transform the role of the federal government. We find much of this unthinkable, and we believe most Americans would, too. That's why Mr. Bush doesn't talk about the real-life consequences of his tax cuts, and the real-life people who will suffer from them after he leaves office. So we thank the Republican Study Committee for producing this document. If this is what you want government to look like, go ahead and support the extension of the president's tax cuts and oppose any tax increases.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's Agenda Loses Focus (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

The White House staff has failed to formulate a clear domestic policy, some in the GOP say, and the administration is suffering because of it.

WASHINGTON — A growing Republican chorus is calling for a staff overhaul inside President Bush's beleaguered White House, but some conservatives say such a change would stop far short of fixing what they view as a serious flaw: an unfocused domestic agenda.

The war in Iraq is dominating the attention of Bush and his top aides, these critics say, while the recent departure of the president's top domestic policy advisor after just one year has left the White House without an obvious conductor to direct the sometimes disparate policy-making machine.

"You mean they have a domestic policy?" quipped Michael Tanner, director of health and welfare studies at the libertarian Cato Institute.

Tanner, an author of the failed Social Security plan that was Bush's No. 1 domestic priority last year, lamented the lack of a "policy czar" setting clear goals. He described the administration as "exhausted" and "rudderless" on the domestic front.

"There doesn't seem to be an endpoint for what they're doing," he said. "They need to decide what they're going to do for the next three years.... Staff changes are necessary but not sufficient. If they're just rearranging chairs and office plaques, that's not going to do anything."

Although Bush first campaigned on a largely domestic agenda, experts either said he had achieved much of what he had set out to accomplish or said he had put aside priorities at home to devote time, energy and government resources to the war on terrorism.

His once-sweeping ideas of giving every young worker a private retirement account as part of Social Security and completely rewriting the tax code have been sharply scaled back. On healthcare, with prices rising and tens of millions of uninsured, Bush's major ideas are creating tax-advantaged health savings accounts and computerizing medical records, hardly the broad overhaul sought by many advocates.

Michael Petrilli, who left the Department of Education in 2005 after four years working on school choice issues, said the administration never settled on an education agenda after Bush's No Child Left Behind Act passed in his first term.

One idea buried in Bush's proposed budget would spend $100 million on a national school voucher program. The proposal might appeal to conservatives still angry over some big-spending elements of the No Child Left Behind plan, but experts said it stood little chance of winning support this year in Congress.

Moreover, the proposed American Competitiveness Initiative laid out in Bush's State of the Union address, aimed at boosting math and science education, has not yet gained traction.

"There doesn't seem to be much of an education agenda right now coming out of this administration," said Petrilli, who is now vice president of the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, which advocates for school choice programs.

"It's hard to tell what the agenda's going to be for the next couple of years."

The competitiveness initiative was perhaps the most far-reaching new domestic idea in the State of the Union speech, encouraging innovation by putting renewed emphasis on teaching math and science. But, critics say, the push has come from a few lawmakers — not from the White House.

"Somebody really needs to steer it if it's going to happen, but the sense at this moment is that nobody's really steering it," said one GOP lobbyist who works closely with the administration on education issues but spoke on condition of anonymity out of fear of retribution from the White House.

Such frustration among domestic policy advocates underscores the range of problems facing Bush. Sixteen months after reelection, his second term has so far been dominated by a drumbeat of controversy and crises involving a range of issues, including ongoing violence in Iraq, the administration's domestic wiretapping program and an Arab firm's bid to manage operations at several U.S. ports.

Bush is facing the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, in the low to mid-30s.

In one independent survey, conducted by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, a plurality of respondents used the word "incompetent" when asked to describe Bush. In previous polls, the most common word had been "honest."

The ports controversy exposed festering tensions between the White House and once-pliant GOP lawmakers, who rebelled against Bush's push for the Arab firm to manage port operations. Many of those lawmakers are feeling increasingly free to express frustration about the administration's tendency to keep Congress in the dark on important issues.

Many conservatives have openly criticized key Bush initiatives in recent weeks, including a Medicare prescription drug program launched this year has proved complicated, costly and confusing to many seniors.

Last week, several longtime White House allies in the Senate joined with moderate Republicans and Democrats to support allowing the government to lengthen the sign-up period for the drug benefit and to negotiate cut-rate prices with drug companies.

Both votes bucked the White House, signaling concern among Republican lawmakers that the program and other Bush initiatives could spell trouble for the GOP in this year's midterm elections.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) set off fireworks when he said last week that he had "concerns about the team that's around the president." He told the Associated Press: "All of a sudden we're hearing the phrase 'tin ear.' That's a phrase you shouldn't hear. The fact that you're hearing it says that the kind of political sensitivity, the ear to the ground that you need in the White House, isn't there at the level that it needs to be."

Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. has held his job since Jan. 20, 2001. He rises before the sun, arriving at the West Wing ahead of the president. He even sweats with him: Card's weekend routine often includes riding mountain bikes with Bush at a Secret Service training facility or nearby wildlife sanctuary.

No other chief of staff has shown Card's stamina for the job except Sherman Adams, who served President Eisenhower for five years and eight months and established the modern model for the post. On Sept. 22, 2006, Card is to break Adams' record.

Card "is on call all the time," said a Republican senator with close ties to the White House, who spoke on condition of anonymity in order to speak freely about others in his own party. "I don't know how he's done it as long as he has. Is he fatigued? I'd have to say yes."

He added: "The collective group of people who came in have been there a long time, and it's inevitable you become insular…. You don't talk to normal people. You don't go to a Little League game.

"What I would love is some new faces to come in at senior levels," the senator said. "Some fresh thinking would be helpful."

One recent staff change was not planned: the abrupt resignation in February of Claude A. Allen, who for the last year had been Bush's chief domestic policy advisor.

Allen's resignation was a mystery to his colleagues until Maryland authorities charged him two weeks ago with theft of at least $5,000 in goods from Target and other stores in the Washington area. Before then, Allen had begun taking on a more public role, sitting in the first lady's box during this year's State of the Union address and, days before his resignation, briefing reporters on the president's budget plan.

Another lingering distraction in the West Wing is the ongoing investigation into who leaked the identify of CIA operative Valerie Plame to the media. A grand jury continues to investigate Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, Bush's closest political advisor and the architect of linking GOP political goals to domestic policy. The inquiry has resulted in the resignation of Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who was charged with misleading federal investigators.

Strategists close to the Bush White House say Rove is unlikely to leave unless he is forced to by an indictment.

Likewise, Bush, known for his emphasis on loyalty, would be unlikely to ask either Rove or Card to leave.

"I can see them working to make a change," said one GOP consultant with close ties to the White House, who spoke on condition of anonymity due to the sensitivity of discussing internal staff deliberations. "But either Karl or Andy has to stay. The trouble is, we don't know what Karl's future is."

Some White House officials and allies wave off the concerns.

Anti-tax activist Grover Norquist said he sees no evidence that Rove is distracted or tired. "Karl's on top of stuff," Norquist said. "You get your e-mail responses right back."

Moreover, some administration advocates say that work is proceeding quietly on some domestic initiatives.

Officials on the White House's National Economic Council, for instance, convened a meeting last week of conservative think-tank scholars to discuss strategies for expanding the use of health savings accounts, the tax-advantaged savings plans that eligible consumers can use to pay for medical expenses. Advocates view HSAs as a freemarket approach to healthcare, though critics charge that they benefit the wealthiest and least-sick Americans without helping the uninsured.

The White House meeting lasted an hour and a half. "Everyone in the room was energized," said John Goodman, president of the nonpartisan National Center for Policy Analysis.

Jennifer Marshall, director of domestic policy studies at the conservative Heritage Foundation, pointed to the $100-million school voucher idea as evidence that the White House was laying some groundwork for future initiatives. The plan, which would create a pilot voucher program in several cities for schools deemed to be failing, would most likely be adopted as part of a new education package next year, she said.

The idea, found in the president's budget proposal, has received little public notice.

"Everyone knows there's very little oxygen in the legislative room this year," she said. "So there's a second tier of what needs to be put out there as a marker, and education is probably happening on that lower tier, which doesn't require headline attention and presidential stumping."

Burnout On The Bush Team? (HC)

By JULIE MASON

HC – WH Burnout, March 19, 2006

Washington talk has members of president's inner circle resigning

WASHINGTON - An emerging question around the White House is whether staff exhaustion and isolation are causing political missteps such as the scuttled deal to have a Dubai company oversee U.S. port operations.

Much of President Bush's inner circle has been with him since 2001 and even longer, because he imported to Washington many Texans from his gubernatorial staff and 2000 presidential campaign.

Top adviser Karl Rove, presidential lawyer Harriet Miers, press secretary Scott McClellan, communications counselor Dan Bartlett, budget-minder Clay Johnson and others at the White House came from Texas. Others, such as chief of staff Andrew Card and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, have been around since the early days of Bush's presidency.

Bush puts a premium on loyalty. But there is generally more turnover in a two-term administration, including at the Cabinet level.

It's a burnout job. Just look at Bush — he has aged considerably since he first came to the White House. For staffers, the hours are long, expectations are high and time away from family is extensive.

And it can't be much fun now, with Bush experiencing the lowest public approval ratings of his presidency and a restive Congress behaving as if it lost the rubber stamp it used to keep on hand for him.

It's a long way from the 89 percent, do-no-wrong approval ratings Bush had right after Sept. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0018934

Rumors of high-profile departures wax and wane. Is Card leaving? What about McClellan? Similarly, prognostications of imminent staff shake-ups are on the rise.

McClellan did little to stanch the speculation with an enigmatic nondenial last week.

"This is part of the inside Washington babble that goes on in this town," the spokesman said. "It's part of the parlor game. We are focused on the priorities that the American people care most about and getting things done."

Seniors denied break, despite law's history

When Congress passed the Medicare prescription drug bill in 2003, Republican leaders held open the House vote for an extraordinary three hours while leaders twisted arms to get members to go along with the president. It finally passed by one vote.

Bush on Wednesday visited a retirement home in Maryland where he was asked about possibly extending past May 15 the deadline to sign up for the complex program.

But the president, proving again that sometimes it's the one legislative vote that matters, refused to bless an extension of a deadline for a program created thanks to the extension of a deadline on the House floor.

"No, and the reason why is there's got to be a fixed time for people to sign up," the president said.

When a media op goes to the dogs

Bush's visit to the retirement home was unusual in a number of ways. Among other things, it took the president deep into blue-state territory and placed him before an audience of seniors who were not as warm and friendly as most of the groups to whom he speaks.

A woman asked about implanting Americans with microchips containing medical records. She said her dog had one. Bush didn't seem to know what to make of it. He said he didn't know if his dogs had such chips. "Barney might not like it," he said.

Major Changes Raise Concerns On Pension Bill (NYT)

By Mary Williams Walsh

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

With a strong directive from the Bush administration, Congress set out more than a year ago to fashion legislation that would protect America's private pension system, tightening the rules to make sure companies set aside enough money to make good on their promises to employees.

Then the political horse-trading began, with lawmakers, companies and lobbyists, representing everything from big Wall Street firms to tiny rural electric cooperatives, weighing in on the particulars of the Bush administration's blueprint.

In the end, lawmakers modified many of the proposed rules, allowing companies more time to cover pension shortfalls, to make more forgiving estimates about how much they will owe workers in the future, and even sometimes to assume that their workers will die younger than the rest of the population.

On top of those changes, companies also persuaded lawmakers to add dozens of specific measures, including a multibillion-dollar escape clause for the nation's airlines and a special exemption for the makers of Smithfield Farms hams.

As a result, the bill now being completed in a House-Senate conference committee, rather than strengthening the pension system, would actually weaken it, according to a little-noticed analysis by the government's pension agency. The agency's report projects that the House and Senate bills would lower corporate contributions to the already underfinanced pension system by $140 billion to $160 billion in the next three years.

That shortfall raises the specter of more pension plans failing, pushing their liabilities on to the government, according to the agency and critics of the bills. And some companies with fully financed pensions feel unfairly penalized by having to pay higher pension premiums to make up for others' shortfalls.

"It takes a better economist than me to understand how reducing contributions by that much is going to protect benefits and put the system on a sounder footing," said Jeremy I. Bulow, an economist at Stanford University.

Both pieces of legislation — one passed by the House and the other by the Senate, both by overwhelming majorities — do contain measures that would reduce some of the lapses and inaccuracies that the current pension law permits. They would also increase the premiums that companies pay to the federal guarantor, the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, an agency grappling with a $23 billion deficit.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, says the bills attempt to strike the proper balance between providing for workers' pensions and allowing companies to remain competitive.

"My goal is to make sure that companies set aside enough money for the pensions they promise their workers," Mr. Grassley said. "At the same time, we can't put burdens on plan sponsors that are too heavy."

The overhaul of the pension system is being undertaken at a time when it is reeling from a series of big bankruptcies, like those of United Airlines and Bethlehem Steel, which sent billions of dollars' worth of obligations to the pension agency.

The agency's pension insurance is limited, and a growing number of these companies' employees have discovered to their dismay that their benefits exceed the limits and that they will simply lose part of the money they had been promised.

The House-Senate conference committee intends to reconcile the bills before April 15, when the next round of corporate pension contributions are due. But the White House already warned in November that President Bush might veto any bill that extended too much special pension relief to individual companies and industries.

Legislators argue that, while they want the pension agency to be strong, they also want to encourage companies to continue offering pensions. Lately, some companies, like I.B.M. and Verizon, have moved to freeze their pension plans, arguing that the costs of their plans make it hard to compete.

Kevin Smith, the spokesman for Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio and the new House majority leader, who was one of the driving forces behind pension changes, defended the House bill, arguing that many specific measures, particularly those phasing in the new rules slowly, were necessary.

"Both the House and Senate pension bills represent the most comprehensive pension reforms in a generation," Mr. Smith said, "so a responsible transition period for employers to meet the new, stricter rules is appropriate."

He added that he believed the pension agency's analysis did not take into account the weakened financial condition of many companies that offer pensions.

The law that Congress wants to amend was enacted in 1974 after a series of scandals in the auto industry in which employees of dying companies like Studebaker and Packard discovered that little or nothing had been set aside for their pensions. It gave rise to rules for the financing of pensions and to an insurance program roughly comparable to the federal insurance program for bank deposits.

The law did help safeguard pension benefits, but it has not been strong enough to stop some companies from falling short in their contributions.

When Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao sent Congress a blueprint for amending the pension law in January 2005, many companies thought her proposals were too tough.

From the start of the legislative process, lobbyists representing a wide swath of American business, including those from the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Benefits Council and the Erisa Industry Committee (which represents large companies with pension plans), argued for easing the burden on companies by allowing them more latitude in estimating how long their workers would live, for example, and what they would need to set aside for future payouts.

The biggest single-industry pension break in the bill passed by the Senate is for the airlines, to allow them to keep their unstable pension plans going.

Among other things, the airlines would be given 20 years to close the shortfalls in their pension funds — nearly three times as long as other companies. They would also be allowed to factor in highly optimistic assumptions about their investment returns when calculating how much they needed to contribute to their pension funds each year.

The measures were written into the bill at the request of Northwest Airlines, which is in bankruptcy proceedings and is trying to keep its pensions alive, though in sharply reduced form. Northwest sought a 14-year breather on its pension contributions.

But then Senator Johnny Isakson, Republican of Georgia, said that 14 years of relief would not be enough to help Delta, a big airline based in his state, which is also operating under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protections. Senator Isakson amended the bill to provide 20 years of relief. After complaints from other big airlines, the relief was expanded to them all.

The Senate bill would also help recover more than $1 billion of benefits that thousands of pilots for Braniff, PanAm, Eastern, United and other airlines have lost in bankruptcy cases going back as far as the 1980's. That amendment was made by Senator Daniel H. Akaka, Democrat of Hawaii.

But helping those pilots would be expensive: the pension agency projected that the entire provision would increase its total obligations to retirees by more than $1 billion.

Someone must pay for this. Currently, the pension agency finances itself in part through the insurance premiums that companies are required to pay into the system. Raising the premiums to support pilots or help other victims of corporate bankruptcies, some companies in other industries are starting to say, would be unfair.

In a letter to shareholders last week, Edward S. Lampert, chairman of Sears Holdings, which is responsible for the pension plans of employees at Kmart and Sears, complained that his company's pension insurance premiums were going up by 60 percent, "not in order to address any risk associated with Sears, but rather to make up for the difficulties of other companies."

Mr. Lampert also deplored the current pension law, which bars companies with richly financed pension plans from taking any of the surplus money out, except in rare instances.

Prudential Financial has the same complaint, but instead of writing to its shareholders, it took direct action in Washington, hiring William F. Sweetnam Jr., until recently the Treasury Department's senior legal adviser on employee benefits, to lobby on the issue of surplus pension assets. Mr. Sweetnam is now a principal at the Groom Law Group, a Washington law firm that specializes in employee benefits issues.

Prudential has a $1.2 billion surplus in its pension fund. Mr. Sweetnam was able to persuade several senators, including Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey (where Prudential has its headquarters), that the companies that are more than 15 percent overfinanced should be allowed to remove some of the surplus and use the money to buy health insurance for retirees.

Currently, only companies that are 25 percent overfinanced are allowed to do so.

Robert DeFillippo, a Prudential spokesman, said that the provision would improve pension security because in exchange for the ability to take more money out of the pension fund, the company would be required to handle the money remaining in the fund much more carefully.

Smithfield Farms also got help in the name of strengthening the system. It bought another meat company out of bankruptcy in 2003, taking over its pension fund at the same time. That kept the bankrupt firm's pension plan alive, Smithfield said, and saved the government from having to take it over. In light of that, the company contends that it would hardly be fair to impose tougher new financing rules on Smithfield.

That argument caught the ear of Senator Mike DeWine, Republican of Ohio, where Smithfield has major operations. Mr. DeWine added a provision that would let Smithfield follow the old pension rules until 2014, no matter what Congress does in the meantime.

The bills would also be a boon to Wall Street by permitting financial service companies to handle more retirement money with fewer restrictions. Hedge funds, for example, would be permitted to manage more pension money without being held to the pension law's exacting standards of fiduciary duty.

Mr. Boehner has championed easing the restrictions on investment advice for several years. He included a provision that would permit investment firms to advise participants in 401(k) retirement plans, even if the firms' own mutual funds were among the employees' investment choices. Current pension law forbids this practice, on the thinking that it could taint investment recommendations.

Mr. Boehner has argued that employees need more investment advice, however, so that they can save more and earn better returns on their money. The securities industry is his top campaign contributor, providing more than $125,000 already in the 2005-06 House election cycle.

Mr. Smith, the spokesman for Mr. Boehner, said that the House bill would provide better quality financial advice for workers, adding that the Bush administration strongly supported that amendment.

"The Senate advice provision does little more than restate current law," he said, "which has left workers to fend for themselves without the type of quality advice they so desperately need."

Curse Of The Young Old (WP)

By William Saletan

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Why Should We Pay Them?

The bad news is, we're living longer.

Don't get me wrong. I hope you have a long and happy life. I just hope your kids don't end up paying one-fifth to one-third of their incomes to subsidize your retirement and mine. Because that's what awaits them: more and more boomers living to age 65 and beyond, perfectly healthy but collecting checks for decades. To head this off, we need a radical change in Social Security. I'm not talking about privatization. I'm talking about rethinking, and possibly abolishing, the whole idea of payments based on age.

The problem is grimly detailed in "65+ in the United States," a recent report by the U.S. Census Bureau. Five years from now, the boomers will start hitting age 65. By 2030, we'll have more than twice as many old people as we did three years ago. As a percentage of the population, this increase is enormous. In 1935, when Social Security was established, about 6 percent of Americans were 65 or older. Since then, the percentage has doubled. By 2030, it will have tripled. Not only are more people reaching 65; they're living well beyond it. In 1900, an American who made it to 65 could expect fewer than 12 additional years. By 1960, he could expect more than 14 years. By 1980, remaining life expectancy at 65 reached 16 years. By 2000, it was 18 years.

If you thought last week's budget fights over Iraq and Katrina were bad, wait till you see the bloodbath over retirement benefits. Hurricanes come and go. Iraq can be abandoned. But the debt to retirees increases every decade, and their clout grows, perversely, in proportion to the burden they impose. In 1945, for every Social Security beneficiary, we had 42 workers paying in. By 2002, we had just 3.3 workers per beneficiary. By 2030, we'll have only 2.2 workers per beneficiary. To keep the system afloat for the next seven decades, its trustees say the Social Security tax rate will have to reach 19 percent. And if life expectancy keeps rising over that period, academics project a tax rate of 27 to 32 percent.

Now for the good news. We're not just living longer; we're staying healthy longer. From 1982 to 1999, the percentage of senior citizens who had chronic disabilities dropped from 26 percent to less than 20. Active-life expectancy at age 65--the average number of additional years a person could expect to live free of chronic functional impairment--rose from fewer than 12 years to nearly 14. That's a five-year gain from what a 65-year-old could expect in 1935, according to Kenneth Manton, a leading scholar of old age. The experience of being 65 to 74 has changed so radically that the Census Bureau now calls this group the "young old."

So all these young old folks are working longer, right? Wrong. In 1950, more than 45 percent of men 65 or older were still in the labor force. By 2003, that percentage had plunged below 20. Five years ago, a study showed that men and women were retiring five and six years earlier, respectively, than their predecessors did 45 years earlier. Why? Because they could. Pensions helped, but the bigger factor was Social Security. By 2001, the program was supporting 91 percent of people age 65 or older. It provided nearly 40 percent of their income--equal to what they got from earnings and assets. A study quoted in the Census report documents the effect on work. When Social Security payments went up, men 65 and older quit the labor force at an accelerating pace. When payments were reined in, the trend reversed.

The point of Social Security was to subsidize those who couldn't work, not those who could. The program's founding document said it would support old people who were "dependent," "beyond the productive period" and "without means of self-support." In 1935, that described people around age 65. Today, it more accurately describes people a decade older. The intuitive remedy is to raise the retirement age well beyond the measly increases currently scheduled. Last year, Manton calculated that if you were designing a system in 1999 for people who could expect as many active years as a 65-year-old could expect in 1935, you'd set the retirement age at 70. And by 2015, you'd raise it to 73.

There are four obvious problems with this proposal. The first is that if we ask the young old to keep working, somebody's going to have to hire or retain them. This won't be easy. We all know that age discrimination is rampant in our economy. But we've shown before that this problem can be dealt with; look at the success of the 1967 Age Discrimination in Employment Act in helping raise the employment rate among older workers.

The second objection is that some jobs are too strenuous for a 65-year-old. But American jobs have become far less strenuous since 1935. One study shows that the percentage of Americans working in physically demanding jobs--defined as jobs

"requiring frequent lifting or carrying of objects weighing more than 25 pounds"--declined from more than 20 percent in 1950 to less than 8 percent in 1996.

The third objection is that people don't age at the same rate. While true, it's not an argument for a low benefits-eligibility age. It's an argument for ending the link between age and benefits. Social Security actually consists of three programs. One pays benefits based on age; another pays if you lose your spouse; a third pays if you become disabled. As of 2002, 70 percent of the money paid out was based on age; only 15 percent was based on disability. That's insane. Inequality of aging means that age is a bad proxy for disability, which is a good proxy for need. If you turn 65 on the same day as your neighbor, but she's disabled and you aren't, we should pay her, not you.

Abolishing age as a standard of fitness would be fairer than simply raising the eligibility age. We've already taken steps in this direction. In 1986, Congress removed the upper age limit on people protected by the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. If you're healthy enough to do the job, age doesn't matter.

The final objection to both proposals is that Social Security is a trust fund; you made your deposits, and you're entitled to your withdrawals. But if you think the reason you'll live longer than your grandparents is that you're a better person, think again. Programs such as the ones Congress debated last week--Medicare, public sanitation, biomedical research--bought you longer life and better health. Maybe, instead of asking what your country owes you at 65, you should ask what you owe your country.

Standardized Tests Don't Always Make The Grade (LAT)

By Stuart Silverstein

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Recent snafus in SAT scoring have brought attention to the inherent fallibility of such exams.

High school seniors and their parents, along with college counselors and admissions officers, have been roiled by recent disclosures that at least 4,600 SAT exams taken in October were graded incorrectly.

But education testing experts point out that similar mistakes have happened before — and inevitably will happen again.

"Tests are a fallible product," said Kathleen Rhoades, a research associate with the Center for the Study of Testing, Evaluation and Educational Policy at Boston College. "The way we treat tests in this country, it's as if the tests deliver these strong, solid, positive, irrefutable results. And that is not the case."

By Rhoades' count, there were 137 publicly disclosed cases of large-scale testing errors by educational testing companies from 1976 through early 2004, with most of them occurring since 1997.

"People are under the false illusion that because the tests are graded by a machine that the process is objective," said Robert Schaeffer, a spokesman for the National Center for Fair and Open Testing, or FairTest. "But everything, including programming the machine and doing quality control on it, is, in fact, done by human beings. And all humans make mistakes."

Rhoades and Schaeffer say a lack of regulation, cost pressures and tight deadlines aggravate the problems.

The consequences of grading mistakes and other mishaps have intensified over the last decade with the increasing reliance on so-called high-stakes testing. In recent years, President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act has triggered expanded testing by many states.

At the college level, standardized tests play an important role in deciding who is admitted, who wins scholarships and who gets into honors programs.

In K-12 education, they help make such determinations as school rankings, teacher licensing and pay, and whether students graduate high school.

The SAT and other tests are usually graded accurately, but when problems occur, "it gets people crazy because it's high stakes and it makes important decisions," said Eva L. Baker, co-director of the National Center for Research on Evaluation, Standards and Student Testing at UCLA.

The potential for problems was driven home last week with the disclosure that the Educational Testing Service, one of the nation's biggest testing organizations, had agreed to pay $11.1 million to settle a class-action lawsuit.

The case was brought on behalf of plaintiffs who received incorrect scores on teacher-licensing tests known as the Praxis exams.

In all, 4,100 test takers were wrongly told they failed.

The tests are used in many states but not in California.

California has suffered other testing problems, however. They include a foul-up in which a company now known as Harcourt Assessment Inc. miscalculated the results of 19,000 students and 22 schools on a Stanford 9 achievement test given six years ago.

The SAT grading problem, which came to light this month, involves incorrect scoring on at least 4,600 college entrance exams, less than 1% of the total. About 400 students received lower grades than they deserved.

The College Board, the owner of the exam, later disclosed that there were an additional 1,600 SAT exams from October and that some of those tests may have been incorrectly graded. Those exams had been flagged for scrutiny due to concerns about possible cheating, among other reasons.

Many admissions experts said the effect on this year's high school seniors would be muted. Although some test scores were off by nearly 400 points — out of a possible 2400 — 83% of the errors were in the range of 10 to 40 points.

College Board officials have repeatedly expressed regret over the problem, which sent many colleges scrambling in the final days of the college admissions season to reevaluate applications from affected students.

But the officials said that with a test taken by 2.3 million students a year, including 495,000 in October, it was difficult to eliminate all errors.

"It is a very high-volume operation, and you are dealing with millions of tests a year, and you're dealing with many questions on each test," said Laurence Bunin, the College Board's senior vice president for operations. "In any high-volume operation like this, there's statistically the chance for some rare error."

In this case, the problems were blamed on the scanning of the multiple-choice portions of the test performed by a College Board contractor, Pearson Educational Measurement, one of the nation's biggest educational testing and assessment businesses.

Pearson officials said the problems stemmed mainly from humid weather that caused answer sheets to expand.

Also, some answers were penciled in too lightly or too incompletely to be read by scanners, they said.

Some testing experts said they were perplexed by that explanation and by the fact that two students, not Pearson, discovered the problems.

Craig Hoyle, a research consultant at Boston College's education school, said there were ways to prevent problems, such as using equipment to screen out humidity-tainted answer sheets. In addition, he said, "dummy" quality-check tests can be interspersed with the tests to detect scanning problems.

Pearson spokesman David Hakensen said his company had used quality-check tests, but not until the exams arrived at its processing center in Texas.

He said they were not mixed with exams at test sites — where they might pick up the same humidity that affected the actual tests — because any stray marks made on the quality-check tests would undermine their effectiveness.

Critics attribute scoring problems partly to cost-cutting by testing companies.

Pearson officials dispute that point.

The company has experienced problems in Minnesota, where in 2002 a judge found that a company Pearson acquired "continually short-staffed" a testing program, and in other states.

But experts point out that no technology, be it an airline or a testing system, is foolproof.

"Funny stuff happens," said Robert Boruch, a professor of education and statistics at the University of Pennsylvania. "The main objective is to reduce the likelihood of it happening. You can't reduce it to zero."

Bush's Fee On Futures Trades Probably Won't Pass, Boehner Says (BLOOM)

By Darrell Hassler

Bloomberg, March 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0018940

March 18 (Bloomberg) -- A new fee on futures contracts proposed by President George W. Bush is unlikely to be passed by U.S. legislators, given that it hasn't passed in multiple previous attempts, said John Boehner, the U.S. House Republican majority leader.

``If it hasn't happened in 13 consecutive tries, that probably means it won't happen again," Boehner, an Ohio Republican, said in response to questions at a Futures Industry Association conference in Boca Raton, Florida.

Bush's proposed $2.77 trillion budget for the fiscal year that begins in October includes an unspecified fee on futures contracts to fund the government agency regulating that market. The fee would cover the $127 million budget for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission that regulates the $2.5 trillion-a-day U.S. futures industry, according to the budget Bush sent to Congress in February.

Futures contracts are agreements to make a transaction at a preset date and price. At the expiration date, a product such as corn or sugar may be delivered at the price or the buyers and sellers settle the difference in cash between the market price and futures price.

Industry Opposition

Similar attempts by Bush in 2002 and former President Bill Clinton failed. The Chicago Board of Trade and the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, the two biggest U.S. futures exchanges, oppose the fee because the higher cost of trading may drive traders to exchanges outside the U.S.

Chicago Merc Chairman Terrence Duffy said in an interview on March 15 that he has visited legislators in Washington D.C. four times to argue against the fee. The fee likely would be about 14 cents per contact for each trade, he said. The Merc, which charges about 67 cents a contract, is assuming that legislators will consider the fee when voting on the budget, even though it's failed so many times previously, Duffy said.

``We are telling people in Washington how serious this is to our industry," Duffy said. ``This is an issue that we feel very passionate about and we have to make people understand how markets work."

The Washington-based CFTC is the only federal financial regulator that doesn't receive funding from the companies it oversees, Bush's budget document says.

Congress created the CFTC in 1974 as an independent agency to protect futures users from fraud related to the sale of commodity and financial futures. The agency's five commissioners are appointed by the U.S. president.

Separately, Boehner said he's ``hopeful" that the U.S. Senate will complete its version of the reauthorization of the CFTC within two months in order to begin negotiations between the Senate and House on the final bill.

The House approved a version in December that included a new requirement that the CFTC more closely monitor fraud in natural gas trading, an item that traders oppose because of the extra reports to the government it will require.

In the Senate there are five or six senators who want a similar requirement in the Senate version, Boehner said. That has stalled the Senate proposal, he said.

Congress reauthorizes the CFTC every five years.

Public Comments By Justices Veer Toward The Political (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

Speeches by Supreme Court justices are usually sleepy civics lessons studded with references to the Federalist Papers and the majesty of the law. That seems to be changing.

This month, former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor told an audience at Georgetown University that a judiciary afraid to stand up to elected officials can lead to dictatorship. Last month, speaking in South Africa, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said that the courts were a safeguard "against oppressive government and stirred-up majorities."

Justice Ginsburg also revealed that she and Justice O'Connor, who retired in January, had been the targets of an Internet death threat over their practice of citing the decisions of foreign courts in their rulings.

The justices' speeches were mostly a reaction, students of the court said, to attacks on judicial independence in Congress. "The volume is being turned up on both sides," said David J. Garrow, the legal historian, "both in the attacks on the court and in the justices' response."

The recent speeches, said Kermit L. Hall, the editor of "The Oxford Companion to the United States Supreme Court," may be breaking ground in judicial decorum.

"What's going on," Mr. Hall said, "is that Ginsburg and O'Connor are using their position — and it is striking that both are women — to state a position in favor of the judiciary that comes real, real close to taking a political position."

The O'Connor and Ginsburg speeches, variations on basic speeches they had given often before, were sharper and more topical than what many expect from Supreme Court justices. Justice O'Connor's Georgetown speech was apparently neither recorded nor transcribed, but Nina Totenberg, the legal affairs correspondent for National Public Radio, reported on it the next day.

In the speech, Justice O'Connor seemed to address comments made by two Texas Republicans, Representative Tom DeLay and Senator John Cornyn, concerning Terry Schiavo, a brain-damaged woman whose feeding tube was removed by court order.

Ms. Schiavo was the subject of a confrontation between Congress and the courts last year. Congress lost.

Senator Cornyn said afterward that political rulings from judges had fueled public frustration. "It builds up and builds up and builds up to the point where some people engage in violence," he said. "Certainly without any justification, but a concern that I have."

Justice O'Connor said that interference with an independent judiciary had allowed dictatorship to flourish in developing and Communist countries, Ms. Totenberg reported. "It takes a lot of degeneration before a country falls into dictatorship," Justice O'Connor said, according to Ms. Totenberg, "but we should avoid these ends by avoiding these beginnings."

Justice Ginsburg's speech, posted on the Supreme Court's Web site, focused on the citation of foreign law. She said that no one on the court contended that foreign decisions were binding precedents, only that they could illuminate common problems. Judges consult and cite all sorts of materials in making decisions, and she said she was perplexed that one category of potentially valuable information should be out of bounds.

She also discussed what she called "dynamic versus static, frozen-in-time constitutional interpretation," suggesting a preference for the former.

Mr. Hall, who is also the president of the State University of New York at Albany, said Justice Ginsburg's statements were "really quite remarkable in the history of the court."

"She is pressing for a view of the Constitution that is quite cosmopolitan, and she is using an out-of-country venue to make her point," Mr. Hall said.

Justice Ginsburg's comments may have been a response to Justice Antonin Scalia, who, in opinions and speeches, has rejected the view that the Constitution is a living document.

"You would have to be an idiot to believe that," Justice Scalia said in a speech in Puerto Rico last month, The Associated Press reported. "The Constitution is not a living organism. It is a legal document. It says some things and doesn't say others."

The dueling speeches, Mr. Hall said, represented "two Supreme Court justices arguing with each other off the bench."

Justice Ginsburg seemed to blame stalled Congressional measures that would have prohibited the citation of foreign law for the Internet death threat.

"Although I doubt the current measures will garner sufficient votes to pass, it is disquieting that they have attracted sizable support," she said. "And one not-so-small concern — they fuel the irrational fringe."

The threat, passed to the justices by a court security officer, was a February 2005 posting on an Internet chat site addressing unnamed "commandos."

"Here is your first patriotic assignment," the message said. "Supreme Court Justices Ginsburg and O'Connor have publicly stated that they use foreign laws and rulings to decide how to rule on American cases. This is a huge threat to our Republic and constitutional freedom. If you are what you say you are, and NOT armchair patriots, then those two justices will not live another week."

DOJ_NMG_0018942

Mr. Garrow said the threat was all the stranger because the stakes were trivial. "The odd thing is," he said, "that Justices Ginsburg and O'Connor are being attacked for their footnoting practices."

The death threat went nowhere, Justice Ginsburg said last month. Justice O'Connor, who will turn 76 this month, "remains alive and well," Justice Ginsburg, 73, said.

"As for me," she added, "you can judge for yourself."

Lobbyists Foresee Business As Usual (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Post-Abramoff Rules Expected to Be Merely a Nuisance

Some of Washington's top lobbyists say that they expect to find ways around congressional efforts to impose new restrictions on lobbyists' dealings with lawmakers in the wake of the Jack Abramoff corruption scandal, and that any limits will barely put a dent in the billions of dollars spent to influence legislation.

Though Congress may ultimately vote to eliminate a few of the more visible trappings of special pleading, such as gifts, free meals and luxurious trips, lobbyists say they have already found scores of new ways to buy the attention of lawmakers through fundraising, charitable activities and industry-sponsored seminars. An estimated $10 billion is spent annually to influence legislation and regulations, and that spending is not likely to be diminished by the proposed lobbying changes, these lobbyists contend.

"I wouldn't classify those changes as major," said Dan Danner, executive vice president of the National Federation of Independent Business. "Between charitable events and fundraising events, there will still be lots of ways to get in front of members [of Congress]."

Abramoff's guilty plea in January -- to charges of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials with lavish trips, luxury skybox fundraisers, meals and campaign contributions -- triggered a new push in Congress to rewrite the rules governing lobbying.

An emerging Senate bill, which has yet to be completed, would bar lawmakers from accepting meals and gifts such as sports tickets from registered lobbyists. The leading House measure, which has been proposed by GOP leaders, would rely more heavily on additional disclosures but would also impose a temporary ban on privately paid travel.

But many lobbyists said they consider these bills more of a nuisance than an impediment to their ability to work their will.

"Even if all lunches and sporting tickets are banned, legislation and regulations are so complex that the need for professional lobbyists will not diminish," said Frederick H. Graefe, a Washington lawyer and lobbyist.

"If meals are heavily restricted, we're likely to see executives from the home office picking up checks because they're not lobbyists," added J. Steven Hart of Williams & Jensen, a major lobbying firm. "And there are lots of other ways we can still get our cases before members of Congress."

Besides, experts said, industries and interest groups have turned to more sophisticated tactics in recent years, and such tactics are generally not addressed in the new bills on Capitol Hill. Lobbyists are increasing their campaign contributions, widening their use of the Internet to stir voter activism, and donating large sums to think tanks and charities affiliated with such big names as Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

The Business Roundtable, which represents big-business chieftains, has embraced a new technique of advertising on Web sites for grass-roots advocates. And organizations from the left and the right are increasingly offering meetings with top government officials in exchange for hefty dues.

Americans for Tax Reform, which is headed by conservative strategist Grover G. Norquist, invites contributors who give more than $15,000 a year to receptions and dinners, often at Norquist's home. Featured speakers have included Republicans such as Sens. George Allen (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.) and Bill Frist (Tenn.), the majority leader.

Third Way, a group that devises policies for moderate Democrats, invites its $25,000-a-year donors (many of whom are lobbyists) to regular discussions around Washington that have spotlighted Democratic Sens. Thomas R. Carper (Del.), Evan Bayh (Ind.), Blanche Lincoln (Ark.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.).

The most important framework for lobbying clout -- campaign finance laws -- would not be altered in the Senate approach, while House GOP leaders have proposed putting limits on the contributions made to big-money independent groups known as 527s. But without Senate support, the effort to clamp down on the independent groups will fail.

As a result, lobbyists would still be able to contribute to lawmakers' coffers, host and organize major fundraising events, and arrange trips subsidized by their clients to encourage electoral giving -- just as they do now. Total federal giving in this election cycle is expected to rise by at least 20 percent, to more than $3 billion, compared with the 2002 midterm-election cycle, according to Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute.

Such campaign-related activities are "the most significant benefits lobbyists use to influence members of Congress," said Larry Noble, executive director of the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics.

The proposed ethics changes would not restrain the fastest growing part of lobbying: grass-roots activities. This ginning up of letters, telephone calls and, increasingly, e-mails from back home has become a $1 billion-a-year business, said Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), an activist for lobbying law changes.

Congress might require that such lobbying costs be disclosed but is not likely to limit them. In fact, lobbying in its many forms would continue unabated under the coming legislation.

In 2004, the most recent full year about which data are available, lobbying was a $10 billion industry, according to estimates by James A. Thurber, a political science scholar at American University. Of the total, $2.1 billion was used to pay the salaries of registered lobbyists, while the rest was spent on more subtle forms of persuasion.

Lobbying is done even at charity events. Lobbyists say privately that they are all but required to contribute to an annual dinner that helps low-income Roman Catholic schools in the District. The dinner is co-hosted each September by Boehner and Kennedy. Boehner has solicited contributions for the $10,000 tables, a request that lobbyists say they are loath to ignore.

"Some lobbyists might consider this a lobbying opportunity," said Michael L. Smith, the dinner's director. "But we see it as a very worthy charitable event."

The communications industry has its own lobbying-and-charity gala. Every December, the Federal Communications Bar Association fills the Washington Hilton's grand ballroom for a fancy dinner that raises money for D.C. schoolchildren and honors the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, which regulates the interests of the dinner's patrons.

At the 2004 Chairman's Dinner, FCC commissioners dined at an elaborately set table while then-Chairman Michael K. Powell gave a lengthy speech and showed a video about himself.

Interest groups also pay to participate in social activities, which double as lobbying venues. State societies, for example, offer lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists numerous opportunities for informal encounters.

The California State Society's fall 2005 newsletter featured a photograph of Rep. Ed Royce (R-Calif.) and former congressman Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), who is a lobbyist for an electric utility and a defense contractor. Both are active members.

According to its Web site, the society's Platinum ($10,000) corporate sponsors in 2005 included Fleishman-Hillard, a lobbying and public relations company, and Sallie Mae, a Virginia-based provider of student loans that lobbies in Washington.

Lawmakers and their staffers have lately reduced their social interactions, especially meals, with lobbyists in anticipation of a possible crackdown under a new law.

But interests will always find a way to be heard, lobbyists say. One is through think tanks. The Competitive Enterprise Institute, which widely publicizes its belief that the earth is not warming cataclysmically because of the burning of coal and oil, says Exxon Mobil Corp. is a "major donor" largely as a result of its effort to push that position.

"I think what attracted them to us was our position on global warming," said Sam Kazman, CEI's general counsel. "And we hope to get support from other industries that agree with us."

Use of Campaign Treasuries Is Coming Under Scrutiny

Rep. Spencer Bachus hasn't drawn a serious opponent in the past three elections. So far, his only 2006 challenger is a write-in with $49 in the bank.

But the Alabama Republican burns through significant sums of campaign cash, as do plenty of other House members sitting in safe congressional seats. Among the items billed in 2005 to Bachus's campaign account and his "Growth and Prosperity" political action committee: $6,689 for U2 concert tickets and expenses as part of a campaign event; $1,298 in lodging in Vail, Colo.; and $270 for the catering of an "American Idol" party.

Rep. Corrine Brown (D-Fla.) spent $15,835 of campaign funds on condolence flowers for constituents, Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) used $8,328 of his campaign war chest to buy gifts for his staff, and Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) was reimbursed for a $1 "meal" at a local gas station, which his staff believes was bottled water.

Some lawmakers say that such expenditures are routine and completely legal under Federal Election Commission rules. But these spending practices are beginning to attract attention from watchdog groups and the news media, as the 2006 congressional campaigns heat up and Congress considers measures to crack down on the perks of office.

A Washington Post review of more than 200 House campaign finance reports filed with the FEC for the past year found that lawmakers from safe districts demonstrated widely differing spending practices. The reports were compiled by PoliticalMoneyLine, an independent, nonpartisan campaign finance Web site.

According to those records, Rep. Mark Edward Souder, a six-term Indiana Republican who was reelected in 2004 with 69 percent of the vote, spent $45,027 in campaign operating funds last year. Most of the money went to cover phone charges, rent, payroll and catering for campaign events.

In contrast, Pence, whose congressional district adjoins Souder's to the south, spent $348,255 in 2005, plus $25,472 from his PAC, after winning a third term in 2004 with 67 percent support.

Pence sought reimbursement for 293 meals in 2005, for a total of $9,806. Most were at fast-food or family-style restaurants, including Wendy's, Arby's, Ruby Tuesday, and various pancake houses and pizza parlors, as well as convenience stores and airport concessions based in Anderson, Ind. Ninety-four of the charges totaled $10 or less. He also paid $4,082 for a 1998 Oldsmobile minivan that he drove throughout his east-central Indiana district.

"When Mike Pence campaigns, he campaigns as if he's in a tight race," said William A. Smith, Pence's chief of staff. He said that his boss prefers one-on-one meetings to big groups, which explains the numerous small charges, and that items are often billed to the campaign, as opposed to the official account, to avoid potential ethics questions. "If he's doing political work, that's going to be part of his campaign budget," Smith said.

Bachus spent $415,000 from his 2005 campaign and political action committee funds on meals, travel, entertainment and other election-related operations. He said he has no choice but to keep up the spending even without a serious challenger.

"Since the campaign registration season remains open in Alabama, I have no assurance at all I won't have serious competition again this year," he said in a statement. "It is only prudent I be prepared."

The government reimburses members for some nonpolitical expenses, such as traveling to and from their districts and attending official events, but the rules are fairly strict. In contrast, the FEC gives lawmakers broad discretion with campaign funds. As Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor who heads Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, an independent watchdog group, describes it, "as much as you can raise, you can spend."

For example, FEC rules state that campaign funds may be used "in connection with the campaign for federal office" but also "in connection with duties of the individual as a holder of federal office." Some items are specifically banned: home mortgages, clothing, personal automobile expenses, country club and health club memberships, vacations, household food, nonpolitical admissions to concerts and sporting events, and tuition.

Otherwise, candidates have a fair amount of leeway in how they spend the money they raise. "I think it's more personal than political," said Stanley Brand, a Democratic ethics lawyer. "Some people are more liberal about money." Some throw lavish fundraisers, Brand noted. "Some are looking for ways to underwrite their existence, and some aren't."

The National Republican Senatorial Committee has launched a Web site, http://www.fancyford.com , chronicling the Davidoff cigar gifts and exclusive hotel stays of Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), who is running to succeed retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). The Bergen Record recently tallied up $80,000 in Morton's steakhouse bills that Sen. Robert

Menendez (D-N.J.) amassed over five years as a House member. Menendez was recently appointed to fill an open Senate seat and is battling for a full six-year term against GOP candidate Thomas H. Kean Jr.

Rep. Ralph M. Hall (R-Tex.), elected to a 13th term in 2004 with 68 percent support, submitted more than 100 meal receipts, many of which were for low-dollar charges from Sonic, IHOP, Chili's and Applebee's outlets. He was more generous with gifts for donors, billing his campaign for $13,235 in Godiva chocolates. "He has it in his head that people love Godiva chocolate," said Hall chief of staff Janet Perry Poppleton, who added that he used to give away hams.

Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy (D-R.I.), elected in 2004 to a sixth term with 64 percent, filed more than $500,000 in campaign and PAC operating expenses for 2005. He racked up the highest number of Starbucks charges for one year, submitting 24 receipts ranging from $2 to $12. Every purchase was made at the same Main Road Starbucks in Middletown, R.I., near the congressman's home. Kennedy spokeswoman Robin Costello said the location was a "convenient place for his campaign staff to meet."

Rep. John P. Murtha, a 17-term veteran from a solidly Democratic Pennsylvania district, reported $620,066 in campaign operating expenses. Nearly 250 items were related to driving, including $6,800 for gas, car washes and travel-related petty cash charges, and $6,500 to lease a 2003 Buick. Murtha spokeswoman Cynthia Abram said her boss is "very active in local politics" and attends fundraisers and other events for local candidates around his central Pennsylvania district throughout the year.

Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska), who was elected to a 17th term in 2004 with 72 percent support, filed one of the longest 2005 campaign expenditure reports, billing about $650,000 in total expenses to his campaign account and Midnight Sun PAC. Young listed $405 in snow-plowing charges, $300 to sponsor Miss Alaska, $345 for fishing licenses and $45 for a ladder. Myrna Maynard, office manager in Young's Anchorage office, said the ladder was needed because the ceiling lights are too high.

The $15,835 in flowers purchased by Brown, a seven-term incumbent who was uncontested in 2004, accounted for more than 10 percent of the total $123,243 Brown spent in 2005 on her campaign. Elias Ronnie Simmons, Brown's chief of staff, said her boss sends floral arrangements costing $60 to $80 apiece to the funerals of constituents. "You never think it's going to escalate like that," Simmons said.

"If you get in the habit of raising a lot of money, even if you don't have real races, the question is 'What are you going to do with it?' " said Fred Wertheimer, a longtime critic of political fundraising and spending and founder of Democracy 21, a nonpartisan group seeking campaign finance reform. "The fact is, there's just far more money in politics than anyone actually needs."

Losing Ground (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, March 19, 2006

A NEWSWEEK poll shows President Bush's approval rating dropping to new lows on domestic issues and rising public anger over Iraq and homeland security.

A bitterly divided electorate gives President George W. Bush an approval rating of only 36 percent in the latest NEWSWEEK poll, matching the low point in his presidency recorded last November. His image as an effective leader in the war on terror is tarnished, with less than half the public (44 percent) approving of the way he's handling terrorism and homeland security. Despite a series of presidential speeches meant to bolster support for the war in Iraq, as well as the announcement of a major military offensive when the poll was getting under way, only 29 percent of the people questioned approved Bush's handling of the situation in Iraq. Fully 65 percent disapprove.

The way the president has dealt with issues at home hasn't brought him much support either. His approval ratings for the handling of energy policy (28 percent) and health care (28 percent) were new lows, while approval on the economy (36 percent) mirrored his overall rating. The single area where President Bush accrued more approval than disapproval was in his appointments to the Supreme Court, which 47 percent approved.

The outright anger against Bush felt by many Americans was reflected in responses to questions about the effort of Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin to censure Bush in Congress for his warrantless wiretapping program. Feingold has found very little support for his move on the Hill. Four in 10 (42 percent) of the adults in the general public say they would support Congressional censure of the president, while half (50 percent) say they would not. Censure wins majority support from Democrats (60 percent) and one in five Republicans (20 percent) say they'd support it. Yet if Democrats in Congress do decide to push for such a measure, they may run into trouble with that same public. By a margin of 53 percent to 33 percent, Americans feel the censure proposal was made as a partisan ploy, not for reasons of principle.

In today's strongly polarized political climate, roughly one in four American adults (26 percent) say they think Congress should actually impeach President Bush and consider removing him from office. There is in fact no effort to do this on the Hill, and the public mood appears to be more a reflection of the passionate sentiment against Bush in some quarters rather than considered support for actual legislative action. (Some recent national polls show about 45 percent of adults strongly disapprove of the president's performance.) The NEWSWEEK poll shows that only 5 percent of Republicans would support impeaching Bush, while 94 percent would not. Among Democrats, almost half (49 percent) support impeachment, while 48 percent oppose it. Overall, 69 percent do not think Congress should consider removing him from office.

By comparison, the level of public support for impeachment today is below the 32 percent support for Bill Clinton's removal in October 1998, before he was impeached by the U.S. House of Representatives. Support for the impeachment of Richard M. Nixon had reached 52 percent in a June 1974 Harris poll shortly before he left office.

A much less radical response to sagging confidence in President Bush—a major staff shake-up in the White House—gets a mixed response from the public. While 40 percent think it is time for the president to clean house and ask some top people to leave, 48 percent think it is best to avoid making major changes to the White House staff at this time. Only 20 percent of Republicans favor a major staff shake-up, compared with 43 percent of Independents and 56 percent of Democrats. Unhappiness with President Bush's cabinet and staff apparently is not as great as dissatisfaction with the president himself.

All of this bodes ill for the Republicans as midterm congressional elections approach this fall, although some Democratic strategists are concerned that the censure resolution and impeachment talk may actually make for an unwanted distraction. Registered voters continue to prefer Democratic candidates for Congress over GOP candidates by a margin of 50 percent to 39 percent.

This is the third of four NEWSWEEK polls taken since September 2005 showing the Democrats with a double-digit lead. The Democrats never had such an advantage in any NEWSWEEK poll conducted before the last two off-year Congressional elections, 2002 and 1998. The Democrats now lead in Congressional vote preferences of Independents by 47 percent to 31 percent. Key to the election outcome is whether the Democrats' big advantage with independent voters will be maintained and how many of these voters will actually turn out in November.

Both houses of Congress are now controlled by the Republicans, but public opinion now favors a Democratic takeover this November by a margin of 50 percent to 34 percent. Among Independents, the Democrats are preferred by more than a two-to-one margin: 51 percent to 22 percent.

Low as Bush's approval ratings are at the moment, three of the last six U.S. presidents actually had ratings below Bush's current score at some point in their presidencies. His father, George H.W. Bush, saw his rating decline to 29 percent in August 1992, amid growing economic woes. Jimmy Carter slipped to 28 percent in July 1979 and Richard Nixon plunged to 23 percent in January 1974, the year he resigned his office as a result of the Watergate scandal.

Survey Methodology

This poll was carried out by Princeton Survey Research Associates International. Results are based on telephone interviews with 1,020 adults, 18 and older, conducted March 16-17, 2005. Results are weighted so that the sample demographics match Census Current Population Survey parameters for gender, age, education, race, region, and population density. The overall margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3 percentage points for results based on total adults and plus or minus 4 for results based on 800 registered voters. Results based on smaller subgroups are subject to larger margins of sampling error. In addition to sampling error, the practical difficulties of conducting surveys can also introduce error or bias to poll results.

Bush's Approval Rating Stuck At 36%, Newsweek Poll Shows (BLOOM)

By Susan Decker

Bloomberg, March 19, 2006

March 18 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush's approval rating stands at 36 percent as voters expressed anger over the continued war in Iraq, according to a poll released today by Newsweek magazine.

The overall approval rating matches his standing in November, a record low for his presidency, and compares with 40 percent at the end of September, 2005, the magazine reported. Less than half, 44 percent of those polled, approved of how he's handling homeland security and terrorism issues compared with 57 percent a year ago.

The president's misfortune has translated into good news for Democrats, with 50 percent of registered voters polled saying they will back Democratic candidates, compared with 39 percent for Republicans. It's the third of four polls taken since September that show Democrats with a double-digit lead over Republicans. The question, Newsweek said, is whether the Democrats can maintain their strong lead among independent voters.

The poll showed that recent presidential speeches supporting the war in Iraq haven't improved the public's perception of the conflict. Two thirds of those polled, 65 percent, disapprove of how Bush is handling the war, and just 29 percent approve, the poll showed. As in other polls, Bush, a Republican, fared better among those of his own party than with Democrats.

Domestic Issues

On the domestic front, 58 percent disapproved of Bush's handling of energy issues and 62 percent disapprove of how he's dealt with health-care issues, with only 28 percent approving in each area, a new low in both cases. The poll showed 36 percent approved of his handling of the economy.

A bright spot for Bush is the Supreme Court. His choices of John Roberts and Samuel Alito met with approval from 47 percent of those polled. It was the only area where more people approved than disapproved, Newsweek said.

Wisconsin Senator's Russell Feingold's call for censure of the president was met with approval by 42 percent of those who were polled, while 50 percent disapproved of the Democrat's censure request. Those polled thought the censure call was based more on politics than principle, by a margin of 53 percent to 33 percent.

Just 26 percent would support taking the step of impeaching Bush, with 94 percent of Republicans opposing the idea and Democrats split, with 49 percent in favor and 48 percent opposed. Still, 69 percent overall oppose having him removed from office.

The poll, conducted by Princeton Survey Research Associates International, was based on telephone interviews with 1,020 adults conducted on March 16 and 17. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points for results based on total adults and plus or minus 4 for results based on 800 registered voters.

Dangerous Incompetence, Part II (BOS)

By Nina J. Easton

The Boston Globe, March 19, 2006

Republicans got a much-needed laugh last week when Senator Debbie Stabenow -- a Michigan Democrat whose seat the GOP is determined to nab this year -- launched an attack on the White House from the Senate floor. The snickers came when Stabenow's recounting of President Bush's failings was overshadowed by an unfortunate visual: She was wearing a red suit that matched a sign to her left reading DANGEROUSLY INCOMPETENT, suggesting that she, rather than the president, might have deserved the label.

A GOP aide quipped that Stabenow should wear that sign like a sandwich board. And Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, strolled into the Senate press gallery with a sign of his own held over his head: COMPETENCE.

Republicans don't seem to have much else to laugh about this election year.

The Democrats' sudden discipline at staying on message is beginning to score points in pubic opinion polls. The Pew Research Center's Andrew Kohut has reported that "incompetent" has replaced "honest" as the most frequent descriptor applied to Bush.

While the Democrats have used "incompetence" with increasing regularity since the administration's flat-footed response to Hurricane Katrina, the phrase "dangerous incompetence" is a recent invention of Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and his staff.

The one-time amateur boxer was eager to give the incompetence label "an edge," said a Reid aide, Jim Manley, and "dangerous" was the winning adverb, adding a flourish to the Democrats' new line of attack.

A couple of weeks ago, Reid strategists began inserting the words into talking points for press secretaries to the Senate's 44 Democrats. And during Reid's weekly Saturday afternoon huddle with Democratic senators scheduled to appear on the Sunday morning talk shows, he encouraged them to use the label to describe the White House.

"It's on the cutting edge of what's going on," Manley insisted.

A Kennedy campaigns in Boston

A Kennedy, candidate for US Senate, is planning a fund-raiser in Boston.

No, not that Kennedy. This is US Representative Mark Kennedy, Republican of Minnesota, who is on a mission to dilute the Kennedy name in the upper chamber.

The Minnesota Kennedy is drawing money and attention from Republicans nationally, including in Massachusetts, because his race is considered the GOP's best shot to pick up a US Senate seat. Kennedy is running to replace Mark Dayton, a Democrat who is retiring.

"We have almost nothing in common," Kennedy says of his relationship to Senator Edward M. Kennedy, "except that my grandmother was Rose Kennedy." Another Rose Kennedy, that is.

But the Minnesotan does share floor space on the US House, and a cordial relationship, with Rhode Island Representative Patrick J. Kennedy, Senator Kennedy's son. "Patrick and I are both third children of the youngest of four sons of Rose Kennedy," he says.

On a family visit to the US Capitol, when his son was mistakenly handed a tag identifying him as Patrick Kennedy's son, the house's other Kennedy said his boy should have kept it: "Patrick's in better shape to pay for your college."

For Kerry, Imus gets his Irish up

During the 2004 presidential campaign, MSNBC radio and TV personality Don Imus was a vocal supporter of John F. Kerry, sharing stories of the Massachusetts senator's visits to the Imus ranch. But after Kerry's loss, some of the bloom has come off that political rose.

On St. Patrick's Day, Imus -- broadcasting from Boston -- invited Kerry on his show for some respectful discourse on issues of the day.

But minutes after the senator left the air, the irascible Imus ridiculed Kerry. "If I was his adviser," Imus proclaimed, "I'd tell him he's just got to loosen up. . . . Man, talk English!"

Bid to reverse a Romney role model

As he tests the presidential waters, Governor Mitt Romney is eagerly courting the conservative wing of the Republican Party. So it was curious that in a C-SPAN interview airing tonight, he dwelled on Dwight D. Eisenhower -- a moderate-- as one of his favorite presidents.

"I looked at what he did in the White House and the character and integrity he brought to the White House and said, that's a man I respect," Romney told C-SPAN's Brian Lamb. "I grew up when he was president. He's my first memory of president, 1952 election. I remember that, you know, 'I like Ike' slogan."

And, Romney continued, Eisenhower "was a person you did like and you respected as an individual. Now he did some important things as well. The whole idea of building an interstate highway system and investing in infrastructure turned out to be enormously powerful. . . . Staring down the Russians. . . . But it's his contribution as a man, as a father, as a husband, as a person of integrity that I most respect."

Romney strategists eyeing a Republican presidential primary fight might coach the governor to use every opportunity he can find to wax eloquent over a different Republican president: Ronald Reagan. To the conservatives who dominate GOP primaries, Eisenhower is considered, in hard-right parlance, a "squish."

'I Hope That I've Made A Difference' (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 19, 2006

U.S. Rep. Martin Sabo bids tearful farewell to public office. He leaves with a pledge to continue his causes and a lament over political polarization.

Rochelle Olson, Star Tribune U.S. Rep. Martin Sabo, the stoic, gentle giant of Minnesota politics, broke into tears Saturday as he announced plans to retire after 46 years in elective office, the last 28 in Congress.

"I've decided it's time to move on," Sabo said. "In my gut, I know the time is right. It's time to open the door for a new generation of leadership."

Sabo, 68, said he will continue to work for peace, responsible budget policies, civil rights and civil liberties.

"I want to see more of the grandchildren," he said in Minneapolis. The baseball fan plans to attend more Twins games, play more golf and travel the country. "Some fall, I'd love to drive up to New England and see the leaves," he said.

When asked, Sabo cited no particular reason for the timing of his decision, only seven weeks before the May 7 DFL endorsing convention for the Fifth District congressional seat. He said his health and energy levels are good. Sabo quit smoking cold turkey two years ago after 45 years of a two-pack-a-day habit.

His action leaves prospective candidates little time to organize for the DFL convention. The endorsee is expected to become the prohibitive favorite in the race in the strongly DFL district, which includes Minneapolis and a number of inner-ring suburbs.

Many potential candidates remained noncommittal Saturday while Sabo gave a farewell speech filled with gratitude and a touch of criticism. He left most of the praising to others. "I hope that I've made a difference over the years," he said as his wife, Sylvia, daughters Karin Mantor and Julie Sabo and young grandchildren stood behind him.

Voice cracks, eyes fill

Sabo's voice cracked for the first of many times and his eyes filled when he talked about how he had been in public office since 1960, the first 18 years as a member of the Minnesota House. "When you've been running every two years for 46 years, the normal thing is to just keep doing it," he said in explaining the suddenness of his announcement.

He thanked Minnesotans who welcomed a North Dakota farm boy to Minneapolis 50 years ago to attend Augsburg College. "Being able to serve Minnesota has been an unimaginable dream," he said.

He offered the most praise to Wendell Anderson, whom he called the state's "greatest governor." Sabo, who was speaker of the state House for six years, said he's proud of his work on the "Minnesota Miracle" of the 1970s, which shifted the burden for public school funding from local property taxes to increased state taxes.

As former chairman of the U.S. House Budget Committee, he said he was also proud of the 1993 budget, which he said led to the first surpluses in three decades and the largest economic expansion in history.

"But these historic accomplishments also remind us that progress can be reversed. Elections do matter," he said.

Sabo said he is most concerned now about the "fiscal mess" the country is in because of what he called the "irresponsible and reckless budget policies" of the Bush administration. "We are bankrupting the country and leaving mountains of debt for our children and grandchildren," Sabo said.

He said a fundamental problem in politics today "are people who over-promise and overstate. I've tried to do the opposite."

Sabo, who praised his Democratic colleagues from Minnesota as well as GOP Rep. Jim Ramstad, lamented a growing political polarization. "I don't recall ever making a public statement critical of my colleague whether it's a Democrat or a Republican," he said.

Jim Adams was in the state House and door-knocked with Sabo in the early days. "I retired after 20 years. It was a big relief for me. It was a big relief for him," said Adams.

Sabo will serve out his term, which ends in January. Sylvia Sabo said the couple will sell their home in Washington and live permanently in their condo in Minnesota.

Candidate list forming

State Rep. Keith Ellison, DFL-Minneapolis, Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer, a college professor, and DFL Minneapolis City Council Member Gary Schiff already are in the race to succeed Sabo.

Green Party member Jay Pond also is in, as are Republicans Tim Anderson and James Turnham.

Former DFL Hennepin County Commissioner Mark Andrew and former state Sen. Ember Reichgott Jung, DFL-New Hope, also said they are interested. State Sen. Satveer Chaudhary, DFL-Fridley, and state Rep. Connie Bernardy, DFL-Fridley, said they are thinking about a run. Sabo's longtime chief of staff, Michael Erlandson, and Julie Sabo said they wouldn't talk about their plans Saturday.

Hennepin County Board Members Gail Dorfman and Mike Opat also are considering a run.

State Sens. Scott Dibble and Linda Berglin, both DFL-Minneapolis, said they would not run.

A New Spring In The Market's Step? (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Spring came early to Wall Street last week, as both the stock and bond markets rallied, fears of inflation ebbed and the economy headed toward the finish of one of the strongest quarters in more than three years.

The blue-chip Dow Jones industrial average and the S&P 500 indexes both reached their highest levels since May 2001. The Dow has now been above the 11,000 mark for most of the last month, suggesting to some analysts that a new "floor" has been reached in a bull market that still has a way to run. And the broader S&P 500 index broke through 1300 early in the week. Only the tech-heavy Nasdaq lagged behind, reflecting a growing consensus that tech stocks have become too frothy and raced too far ahead of the business fundamentals.

Stocks were buoyed during the week by stable oil prices and boffo profit reports from three of Wall Street's biggest investment houses. Shares in Goldman Sachs, the second largest security firm, rose more than 6 percent for the week after reporting that its quarterly earnings jumped 64 percent. Lehman Brothers and Bear Stearns also posted strong increases. Other reports suggested continued strength in consumer confidence and industrial production.

The major factor in the week's market activity was a changing consensus about inflation, and how the Federal Reserve would respond to it. As late as last week, bond market futures reflected an expectation that the Fed would raise short-term rates three more times this spring, to 5.25 percent, to help cool down an economy that looked to be growing at an unsustainable annual rate of 5 percent.

But a government report showed a modest -- and unexpectedly low -- 0.1 percent increase in consumer prices in February, even after factoring in energy and food prices. At the same time, some Fed officials were heard to express confidence that the economy would cool down on its own later this year, as some of the steam is let out of the housing bubble. All of this led expectations to shift in favor of a two-move, 5 percent target on the Fed's benchmark short-term interest rate. Bond prices rose in response, and the yield on the closely watched 10-year Treasury bond drifted down to 4.67 percent, a decline of 8 basis points for the week.

When they weren't tuning in to the NCAA basketball tournament, Wall Street traders and analysts could be heard talking about "soft landings" or a "Goldilocks economy" -- neither too hot nor too cold. Playing out in the background has been a steady flow of corporate mergers and takeovers at premium prices that give confidence to momentum investors. Furthermore, the ease with which many of these highly leveraged deals are financed suggests to the bond market that there is still so much money sloshing around the global financial system that any sudden backup in interest rates is highly unlikely.

Stocks Rally To Best Week Yet Of '06 (NYT)

By Jeff Sommer

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

It was the best week for stocks since the beginning of the year, as several economic reports suggested that inflation was under control while economic growth remained strong. The Dow Jones industrial average and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index both ended the week at fresh five-year highs.

On Thursday, the Labor Department reported that the Consumer Price Index rose only 0.1 percent in February after a 0.7 percent increase the previous month.

Wall Street firms themselves helped lead the market higher. Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers Holdings and Bear Stearns all reported record earnings. Shares of Goldman Sachs rose more than 6 percent for the week.

Shares of North Fork Bancorp, which agreed to be bought by the Capital One Financial Corporation for $14.6 billion, rose nearly 15 percent for the week.

For the week, the Dow industrials rose 203.31 points, or 1.8 percent, to close at 11,279.65. The S.& P. 500 climbed 25.67 points, or 2 percent, to close at 1,307.25. The Nasdaq composite index gained 44.44 points, or 2 percent, to close at 2,306.48.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note slipped to 4.67 percent from 4.72 percent the previous week. JEFF SOMMER

Stocks Blow Past previous highs (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

With the economy tootling along and fear of inflation fading, the stock market reached new highs last week.

The Dow Jones industrial average advanced 203 points to 11,279.65. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 26 points, to 1307.25. The Nasdaq Stock Market composite index climbed 44 points, to 2306.48.

The gains were the biggest since the first week of the year for the Dow and the S&P, which last week cruised past their previous peaks and now are trading at their highest levels since the summer of 2001.

Tech stocks still lag, but the Nasdaq is just 25 points shy of the high it reached earlier this year. If it can return to that level, it too will be trading at a four-year high.

The market benefited this week from a new Wall Street consensus on interest rates. The Federal Reserve will boost rates only another half of a percentage point, most economists now are saying. That light at the end of the tunnel is what traders want to see -- even if it might be a mirage.

MARKET BEAT (LAT)

By Tom Petruno

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Investors Aren't Scaring Easily

The Dow is up 5.2% this year, its best start since 1999. A steady economy is trumping other issues.

Market Beat

March 19, 2006

Something may come along to scare the U.S. stock market down from its current heights. But it may have to be a problem people haven't seen before.

The usual suspects seem to be losing their ability to frighten investors. That's often a good sign for a bull market's staying power.

The blue-chip Dow Jones industrial average is up 5.2% this quarter, its best start to a year since 1999.

Much of the rest of the U.S. market is doing as well or better, which should translate into some happy returns on investors' first-quarter financial statements.

The advance in share prices lifted the Dow last week to its highest level since 2001 and some broader indexes, such as the small-stock Russell 2,000 and the New York Stock Exchange composite, to record highs.

It's true that the U.S. market is a laggard compared with the gains racked up this year in many foreign markets. That was the case last year as well.

Still, this probably is a better beginning to 2006 than many investors had expected. If this pace continues, the Dow will be up more than 20% for the year.

You won't find many people on Wall Street who believe that kind of gain is achievable, however. A Bloomberg News survey last week of seven big brokerages found the average forecast was for a Dow of 11,785 at year-end, which would be a 10% full-year gain. That would mean a 4.5% rise from Friday's closing level of 11,279.65.

What would it take to make this a 20% kind of year? The temptation is to say, "Everything has to go right." But then, the Dow has gone a quarter of that distance with plenty going wrong this year.

Oil prices are higher than they were on Jan. 1, and so are long-term bond yields. The trade deficit is up. Congress is rattling the protectionist saber. The housing market is slowing.

More risks loom. The dollar is weakening again, Iraq might yet plunge into civil war, and bird flu could arrive in the U.S. any day.

Yet none of this has been enough to undermine the equity market this quarter.

Maybe investors simply have grown tired of worrying about the ups and downs of oil and bond yields. The shock value is waning.

Or maybe the potential negatives are being trumped by one overriding positive: The U.S. economy is in good shape. The Federal Reserve said as much last week in its latest summary of regional economic conditions, the so-called beige book report.

The Fed said most of its 12 district banks characterized the pace of economic expansion as "moderate or steady" in January and February. Importantly, it said that "employment continued to increase in most locations and in many sectors of the economy."

That jibes with the government's report on March 10 that the economy created a net 243,000 jobs in February, the second-best monthly gain in the last 12 months.

Decent job growth has been the missing element of this expansion since 2001. If that tide is turning, it could underpin the next phase of economic growth. More jobs mean more households, more household income, and, eventually, more spending.

Wall Street also is betting on continued good times for the industrial sector of the economy, which is turning out the commodities and heavy machinery that are in demand in many emerging-market countries.

This year's rally in the Standard & Poor's 500 index, which is up 4.7% since Dec. 31, has been led by stocks of companies such as grain processor Archer-Daniels-Midland Inc. (up 43% year to date), machinery titan Caterpillar Inc. (up 32%, making it the hottest stock in the Dow index) and railroad Union Pacific Corp. (up 13%).

Union Pacific last week raised its earnings forecast for the current quarter by more than 20%, in part citing growth in commodity hauling.

They may lack the glamour of the technology leaders of the late 1990s, but grimy industrial stocks are getting the job done in people's portfolios in this bull market. Since the end of 2002, Caterpillar's stock is up 233% and Union Pacific is up 52%.

Semiconductor giant Intel Corp., by contrast, is up 25%.

John Kosar, head of Asbury Research in suburban Chicago and a longtime analyst of stock and bond market trends, doesn't take much comfort in the leadership of industrial shares.

Without a strong rally by tech issues the market's advance this year won't be sustained, he contends.

Historically, "If tech doesn't lead, the market doesn't go up very much," Kosar said. "When stocks really are doing well, people want to ride the fastest horses," and that's often tech shares, he said.

The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index, which ended at 2,306.48 on Friday, remains below its five-year high of 2,331.36 reached Jan. 11.

Kosar says the broad market is likely to trip soon, although he isn't sure what the catalyst might be to take it down.

Let's say he's right. A market correction may well be overdue, given stocks' gains since October. (Although bearish analysts were arguing the same thing at the start of the year.)

But one highly anticipated event could make any sell-off short-lived: The Federal Reserve may be nearing the end of its credit-tightening campaign.

Many on Wall Street expect Fed policymakers to announce at either their May or June meetings that they are pausing after lifting their key short-term rate from 1% in mid-2004 to the current 4.5%. (A rate increase to 4.75% at the March 28 meeting seems all but certain.)

How would investors likely react to the prospect of even a temporary halt to the Fed's rate increases at, say, the 5% level?

Some surely would rush to buy long-term Treasury bonds to lock in yields.

DOJ_NMG_0018953

But if the Fed stopped, and if confidence remained high that the economy wasn't at risk of falling into recession, that almost certainly would be an invitation for investors to take on more risk in search of higher returns. The stock market would be a logical destination for those investors.

In effect, the Fed would be removing a restraint that has held the U.S. market back since the beginning of 2004, when it became obvious that rock-bottom interest rates were going away.

"When people believe with confidence that the Fed is done, equities will probably be the primary beneficiary," said Anthony Karydakis, chief U.S. economist at JPMorgan Asset Management in New York.

Consider what happened in Britain in 2004 and 2005. The Bank of England raised its benchmark rate from 3.5% in October 2003 to 4.75% by August 2004. It then went on hold.

The FTSE-100 index of British blue-chip stocks rose 9% from the date of the bank's August 2004 meeting to the end of that year. It then jumped 17% in 2005.

With so many short-term traders in markets worldwide, it isn't hard to imagine that U.S. stocks would attract a mountain of money once it was clear that the Fed was pausing, if the economic outlook remained upbeat.

How long that money would stay, and how high it might be willing to bid share prices, are anyone's guess.

But if the Fed in fact is nearly done, the stock market's performance this quarter could just be an opening act to a surprisingly good year.

The March Of The Bears May Only Be Starting (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

TRADERS may not have much data to worry about this week, thanks to a calendar that is light on economic reports and earnings. So maybe this is a good time to focus on how they feel, instead.

Some analysts do precisely that — study the mood on Wall Street — and their conclusion is that investors do not feel so hot. Popular gauges of sentiment toward stocks show extreme bearishness, at least by the standards of the last few years, even with the market hitting new highs.

"The equity market is climbing a wall of worry right now," David Rosenberg, an economist at Merrill Lynch, said in a note to clients. He cited a recent edition of the widely followed survey of investment newsletter writers by Investors Intelligence, which recorded the highest level of bearishness since April 2003 and the least bullishness since August 2004.

Mr. Rosenberg sees reason to cheer such comparative despondency. After those prior two milestones, he said, "the S.& P. 500 managed to take off in the ensuing two to three months." His advice is to take the survey readings "as signs that there is a lot of bad news already being discounted" in stock prices.

But Louise Yamada, head of Louise Yamada Technical Research Advisors, warned investors not to get their hopes up just yet. Bad news can be infectious, she said.

"Once the market letter-writers begin to turn bearish, there is a slow progression," she said. "Those early writers advise their clients, who lighten positions, the effect of which on stocks leads more letter writers to turn more cautious."

As the next wave of advisers turns gloomy, their followers begin to sell, and on and on. "So if the bearish writers continue to move up in numbers," Ms. Yamada said, "there can be a cascade effect on equities."

Eventually, there are so many bears that few have retained their holdings, and the market goes back up. But bearishness has been moderate during the last couple of years, she said, "so if this initial increase continues, the progression would just be beginning."

And Mr. Rosenberg acknowledged that there were reasons to feel pessimistic these days, including the inability of oil to stay below $60 a barrel; avian flu; trade skirmishes with China; and the potential for falling home prices.

"The bottom line is that there are legitimate things to be concerned about," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0018954

DATA WATCH The report on February producer prices due Tuesday is forecast in a Bloomberg News poll of economists to show a 0.3 percent decrease; excluding food and energy prices, a 0.1 percent increase is predicted.

Orders for durable goods, often a volatile statistic, are expected to record a turnaround, rising 1.4 percent in February after a 9.9 percent decline in January.

Rice Seeks To Balance China's Power (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

PAGO PAGO, American Samoa, March 18 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held talks on Saturday with Japan and Australia to deepen a three-way regional alliance aimed in part at balancing the spreading presence of China.

At the same time, American officials said the United States was also looking at the meeting of top envoys of the three countries in Sydney, Australia, as a means to draw Japan into improving relations with neighboring countries still suspicious of its intentions 60 years after World War II.

Heading toward the end of what aides said would be one of the longest trips by a secretary of state, Ms. Rice joined with the foreign ministers Alexander Downer of Australia and Taro Aso of Japan in welcoming China's "constructive engagement" in East Asia. Australian and American officials acknowledge, however, that the phrase understates the Chinese sphere of influence.

"The tenor of the discussion was how to make China a positive force in the region," said Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, briefing reporters on the secretary's plane to American Samoa for refueling. He said the discussion was an effort to add to the web of American alliances in the area, to enhance stability and not threaten China.

Nevertheless, in Indonesia earlier in the week and then in Australia, where Ms. Rice spent nearly three days, she was repeatedly asked by the local news media about American intentions toward China, which has signed an array of economic deals with countries on its rim.

At a news conference in Sydney on Thursday, Ms. Rice reinforced those concerns, criticizing China's military buildup, economic policies and human rights record. Asked if China would see Ms. Rice's trip as a cause for concern, another senior official, speaking anonymously under briefing ground rules, said, "I think we certainly hope so."

Ms. Rice's visit to Australia, from Wednesday night to Saturday afternoon, was long compared with other stops. But American officials said Australia, an ally that has sent forces to Iraq and Afghanistan, had been feeling neglected, and Australian leaders appealed for Ms. Rice to do some public diplomacy to prop up the sagging American image.

U.S. Confers With Allies On China Energy Efforts (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia -- The United States, Japan and Australia yesterday discussed China's "aggressive" buying of energy assets in Africa and Latin America, the first time China's "energy diplomacy" has been examined at an official international forum.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the foreign ministers of Japan and Australia, Taro Aso and Alexander Downer, were unable to agree on steps to address the issue.

"It was a constructive conversation over China's role in the region and its future role in the world, and how to make China a positive force within the international system," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters traveling with Miss Rice.

He said the meeting had not been a "finger-wagging" anti-China session, but he acknowledged that Beijing's dealings with problematic states -- whose actions are often referred to the U.N. Security Council, where China has veto power -- were part of the discussions.

The trio did not agree on a solution to the problem, which has been most evident in Beijing's reluctance to support U.N. action against Sudan over atrocities in its Darfur region, Mr. McCormack said.

Yesterday's session had worried China, but U.S. and Australian officials insisted there was no conspiracy against the world's most-populous nation.

DOJ_NMG_0018955

"We welcomed China's constructive engagement in the region and concurred on the value of enhanced cooperation with other parties," such as the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and South Korea, the ministers said in a joint statement.

"Supporting the emergence and consolidation of democracies and strengthening cooperative frameworks in the Asia-Pacific region was a particular focus of our attention," they said.

Mr. Downer said China should not feel that the three allies are "ganging up" on it.

Earlier in the week, Miss Rice sought to assure Beijing that Washington's efforts to solidify its alliances with Japan and Australia, and to build up India and Indonesia as formidable Asian powers are not aimed at encircling China with pro-U.S. states.

At the same time, she voiced concern over China's 14 percent increase in its defense budget this year to about $35 billion.

In a separate meeting with Mr. Aso yesterday, Miss Rice asked him "to reconsider the total ban on beef imports" from the United States that Japan has imposed, Mr. McCormack said.

Japan's Kyodo news agency quoted Japanese officials in Sydney as saying that Miss Rice told Mr. Aso that reinstating the ban on U.S. beef was an excessive reaction after a U.S. meat-packing plant mistakenly shipped banned spinal materials in a batch of meat to Japan in January.

Just a month earlier, Tokyo had lifted a previous two-year ban on U.S. beef imports imposed because of mad cow disease fears.

A third case of mad cow disease in the United States was discovered last week, while Japan confirmed on Friday it had found its 24th case and the first in a beef cow.

Miss Rice and Mr. Aso also discussed the repositioning of U.S. forces in Japan.

Rice Finishing 10-Day, 31,263-Mile Trip (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, March 19, 2006

Condoleezza Rice is flying around the world — and then some. Whether she breaks a record by a secretary of state will have to wait for a thoughtful assessment free of jet lag.

Rice finishes a 10-day, 31,263-mile odyssey on Sunday that took her to three continents. She crossed four oceans and the international dateline twice. A trip around the world at the equator is only about 25,000 miles.

Her diplomatic tour of Chile, Indonesia and Australia probably breaks Madeleine Albright's 1997 record for the most miles flown by a secretary of state on a single trip, although State Department spokesman Sean McCormack could not say for sure.

The Rice trip included a punishing, 23-hour slog that may set its own State Department record for most continuous miles. She flew from Santiago, Chile, to Windhoek, Namibia to refuel her plane, to Mauritius to refuel again, and then to Jakarta, Indonesia.

That's a strange hopscotch across the Southern Hemisphere. The Air Force, which operates Rice's Air Force Two plane, insists it's faster than a more direct route because of favorable winds.

There were some odd moments along the 60-hour journey around the world.

Bolivian President Evo Morales gave Rice a musical instrument shellacked with coca leaves. The gift stayed behind in Santiago, Chile, where Rice and Morales were attending the inauguration of Chilean President Michelle Bachelet. Coca growing is legal in Bolivia, even if the ultimate use of much of the crop is not.

"There was some question about the legal regulations" imposed by the U.S. Customs Department, McCormack said. "She was very pleased to receive it," he offered, well, diplomatically.

In Windhoek, the tarmac was carpeted with beetles drawn by the lights required for Rice's middle-of-the-night arrival. Really, really big beetles. She did not get off the plane and thus missed the local fauna.

The Windhoek airport is reported to be the site of a secret U.S.-run detention center for terrorism suspects. Reporters who ventured to the darkened edge of the tarmac, in sight of a string of low, nondescript buildings, met a muscular guard with a gun who materialized from the darkness.

A huge and eerily beautiful moon hung over the scene, beetles and all.

In Mauritius, some in Rice's party boarded a bus for a quick, delightful trip to a beach while the plane was refueled and the Air Force switched crews.

In Indonesia, Rice toured an Islamic elementary school that receives U.S. funding. Announcing an $8.5 million grant to bring "Sesame Street" to Indonesia, Rice posed with an actor dressed head to toe in a red, furry Elmo suit.

In Sydney, Australia, Rice got a little rattled by anti-war protesters who interrupted her during a speech. "Sir, do you have something you'd like to say?" Rice asked a young man who called her a war criminal.

"Iraqi blood is on your hands and you can't wash that blood away," he shouted over and over until guards led him away.

Rice had a comeback, noting that democracy is alive and well both in Sydney and in Baghdad, but her voice grew thin.

For a woman who habitually rises at 4:30 a.m. to exercise and bounds into her office two hours later, Rice's trip had a relaxed feel.

Rice actually played the tourist for the first time in her 14-month tenure as the top U.S. diplomat.

She took in a boxing match and several swimming events at the Commonwealth Games in Melbourne, Australia, near the end of the trip. She hung medals around the necks of three Australian swimmers and chatted with swim star Ian Thorpe.

She looked like she was having fun.

What do you do for 60 hours on an airplane? Work, eat, read, sleep, eat some more. And listen to your iPod.

Most of Rice's staff and traveling party were equipped with the popular digital music devices, with tastes ranging from Vivaldi to Tupac.

Rice senior adviser Jim Wilkinson offered a tour of his iPod: Def Leppard, Kid Rock, Kanye West. Speechwriter Chris Brose listens to Spoon, Rufus Wainwright and Miles Davis.

Reading material for reporters and aides ranged from "Assassin's Gate," George Packer's account of the early phase of Iraq reconstruction, to Truman Capote's "In Cold Blood." Rice was reading Doris Kearns Goodwin's new biography of Abraham Lincoln.

"When you fly 60 hours, at some point everyone goes mad," Wilkinson said. "You just pray that it happens at different times along the way."

World Scrambles To Feed China's Appetite For Metal (LAT)

By Don Lee, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

YONGKANG, China — About once a month, Ying Guangwu tucks some cash inside his black shirt, slings a knapsack over his back, and hits the road.

The square-jawed 33-year-old doesn't always know where he's headed or when he'll return. But he knows exactly what he's looking for: tons of scrap metal.

A pen-shaped magnet in his pocket helps him determine the quality of some metals. In December, Ying spent two weeks in Guangdong province, a 20-hour bus ride away, rummaging through factory warehouses and scrap yards. He bought 10 tons of tin ingots, lead cables and imported scrap, shipping them by truck to his wife, Lin Li. She sorted the stuff inside their two-story home before reselling it to metal traders and recyclers in town.

Ying and Lin, high school graduates, earned about $25,000 last year — more than what many Chinese doctors and lawyers make.

"I didn't want to do this when I was young. It seemed stupid to me," says the second-generation scrap collector, whose sunburned face bears the mark of 10 years on China's dusty streets. But his father took the right path, Ying says. "This is turning trash into treasure."

China's voracious appetite for metals is convulsing the world. It has led to economic booms in some nations and crime waves in others by so-called urban miners who steal metals from houses and public buildings. China's runaway economy needs the metals to build railroads, office towers, cars and appliances.

The Middle Kingdom is now the world's biggest consumer of copper, lead, zinc, iron ore, steel and aluminum.

China's hunger has boosted mineral-rich nations, from copper-laden Chile to Australia, which has vast iron deposits. Prices of new and used lead, copper, nickel and other metals have tripled or more in the last few years, triggering a worldwide scramble for the commodities.

Chinese state-owned mining companies are prowling the planet for fresh supplies, while armies of people such as Ying and Lin spend their days hunting for castaway metals from typewriter letterheads to 30-foot-long aluminum missile casings.

Nowhere in China is the craving for metals more evident than Yongkang. This landlocked city in southeastern China's Zhejiang province calls itself the hardware capital. With a population of about 530,000, Yongkang boasts about 10,000 hardware businesses, nearly all of them private family enterprises.

Yongkang is legendary for itinerant tinkerers who mended pots and pans for a living. Today, countless homes, storefronts, junkyards and factories carry on that tradition, buying, selling and recycling more than 600,000 tons of scrap metal every year. The city's streets teem with tractors, trucks and bicycles hauling metal rods, coils and sheets.

Many head for Yongkang's scrap-metal market, an outdoor bazaar slightly smaller than the Los Angeles Convention Center. More than 400 garage-sized storefronts are filled with scrap collected around the world: crushed beer cans from Japan, fuel pumps and used car parts from the West, air-conditioning condensers from northeastern China.

On a recent afternoon, Ying Sufang sat stooped outside Store No. 287, meticulously separating printers' lead pieces no bigger than grains of rice.

The lead was shipped to her by her husband, who was foraging for scrap about 1,000 miles away — not far from the Vietnam border. Last year, Ying and her husband earned more than $7,000, their best take in 10 years.

"That's not bad," the 44-year-old said.

But it has come at a price. Ying, who is unrelated to Ying Guangwu, grumbles about the grimy, sometimes punishing work.

She has never become accustomed to her husband being away for long stretches. He has been gone for the last month, leaving her and their middle-school daughter at home.

"I chose this business because 60% to 70% of people in our village are doing this," she said. "This is how we make money.... I don't know what else to do."

Across the Pacific, George Adams is also cashing in on one of the greatest commodity booms in modern times. He is the president of Adams Steel, a scrap metal dealer in Anaheim that shreds used cars, washing machines and dryers down to the size of a wallet. The crushed metal is loaded onto trucks and containers that are shipped to traders around the world. Much of it winds up in China, in the hands of millions of scrap traders like those in Yongkang.

Adams' annual sales now exceed $100 million. Last year he bought scrap yards in Southern California, installed more shredding equipment and added 70 employees to boost his workforce to 500.

He has a lot of competition. Thieves have ripped apart ballpark fences in Des Moines and stripped copper from cathedral domes in Cleveland. In Buenos Aires, people have made away with bronze plaques on boulevards and copper wires from utility companies. And in England, India and Malaysia, tens of thousands of manhole covers have vanished.

"They're taking copper out of brand-new houses in Southern California," says Carl Clark, Adams Steel's plant manager. Such stolen copper pipes and wires don't need to be recycled; they are bundled together and sold to brokers who send them all over the world, where they fetch triple the prices of a few years ago.

"An actual copper penny today is worth more as scrap than its face value," Clark says.

The crime spree has resulted in deaths as people have fallen down manholes, and has caused such concern that countries like Argentina placed restrictions on the export of scrap metals.

The price of iron ore, a major ingredient in steel, jumped 71% in the last year alone, sharply cutting steel producers' margins. But with China accounting for one-fourth of the world's steel production last year — and half of all iron ore imports — Beijing is demanding that iron ore exporters put a lid on prices.

"The Chinese are flexing their market power," says Ruth Stroppiana, an economist at Moody's economy.com in Sydney, Australia. "The China factor," she adds, "has been absolutely huge" for Australia, Brazil, Chile and other resource-rich nations.

Chinese towns such as Yongkang also have benefited, although the metal boom has taken a heavy toll on China's environment and workers. Pollution-spewing metal factories have tainted rivers and land.

In Yongkang, officials have shut down dozens of the 1,000-plus smelters in the city, say plant managers. Authorities also have toughened rules governing imported scrap metals — prohibiting car motors containing oil, for example, says Du Huanzheng, a metals expert at Zhejiang Institute of Industry and Commerce.

Still, China's imports of scrap metal surged nearly 30% last year, Du says, and the trend is not likely to abate soon, least of all in Yongkang.

Ying Zhiang's family has been in the scrap metal business for several generations. He is no relation to Ying Guangwu or to Ying Sufang. About 20 years ago, Ying collected scrap as he traveled the country fixing scales for merchants. "Even though products can get old and useless, the metal in them still has value," he says.

Now 52, Ying runs Yongya Copper Industrial Co., one of China's leading copper producers and recyclers. His Yongkang-based company ships 100 tons of the metal a day. He buys most of his scrap copper from dealers in town and the nearby port city of Taizhou, which is also known as Linhai.

In Yongya's warehouse, workers in red caps moved bales of scrap wire, and others in street clothes picked up small bits of loose copper on the ground. Ying says he is considering collecting scrap himself again, because prices have soared beyond belief. A decade ago, he was buying a metric ton of copper in China for about $625. Now it costs about 10 times that amount.

"The numbers are out of this world," he says.

Deep In China, A Poor And Pious Muslim Enclave (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

DONGXIANG, China — No, the old man answered, standing in his bare home deep in a mountain ravine, he had never seen an airplane. The man, Tie Yongxiang, has never watched television, either. He listened to the pop quiz and seemed pleased when he could answer the last question in the affirmative.

China? Had he ever heard of it?

"I know what China is," said Mr. Tie, 68. "It is a country run by people who are supposed to be helping us."

"Us," as Mr. Tie puts it, are the Dongxiang people, an ethnic group that has lived for eight centuries in the dry, forbidding mountains that make this county in Gansu Province one of the most isolated places in China.

The most recent census found 513,000 Dongxiang people in China, and an overwhelming majority live in and around Dongxiang County. Of the 25 townships in the county, 19 do not have a single Chinese person. Most people do not speak Chinese, and some, like Mr. Tie, have only a vague notion of China, despite living in the middle of it.

The geographic isolation has helped preserve an Islamic culture, as well as an ancient language, but it has also separated the Dongxiang people from the prosperity lifting other parts of China. The Dongxiang, one of China's 56 officially recognized ethnic minorities, are now among China's poorest and most illiterate people.

On a recent Friday, two days after a heavy snowstorm had coated the mountains and left a sheet of ice on the narrow village roads, old men in white caps trudged through the snow to different mosques. Though some are too poor to send their children to school, they have pooled money to build village mosques as well as graceful towers with elegant curved roofs that serve as Muslim burial vaults.

"The Dongxiang people have always believed in Islam," said Ma Ali, 36, the imam at an old mosque in the village of Hanzilin. Indeed, even within a larger region known as the center of Islam in China, the people of Dongxiang have a reputation for being particularly steadfast in their faith.

"People were devout in the past," said Ma Kui, 75, as he leaned on a wooden cane and waited for afternoon prayers with other farmers dressed in lambskin coats. "They are still devout now."

But as everywhere in China, modernity is seeping up the winding roads to the county's larger settlements and beckoning many younger people. In the county seat, Suonanba, cellphones, blue jeans and Internet cafes arrived several years ago. So did Chinese building contractors, cigarettes, alcohol and food not prepared to Islamic code.

DOJ_NMG_0018959

"The Islamic atmosphere has become watered down over time, and the older people are aware of that," said Ma Chunling, who is 22. "So they want to protect their culture, and particularly Islam."

Growing up, Ms. Ma (the family name is quite common here) felt the otherness of being from Dongxiang. Her mother told stories of hiding in caves during her own childhood, fearful that "the Chinese" were coming.

"All of the people in the village were waiting for the Chinese to come and slaughter them," Ms. Ma said. "But the Chinese never came."

Ms. Ma, now a primary school teacher, spent three years at a vocational school in the eastern port city of Tianjin and wanted to stay and become a hairdresser. But she said her parents were conservative Muslims who believed it was inappropriate for an unmarried woman to travel far from home.

"A lot of young people really want to go out and see the rest of China," she said. "But often their families don't let them. It's still very, very isolated."

For years, many Chinese scholars assumed that the Dongxiang descended from the Mongol soldiers in Genghis Khan's army who eventually settled in Gansu during the 13th century when the Mongols ruled China under the Yuan Dynasty. But their exact origins were never fully known, an uncertainty that fed an inferiority complex.

"A man once asked me, 'Where do the Dongxiang come from?' " said Ma Zhiyong, a historian who grew up in the county but moved to the provincial capital, Lanzhou, as a teenager. "I was 18 or 19, and couldn't answer the question. I was ashamed."

Mr. Ma decided to look for an answer. Over several years, he scoured research libraries in Gansu, talked to other scholars and studied old maps. He found that some Dongxiang villages shared names with places in Central Asian countries like Uzbekistan.

He also found shared customs. He said peasants in Uzbekistan and Dongxiang both learn to cut a slaughtered chicken into 13 pieces. He found that Dongxiang people described themselves as sarta, a term that once referred to Muslim traders in Central Asia.

There was even a physical similarity, as many Dongxiang look more like people from Central Asia, as opposed to Han Chinese.

Mr. Ma decided that the story about Genghis Khan's army was only half right. Some of the Dongxiang ancestors were Mongol soldiers. But he concluded that many others were a diverse group of Middle Eastern and Central Asian craftsmen conscripted into the Mongol army during Khan's famed western campaign. They brought several languages and, in many cases, a strong belief in Islam.

Mr. Ma said that generations of intermarriage, including marriages with local Han Chinese and Tibetans, resulted in a new ethnic group and language.

The language, if a source of pride, is also blamed for Dongxiang's educational shortcomings. The language is oral, so children never learn to read or write in their native tongue.

In grammar school, the curriculum is in Chinese and many students drop out. Government statistics show that the average person in Dongxiang has only 1.1 years of schooling. Because of the cost, many families never even send children to school, particularly daughters.

"When I was in primary school, I didn't understand what I was learning," said Chen Yuanlong, a local official and scholar. "Often, I wanted to talk to the teacher, but I couldn't communicate my ideas in Chinese. It was very difficult."

The challenge of trying to teach Chinese to Dongxiang children has attracted international aid groups to Dongxiang. The British government is financing a large training program for teachers.

Another pilot program, paid for by the Ford Foundation, has created a bilingual curriculum using a Dongxiang-Chinese dictionary developed by Mr. Chen and other scholars. That program has already produced an improvement in test scores, but its supporters are searching for more financial backing.

Education is a basic problem but many people still struggle just to survive. Villages in the deepest ravines depend on potatoes and face starvation during drought years.

Some men who live closer to roads and commerce have become mules for drug runners. Others have left for manual labor in bigger cities, demolishing buildings or working as butchers or dishwashers.

Mr. Tie, the man who took the pop quiz, is too old for such work. He lives halfway down a ravine with his wife and their 16-year-old mentally retarded son. "We beg," Mr. Tie said. "We have land but when our crops aren't enough, we go to nearby villages to beg."

Farther up the ravine, closer to the road that leads to the county seat, Ma Hezhe, 25, watched over her 3-month-old son. Her family is like a snapshot of Dongxiang: two of her husband's brothers had left the county to work as migrant laborers; her mother-in-law, huddled in the corner of the communal bed, had not left Dongxiang in her entire life. The tiny baby, the newest generation, had been given an Islamic name, Ibrahim.

Ms. Ma had not yet given him a Chinese name. "He doesn't need one until he starts school," she said. It was a local custom, she added, to wait until a child came "into contact" with Chinese society.

There would be plenty of time.

Thousands Of Taiwanese Rally To Assert Freedom From China (LAT)

By Mark Magnier And Tsai Ting-i, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan — President Chen Shui-bian on Saturday called on Taiwan to resist China's bid to annex the island as tens of thousands of people took to the streets protesting Beijing's growing military threat.

"Our future will never be decided by the 1.3 billion people of China," Chen told supporters in front of the presidential office building. "Taiwan is an independent sovereign state, and its future should be determined by its 23 million people. Taiwanese people oppose annexation and invasion."

Protesters on the three-hour march held balloons and waved banners as a flatbed truck hauled a large globe surrounded by red-colored likenesses of missiles bearing the Chinese flag.

The rally, with the slogan, "Protect democracy, oppose annexation," was held to mark the passage of a controversial law in Beijing last year that threatens to use force if Taiwan declares independence.

In recent weeks Chen's government has raised the temperature across the Taiwan Strait by announcing plans to dissolve a largely symbolic unification council, a move nonetheless viewed critically by Beijing, which considers Taiwan part of its territory.

The Bush administration has signaled its displeasure with Chen's latest move, concerned over the prospect of inflamed tensions across the Taiwan Strait at a time when its military forces are stretched thin by conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan and its diplomats distracted by Iran and North Korea's nuclear programs.

Beijing, which announced a 14.7% increase in its military budget this month, raising it to $35.3 billion, has more than 700 missiles aimed at Taiwan.

Chen's Democratic Progressive Party and some television stations estimated that Saturday's march drew 100,000 people, though some police put it closer to 50,000.

The festive atmosphere often seemed more like a street fair as Taipei mothers pushed baby carriages alongside party loyalists bused in from around the island.

"I am here to show my patriotism," said 53-year-old Wang, who gave only his surname. He was accompanied by his wife and three daughters. "We have our own country."

Analysts said Chen could become more provocative in coming months, as he tries to keep his party in power beyond the next presidential election in 2008.

"The China threat issue is a perfect button to push to avoid people looking at his domestic record," said Wenran Jiang, acting director of the China Institute at the University of Alberta in Canada. "Things could get complicated with this kind of game."

Chen's ruling DPP is reeling from a weak showing in local elections late last year and a recent scandal over alleged payoffs involving the use of foreign labor.

On key issues for voters, including the economy and education, Chen's legacy leaves little for his successor to run on. And the opposition Nationalist Party is gaining momentum under the leadership of Harvard-trained Taipei Mayor Ma Ying-jeou.

Chen hopes Beijing will lose its cool and make a threatening move that will push centrist voters to his party, analysts say.

DOJ_NMG_0018961

But this strategy could create ripples well beyond the island. Keeping Taiwan in the fold is a core issue on which Chinese leaders judge their legitimacy, especially at a time when they want stability in the run-up to the 2008 Olympics in Beijing.

Taiwanese Hopeful Would Alter Course On China (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan -- Ma Ying-jeou has always loved to run marathons, and he has approached politics the same way. From the day he was named Taiwan's youngest-ever cabinet member 18 years ago, he has been running for leadership. Now, 55 and head of the Nationalist Party, he has started a sprint toward the presidency that, in the view of many Taiwanese, could dramatically alter the island's tense standoff with China.

In an interview last week, Ma pledged that if he won the next presidential election, in 2008, as widely expected, he would shift Taiwan sharply away from the confrontational, pro-independence policies followed by President Chen Shui-bian. A Nationalist government under his leadership, he declared, would seek neither unification with nor independence from China, focusing instead on practical improvements in cross-strait relations while maintaining the status quo of Taiwanese self-rule.

"When I talk about these things, I say, 'Let's forget about unification and independence,' " he said. "Let's maintain the status quo and concentrate on the economy."

His statements were framed to sound like music in Washington, where the Bush administration has repeatedly expressed irritation with Chen's relentless efforts to move Taiwan's 23 million people along the road toward independence since his rise to power in 2000. Although the United States has no formal diplomatic relations with Taiwan, it has promised to help in the island's defense, raising the specter of U.S. involvement should the tensions over independence explode into military confrontation with China.

Ma's lower-the-temperature approach is also calculated to appeal to Beijing, where Chinese leaders constantly express dismay at Chen's independence moves. China, which regards Taiwan as a province that must return to Beijing's rule, has warned it will do whatever it takes to prevent the island from attaining formal independence, including using force. Seeking to portray Chen as the main source of that danger, the Chinese government has gone out of its way to take a friendly stance toward the Nationalist Party, particularly since a history-making visit to China last April by Ma's predecessor as party leader, Lien Chan.

Here in Taiwan, a strong majority has consistently told poll-takers that maintenance of the status quo is the wisest course, expressing unwillingness to embrace reunification but uneasiness about the possibility that a passionate quest for independence could lead to war. A dip in the island's economic growth has added another argument, raising fears that Chen's independence drive is diverting official attention from economic concerns. In casual conversations last week, residents of the capital, Taipei, repeatedly emphasized worries that Chen's priorities were out of balance.

There are signs that these sentiments have caused a shift in the electorate, boding well for Ma's chances in 2008. The Nationalist Party and its allies retained control of the legislature in December 2004 elections, despite wide expectations to the contrary. Elections for city and county councils last December again showed a drop in support for Chen's Democratic Progressive Party. A poll taken the same month showed the president's approval rating down to 21 percent.

Ma, the mayor of Taipei, has the movie-star looks and sleaze-free appeal to capitalize on the new political winds, Taiwanese analysts said, provided nothing blows him off course during the next two years. Women on both sides of the Taiwan Strait especially appreciate him. Hearing that a friend was about to interview Ma, Chen Hui-ting, a 24-year-old college student, said: "Wow, that's so cool to be meeting Ma. Say hi to him for me."

But he has left nothing to chance. To broaden his appeal among Taiwan's native population -- who provide Chen his base -- Ma has been studying Taiwanese dialect and renewing ties to the man he defeated to become Nationalist chairman, Wang Jin-pyng, the parliamentary speaker and a native Taiwanese.

The son of a Nationalist general who came from the mainland with the defeated Chiang Kai-shek in 1949, Ma has been a party activist since his student days. In addition to his pedigree, an elite education and smooth manners propelled him upward. A fluent English speaker, he interpreted for then-President Chiang Ching-kuo when Chiang announced in a 1986 interview with The Washington Post that Taiwan would lift martial law. By age 38, he was appointed to his first cabinet-level post. Ma defeated Chen, who was then Taipei mayor, to win his current job in 1998, the first of two terms.

Ma, educated at New York University and Harvard Law School, will get a chance to convey his views directly to Americans in a visit beginning Monday in New York and including stops in Boston and Washington as well as on the West Coast. The main purpose, he said, is to promote U.S. investment in Taiwan's high-tech industries. But his schedule also includes talks with U.S. officials designed to burnish the résumé of a possible future president.

Despite his promise to smooth relations with China, Ma is likely to face hostile questions in Washington about why his party's legislative majority has blocked an $18.2 billion arms sale proposed by the Bush administration five years ago and pushed without success by Chen. Ma, whose Nationalists have sought a smaller package, said Chen's government had taken "a dangerously wrong course" by focusing on confrontation with China.

Taiwan's president, he said, seems eager to please the "nationalist fundamentalists" at the core of his Democratic Progressive Party and to steer attention away from corruption charges leveled in recent months against some of his top aides. But more broadly, Ma added, Chen appears determined, in his two years remaining in office, to advance as far as possible toward his passionately held goal of Taiwanese independence.

"What the president is doing now is an incremental policy leading toward de jure independence," he said.

Chen's announcement on Feb. 27 that Taiwan's National Unification Council had "ceased to function" was the latest step and not the last, Ma warned. The next move will be revising the Taiwanese constitution in ways that move the island toward formal independence, according to Su Chi, a Nationalist member of the Legislative Yuan, or parliament.

Ma said the Bush administration was unwise to accept Chen's decision on the unification council with only a mild reaction. U.S. and Taiwanese officials had negotiated the language carefully, leading Chen to abandon his stated intention to "abolish" the council in favor of the "ceased to function" formulation. Largely on that basis, the administration accepted Chen's contention that the status quo was not changed by his decision.

But Ma, citing his training as a lawyer, said the Chinese word Chen used in fact means "terminate," which does imply a change in the status quo. In addition, he said, no matter what the language, Chen's decision to stand up and announce the end of an official symbol of willingness to get along with China amounted to provocation.

"The U.S. side looks a little gullible," he said.

Administration Blocks Ex-Hostages' Bid For Damages From Iran (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

At an emotional meeting this month at the State Department, steps from the office of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a group of former American hostages released by Iran a quarter of a century ago, accompanied by lawyers and some relatives, confronted two of Rice's most senior aides.

The families' grievance: Why has the Bush administration, which has labeled Iran one of the world's most dangerous regimes and has called the hostages American heroes, fought their efforts to win damages for their ordeal from the Islamic republic?

The answer is rooted in diplomatic obligations and a wariness about favoring one set of terrorism victims over others. U.S. officials express sympathy for the former hostages. But the administration has thwarted every effort in the courts or in Congress to win a monetary judgment against Iran, even as other victims of Iranian-linked terrorism have secured hundreds of millions of dollars in compensation.

Those attending the March 2 meeting said that Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns and legal adviser John B. Bellinger III tried to keep the discussion civil but that anger spilled over. The wife of a former hostage exclaimed at one point: "You are bloodless!" The meeting broke up with Burns acknowledging the difficulty of the issues and saying he would be open to further discussions.

DOJ_NMG_0018963

But last week the State Department objected when Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Calif.) tried to address the issue in a House bill that would maintain sanctions against Iran for its links to terrorism, forcing the lawmaker to withdraw his proposal.

"We have 52 of our finest Americans who were held hostage," Sherman said. "They go to court, and you know who appears against them? The State Department."

The former hostages have long tried to sue Iran over being blindfolded, tortured and held in dank cells during 444 days in captivity. Earlier lawsuits were dismissed because other countries generally cannot be sued in federal court. But in 1996 Congress amended the foreign sovereign immunity law to allow suits against countries listed as state sponsors of terrorism. The former hostages sued under the new law, seeking $33 billion in compensatory and punitive damages, and won a default judgment against Iran in 2001.

But on the eve of a hearing to consider damages, the Bush administration intervened, saying the suit violated an agreement with Iran that had secured the hostages' release. The judge threw out the suit in 2002 after Congress twice tried to intervene by passing legislation favoring the hostages. The Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal in 2004. Now the former hostages are seeking relief from Congress.

"Every one of us has spoken the same line for 26 years: The Iranians cannot get away with what they did because it sends the wrong message," said Richard H. Morefield, a former hostage and 50-year State Department veteran who was the embassy's consul general when it was seized in 1979 and who still works at State, declassifying records for the archives.

Beyond the plight of these hostages, the case raises difficult issues.

Even if a victim of terrorism wins at trial, it is almost impossible to collect damages. Iran's assets in the United States, for instance, are worth only about $20 million, mainly diplomatic property, according to State Department officials. So Congress in 2000 passed legislation authorizing the payment of $380 million in U.S. Treasury funds to claimants in cases involving 14 victims who were held hostage or killed by Iranian-supported groups such as Hezbollah, according to the Congressional Research Service. Lawmakers ordered the State Department to try to get that money reimbursed by Iran someday.

Other victims of terrorism, however, have received nothing, leading some lawmakers to conclude that it is inequitable -- and costly to U.S. taxpayers -- to carve out exceptions on a piecemeal basis.

"The problem is you have had some greedy lawyers" who have blocked efforts at a comprehensive solution because it would limit a big payout, said Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), who wrote to Rice last month to urge the administration to come up with a "fair, just and equitable system." He said: "You have to have something that cuts the lawyers out."

The administration proposed a plan in 2003 that would have given any victim of terrorism $262,000. But only one hearing was held in the Senate, and the idea has languished, largely because of complaints that the amount was too low.

The former hostages of Iran have benefited from two laws, passed in 1980 and 1986, that among other things gave them tax breaks, paid their educational expenses and provided a "token detention benefit" of $50 for each day in captivity. In bringing a lawsuit, they must overcome the terms of the diplomatic agreement that led to their release but has also put the State Department directly in their path.

The agreement, known as the Algiers Accords, codified the 1981 deal between the United States and Iran under which the hostages were released, billions of dollars in Iranian assets were unfrozen, and an arbitration tribunal was established in the Netherlands to settle claims between the two countries. In the first part of the document, the United States pledged that it "will be the policy of the United States not to intervene, directly or indirectly, politically or militarily, in Iran's internal affairs." Elsewhere, the United States pledged to "bar and preclude" any claims filed by the hostages against Iran.

For the hostages, the situation is rich in irony. The State Department, in legal arguments and on Capitol Hill, has maintained that allowing the hostages' case to go forward will violate the Algiers Accords. But Rice has announced a $75 million plan to bolster democracy in Iran and to foster opposition to the theocracy that controls the country. The hostages say Rice's program violates the prohibition on interfering in Iran's affairs; Iran has also filed a complaint with the United States through the Swiss Embassy, which handles U.S. interests in Tehran.

"This administration has not been shy about breaking international agreements," said Barry Rosen, who was press attache at the U.S. Embassy and who now heads the Afghanistan Education Project at Columbia University's Teachers College. "The administration appears to be in contradiction of itself. It seems to me the Algiers Accords should be dead and buried."

Rosen, angry that others have "laid claim to millions and millions of dollars of compensation," added: "This may sound weird, but if I were made aware of that agreement, I would have stayed in Iran."

U.S. officials say that supporting democracy does not amount to interference under international law. And they say abrogating the Algiers Accords, though not a formal treaty, would be viewed overseas as a serious breach of international norms, harming U.S. interests. U.S. banks and companies have been able to settle claims with Iran because of the accords, while the United States has been forced to pay about $900 million to Iran for contract violations and property damage.

William J. Daugherty, a CIA employee who spent 425 days in solitary confinement during the crisis and is now a college professor, said the State Department is being "deceitful and dishonest." He added that "you can't argue that getting people to rise up against their government is not interfering in a country's affairs." He said that, after taxes, the check he received under the 1986 detention benefit was $17,000. "This came from the U.S. taxpayer, which none of us wanted to happen," he said. "We have always wanted Iran to pay for what it did."

Spokesman J. Adam Ereli said that the State Department supported the 1980 and 1986 measures giving direct benefits to the former hostages and that now the administration favors a "comprehensive program" for victims of international terrorism, including the former hostages.

"These brave people are members of the State Department family and are true heroes," Ereli added. "We are committed to having a full and open discussion about any issues they want to raise, and we will do our best to address them."

Iranian Dissident Released From Jail (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Defiant Journalist's Criticism of Ruling Clerics Remains Untempered

TEHRAN, March 18 -- Iran's most prominent dissident emerged from prison looking far older than his 46 years. His clothes hung on a frame reduced to 108 pounds by repeated hunger strikes. He smiled through a beard grown to the bushy nimbus of a Hindu holy man.

"All the time I was in prison was illegal," Akbar Ganji said of the six-year sentence he served for exposing the government's role in assassinating its critics. "From the very first day it was illegal."

Ganji's incarceration ended at 10 p.m. Friday, when Iranian security services dropped him unannounced at his family's apartment in northwest Tehran. The homecoming, which blossomed Saturday morning into a celebratory news conference as word of his release spread, was a rare moment of cheer for Iranian activists who have been steadily steered to the sidelines by the clerics who regulate Iran's politics from powerful, appointive offices.

Ganji, squeezed into a love seat between his wife and his attorney, faced a living room jammed with buoyant Iranian journalists who have seen more than 100 newspapers closed down since he was jailed for what he wrote in one of them. The bones of his shoulders poked through the fabric of a rayon T-shirt. His forehead was scabbed by sores that suggested poor nutrition.

The persistence with which Ganji defied Iran's ruling clerics made him an international symbol of resistance but also ensured he served his entire sentence. Once freed, he proved unable to heed advice to keep quiet until he could assess the current level of tolerance for dissent in Iran.

"Please don't do anything that will take him off to prison again," said his beaming wife, Masoumeh Shafiei, as visiting neighbors edged through the crush, offering trays of tea and a jumbo box of sticky sweets. Digital shutters burred like cicadas, and attorney Yusef Molaei joked that since his interrogators insisted Ganji had received money from foreigners, they might as well charge photojournalists a fee.

"I was told when I was in prison I was too stubborn to listen to anybody," Ganji said. He sounded almost sincere when he added, "Don't write anything, please."

Self-censorship has become a fact of life for Iran's surviving private press as the country's reform movement has flagged. In 1999, thousands of Iranians marched in the streets to express their outrage at the assassination of dissidents in their homes. Ganji went to prison in 2000 for writing about the killings, but public support for reforms continued to grow. The demonstrations, along with landslide elections of a reformist president and parliament, checked the power of conservatives who insisted that a hard line was essential to protect Iran's theocratic system after the death of its charismatic founder, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

But by 2004, conservatives had regained the upper hand, relieving pressure for social freedoms by greatly relaxing enforcement of laws on personal behavior while steadily reducing the maneuvering room of political reformers and publications that supported them.

Against that unrelenting pressure, Ganji pushed back. From prison, he published a manifesto calling for Iran to discard clerical rule and become a secular republic. When allowed home for a few days' leave, he urged foreign reporters to print statements that made officials visibly blanch.

Other advocates of reform opted against direct confrontation, hoping to nurture progress inside a system that grew steadily more responsive under eight years of reformist administration. Emad Baghi, who like Ganji was jailed for writing about what were known as the "serial murders," served only half of the same sentence. During the extra three years Ganji remained inside as a beacon of defiance, Baghi began a newspaper and, after it was banned, a human rights organization.

"I believe both of the approaches are important for us," said Saeed Bostani, a reporter who worked for Baghi and was jailed for seven months for reporting Ganji's deteriorating medical condition.

"When I was in prison, I believed in Mr. Ganji's approach that refuses to compromise, just go all out," Bostani said. "But since I came out into society, I think Mr. Baghi's approach has merit, that we can put pressure on the state and make changes."

Neither avenue is free of risk. Two of Baghi's associates were jailed for a month by security officials suspicious of their attendance at a human rights workshop in Dubai last year.

"Every day I woke up and said, 'Open your heart, I'm coming home.' It's the Pink Floyd song," said Ali Afsahi, freed this week after 30 days alone in a cell with a light that was never turned off.

Afsahi said his interrogators accused him of accepting money from the Bush administration, which has proposed spending $75 million to promote democracy in Iran. He said he was disturbed to find the Dubai workshop run by Iranian exiles, who he described as out of touch with the subtleties of the country's society.

"Look, with the reformists out of power I got put in prison," Afsahi said, but he was freed after intervention by senior officials who shared his values. "Even though I'm working alone, because the ideas I promote are in touch with the realities of our society, people understand what we are doing."

Late Saturday, eight more prisoners were released, all members of a bus drivers union jailed after striking for more pay. Mohsen Kadivar, a leading reformist cleric, said at least 40 political prisoners remain behind bars.

Iranian Writer Released After Serving 6-Year Prison Term (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

TEHRAN, March 18 — An Iranian writer was released Friday night after serving a six-year sentence on charges brought after he wrote a book that accused government officials of playing a role in the killing of intellectuals.

The case of the writer, Akbar Ganji, 46, drew international attention last summer, when he went on a long hunger strike to force authorities to release him. Mr. Ganji appeared weak and frail at his apartment in Tehran on Saturday, his beard heavy.

He did not make any formal comments to reporters. His lawyer, Youssef Mowlai, said he told Mr. Ganji that he first needed to recuperate from the continuing effects of the hunger strike.

"I have advised him not to give interviews and instead see a doctor and spend time with his family," Mr. Mowlai said. "Anything is possible in Iran and we do not want to cause any sensitivity."

The timing of the release came as a surprise. A judiciary official had said Thursday that Mr. Ganji would not be released until March 30, and a statement by the judiciary on Saturday said Mr. Ganji was on leave for Nowruz, the Iranian New Year.

But Mr. Ganji's wife, Massoumeh Shafiee, said her husband was driven home by prison officials at 10 p.m. on Friday with all his belongings.

"It seems that he has been officially released," she said. "I think they want to close his case."

DOJ_NMG_0018966

Mr. Ganji, who supported the 1979 Islamic revolution and served in the hard-line Revolutionary Guards, later shifted politically. His book linked the killing of 80 dissidents and intellectuals in the late 1990's to senior Iranian officials.

While in jail, he continued his political writings, called for the resignation of the supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and urged voters to boycott the 2005 presidential election. A manifesto, in which he argues that Iran must separate state and religion, is popular among student activists.

Abdullah Momeni, a student leader, said he received more than 100 phone calls and messages about Mr. Ganji's release from elated students.

"Mr. Ganji is very popular among students because of his resistance," he said. "He served his sentence and never showed any sign that he will surrender to pressure and give up his beliefs."

"In addition," he said, "students find their ideas very close to what Mr. Ganji has written and said about a republican system."

Reformist allies and friends gathered at Mr. Ganji's home to welcome and salute him.

Mohsen Kadivar, a midranking cleric who also served 18 months in jail in 1999 and came to greet Mr. Ganji on Saturday, also saluted his perseverance, saying, "Mr. Ganji's resistance shows that jailing activists is not a good way to suppress political dissent."

Suppose We Just Let Iran Have The Bomb (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON

PRESIDENT BUSH'S message to Iran these days sounds unambiguous: The United States will do what it takes to keep the mullahs from getting the bomb. Diplomacy is vastly preferred, President Bush and his aides insist. Yet it was no accident that the just-revised National Security Strategy declares: "This diplomatic effort must succeed if confrontation is to be avoided."

To nervous allies, those words echo the run-up to the Iraq invasion, which began three years ago today. But Iran is not Iraq. And some experts in the United States — mostly outside the administration — have been thinking the unthinkable, or at least the undiscussable: If all other options are worse, could the world learn to live with a nuclear Iran?

"The reality is that most of us think the Iranians are probably going to get a weapon, or the technology to make one, sooner or later," an administration official acknowledged a few weeks ago, refusing to talk on the record because such an admission amounts to a concession that dragging Iran in front of the United Nations Security Council may prove an exercise in futility. "The optimists around here just hope we can delay the day by 10 or 20 years, and that by that time we'll have a different relationship with a different Iranian government."

A roll of the dice, for sure. Yet is the risk greater than it was when other countries — from the Soviet Union and China to India and Pakistan — defied the United States to join the nuclear club?

And could deterrence, containment and cool calculation of national interest work to restrain Iran as it worked to restrain America and its competitors during the cold war? Or is that false comfort?

"We've lived with Iran as a terror threat for a generation," says Stephen Biddle, the senior fellow for defense policy at the Council on Foreign Relations, making the case that containment could work again. "Iran has a return address, and states with a return address can be retaliated against."

As for concerns that an Iranian nuclear capability would touch off a Middle East arms race, with Egypt and Saudi Arabia trying to join the club, the West would most likely head them off, said Barry R. Posen, a political science professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in a Feb. 27 article on The New York Times Op-Ed page. Israel, he said, might finally acknowledge publicly that it has nuclear weapons. But everyone already knows about this capability.

What of the fear that Iran might pass a weapon to Hezbollah or to Al Qaeda in Iraq? Those arguing for a containment strategy say Iran knows that the origins of any detonated bomb would be traced sooner or later, so the mullahs would not be foolish enough to trust proxies with such a weapon.

The Bush administration rejects all such arguments as near madness, especially since Mahmoud Ahmadinejad became Iran's president.

"Accommodating a nuclear armed Iran is not in our interests," says R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs who will be at the Security Council today to argue for a clear warning to Iran and then a steady escalation of pressure to force it to give up any ability to enrich uranium. "Given the radical nature of Iran under Ahmadinejad and its stated wish to wipe Israel off the map of the world," Mr. Burns continued, "it is entirely unconvincing that we could or should live with a nuclear Iran."

The two views of the Iran threat boil down to this: if Iran is simply a new example of a 60-year-old problem, then classic containment should work in 2016 the way it worked in 1956. But traditional deterrence strategy will not work if Iran is one of the first nightmares of a second nuclear age — in which weapons are pieced together by agents working in the shadows and supplied by networks of private entrenpreneurs like Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani nuclear engineer who gave the Iranian nuclear program its start.

In this new era, the argument goes, the best way to head off an attack is to prevent loosely controlled (or devious) countries from acquiring the makings of nuclear bombs in the first place. If an attack is staged not from a missile silo but from a basement or a cargo container, it will take time to pinpoint who deserves the blame. By then, the human cost is already too high and retaliation is no longer certain.

The debate is likely to play out for much of the year, based on a series of guesses about Iran's true intentions, and its capabilities. The list of unknowables is long. They range from the technical to the political, from how long it will take Iran's scientists to get their centrifuges running to who will ultimately prevail in Iran's seemingly endless internal battle over its relationship to the Westernized world.

But getting this right requires projecting what happens to America, Israel and Europe, especially if Iran's power to send the price of oil skyrocketing is enhanced by the confidence that a nuclear arsenal can bring.

The Iranians know exactly what the bomb would make them: the dominant regional power in the Middle East. Iran would become, in a stroke, more powerful than the Saudis, an even greater influence than it is today over a Shiite-controlled Iraq and, arguably, as powerful as Israel. And the better Iran's missile technology becomes, the greater its influence and ability to blackmail.

Bush administration officials who have reviewed the classified assessments of Iran's next moves worry that it would not even have to build a complete bomb to gain leverage. It would just have to make a credible case that it could assemble a weapon on short notice. "For their political needs, that would be enough," said Gary Samore, who was a nonproliferation official in the Clinton administration.

That explains why the Americans have been so adamant about not allowing Iran to conduct even experimental uranium-enrichment technology on its soil, even if it has a right to do so as a signer of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. It may also explain why the Iranians are so insistent that they will never give up that right.

The Iranians also know that history suggests they have a good chance of reaching their goal. This is not the first time the Americans have declared that another nation cannot be allowed to unlock the secrets of the atom — and then learned to live with the risk when it did.

In the mid-1960's, President Lyndon Johnson contemplated pre-emptive strikes against sites where China had nuclear installations. "Many today forget that Stalin's Soviet Union and Mao Zedong's China were seen as more threatening in both capabilities and intentions than are today's mullahs in Tehran," Richard K. Betts, a professor of political science at Columbia University, wrote in the most recent issue of The National Interest.

In both cases, though, what seemed at the time like a life-threatening menace morphed into a manageable threat — partly because containment worked, and partly because Soviet and Chinese leaders made shrewd assessments of their real strategic interests.

Both, however, are somewhat flawed comparisons: Iran is no superpower. The cases of Pakistan, India and North Korea may be more instructive.

When Pakistan and India set off tests and countertests in 1998, Washington tried to punish both. That effort didn't extend past 9/11. Mr. Bush needed both countries too much. Today Pakistan is a "major non-NATO ally" with a nuclear force that many in Washington still fear could fall into the wrong hands in the event of a coup. Last month, President Bush gave India the ultimate blessing, agreeing to seek an exemption from Congress that would allow the United States to sell India fuel for its civilian nuclear plants.

Even more to the point is the case of North Korea. As in the case of Iran, Mr. Bush has said the United States cannot "tolerate" North Korea as a nuclear power. But Washington is already tolerating exactly that. John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, told Congress recently that intelligence officials assume that North Korea is telling the truth when it boasts it has produced enough nuclear fuel for several weapons. But no one — least of all its closest neighbors, China and South Korea — dare push it to the brink. They have learned to live with the status quo.

The Iranians are betting that this confrontation — what Graham Allison, a nuclear expert at Harvard, calls a "slow motion Cuban missile crisis" — has a good chance of coming out the same way. If so, the problem may go beyond Iran.

"Remember, Iran is just one instance of the problem, and in Iran's case, containment might work," says Brent Scowcroft, who was the national security adviser to Mr. Bush's father. "But if that happens, I think we are on the way to a world of proliferation like we have not seen before."

Hamas Completes Lineup For Palestinian Ministries (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 18 — The militant Islamic group Hamas said Saturday that it had completed its lineup for a new Palestinian cabinet and would present it Sunday to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, for his approval. An aide to Mr. Abbas said he was likely to give his approval.

"Our cabinet is ready," Ismail Haniya, the Hamas leader and prime minister-designate, told a news conference in Gaza City.

Mr. Haniya declined to provide names of the cabinet nominees, though he said Hamas members, independents and technocrats would be included. However, no other Palestinian political parties have announced their intention to participate despite Hamas's invitation to join.

The crucial question now is whether Mr. Abbas will support the Hamas-led cabinet. If he rejects it, his decision could lead to a political crisis, and Palestinian law is not clear on how it would be resolved.

Mr. Abbas has called on Hamas to accept previous agreements with Israel and the possibility of negotiations with the Jewish state. Hamas has always opposed these positions.

Still, a spokesman for Mr. Abbas, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, told Reuters he did not believe that Mr. Abbas would reject the list from Hamas, which won an outright majority in parliamentary elections in January.

Mr. Abbas, known as Abu Mazen, traveled from the West Bank to Gaza on Saturday and planned to meet Hamas leaders in Gaza City on Sunday.

Hamas has until March 28 to form a new cabinet, meaning that Mr. Abbas and Hamas could still negotiate in the coming days. "We are committed to the principle of cooperation with Abu Mazen and a dialogue with all the Palestinian factions," Mr. Haniya said.

Last month, Hamas chose Mr. Haniya, 42, to be the prime minister, and he has been working on choosing a cabinet. While the names have not been formally announced, Hamas appears set to put its own members in the most important posts.

Dr. Mahmoud Zahar, a surgeon, is expected to be named foreign minister. Dr. Zahar speaks English and often deals with the foreign media. Considered a hard-liner, he is often confrontational in his public comments, in contrast to Mr. Haniya, who comes across as less radical.

Said Siam, a Hamas lawmaker from Gaza, is considered the likely choice to lead the Interior Ministry, which controls the police and other security agencies. Mr. Abbas will also control some security forces.

Omar Abdel-Razeq, a Hamas member and an economics professor from the West Bank, is expected to be appointed finance minister. He was arrested by Israel a few months ago and released this past week.

In the Jan. 25 Palestinian election, Hamas won 74 of the 132 parliamentary seats, so it does not need any partners to form a government.

DOJ_NMG_0018969

Hamas has invited other Palestinian factions to join it in the interest of Palestinian unity. But it was still not clear on Saturday whether any other factions would be taking part. Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement, the dominant Palestinian faction for decades, has said it would not join.

Salah Bardawil, a recently elected Hamas lawmaker, said the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, which won three parliamentary seats, was prepared to join. But Jamil Majdalawi, one of the Popular Front's legislators, said it had not made a final decision.

Israel seized five members of the Popular Front, including its leader, Ahmed Saadat, in a raid on Tuesday on a Palestinian jail in the West Bank town of Jericho. The Popular Front had claimed responsibility for the 2001 assassination of an Israeli cabinet minister, and Israel says the five orchestrated the shooting.

Under a deal reached in 2002, the Palestinians agreed to jail the five rather than hand them over to Israel. Israel said it took the men on Tuesday because it believed Hamas was preparing to release them. Israel labels Hamas a terrorist group and says it will not deal with a Palestinian Authority led by Hamas.

In another development on Saturday, an Israeli military official said the army was investigating the circumstances surrounding the shooting death of a 10-year-old Palestinian girl, Akber Zayed, who was killed Friday night during an Israeli incursion into the West Bank village of Yamoun. Palestinians in the village said she was shot when soldiers fired on the taxi in which she was riding.

Hamas Says It Has Formed A Cabinet (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

JERUSALEM — Hamas announced Saturday that it had formed a Palestinian government but acknowledged that it had been unable to attract coalition partners whose presence might have made dealings with the Islamist group more palatable to the outside world.

The group refrained from formally announcing its Cabinet lineup pending its presentation to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who was expected to travel to the Gaza Strip today for meetings with the Hamas leadership.

But Hamas officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said key positions would go to Hamas loyalists such as firebrand Mahmoud Zahar, who has been designated foreign minister.

Other senior appointees include lawmaker Said Siyam, who is considered a relative moderate, as interior minister, and economics professor Omar Abdel Razeq, who was jailed at the time of January's parliamentary elections, as finance minister.

"We respect [other] parties' decision not to join the Cabinet," Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister-designate, said at a news conference in Gaza.

Israeli officials declined to comment on the prospective Cabinet lineup, saying they would wait until it was formalized. But one senior official scoffed at the notion that Israel would have any dealings with Zahar, a hard-liner whom it has repeatedly tried to assassinate.

In the wake of its upset victory in the Jan. 25 elections, Hamas wrestled with the question of whether to form a government weighted toward outsiders in order to leave open the possibility of maintaining at least indirect contacts with Israel.

The idea of a broad-based government went by the wayside, however, because more militant elements within the group insisted it must not back down from its stated goal of Israel's destruction.

That unyielding stance, plus unrelated antagonisms with other Palestinian factions, appeared to have driven off any potential coalition partners, although the radical Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine was said to still be deliberating whether to accept some junior Cabinet posts.

Haniyeh, speaking to reporters in Gaza, sought to calm fears that Israel and the United States would now intensify efforts to isolate the Palestinian government.

"We have no doubt of success in the Cabinet's responsibilities for running Palestinian affairs," he said. "Those Palestinians who granted us their trust will never starve or be deprived."

DOJ_NMG_0018970

Most Western countries have threatened to cut off or severely curtail aid to a Hamas-dominated Palestinian government. Hamas, which Israel, the United States and the European Union consider a terrorist organization, carried out dozens of suicide attacks during the five-year Palestinian uprising, or intifada, but has largely adhered to a truce over the last year.

The makeup of the Cabinet appeared to dash hopes on the part of Abbas, who was elected a year before the vote that brought Hamas to power and has broad authority of his own, that Hamas might moderate its views sufficiently to avoid an aid and diplomatic boycott.

Abbas must approve the Cabinet lineup before it can be put before parliament. He is expected to try to delay that step until after Israel's parliamentary elections, scheduled for March 28.

Left To Rot In Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Strip's Economy Suffers as Trade Passage to Israel Remains Sealed

NETZARIM, Gaza Strip -- The harvest is underway inside a row of greenhouses here on the grounds of a razed Israeli settlement. But most of the tomatoes and sweet peppers, usually shipped to European markets, will rot in a nearby ravine.

"We keep getting it, but we don't know what to do with it," said Abdul Fatah al-Eilah, the greenhouse manager, as workers stacked boxes of vegetables in a storage shed while tractors towing flatbeds full of produce lined up to enter.

The main trade passage between the Gaza Strip and Israel has been closed for much of the year, despite an agreement brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in November that required Israel to "ensure the continued opportunity to export." Israeli security concerns, heightened by Hamas's parliamentary victory in January and the almost daily rocket fire from Gaza, have rendered the deal largely moot.

To protect Gaza's small farmers from competition by Eilah's Palestine Economic Development Corp. and its 1,000 acres of greenhouses, the corporation is barred from selling its produce locally. But without regular access to the outside world, the corporation has had to donate some produce to local charities and dump the rest. Losses so far add up to millions of dollars.

"The government will likely have to give this away," Eilah said of an operation once considered the key to Gaza's economic future.

The lost harvest is the most recognizable sign of Gaza's declining fortunes six months after Israel's evacuation. It is also a telling indicator of Israel's evolving policy toward the Palestinian territories as Hamas, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement and at war with the Jewish state, prepares to take political power.

Unreliable trade passages, frozen Israeli tax transfers that helped pay salaries and lapsed permits of Palestinians who work in Israel are evidence of a broader disengagement, one that Israeli security officials say they hope to accelerate once Hamas installs its cabinet this month.

The Israeli defense establishment plans to resurrect a proposal to ban thousands of Palestinian workers from Israel, seal trade passages and end utility services once the Palestinian Authority has arranged alternative sources. Behind the push is the belief, promoted by senior security officials, that Hamas's election has made it all but impossible to sustain economic and political relations with the Palestinian territories, at least in the near term.

Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, whose Kadima party is far ahead in opinion polls heading into Israel's March 28 elections, chose another approach to the caretaker Palestinian government last month. But Olmert has said he may adopt a stricter policy after Hamas assumes control of the Palestinian ministries.

That will happen at about the time Israel concludes its own election, which is shaping up as a referendum on Olmert's proposal to withdraw unilaterally from parts of the West Bank. Olmert has said he intends to draw Israel's final borders over the course of his four-year term, consolidating scattered Jewish settlements in the West Bank into larger blocs on the side of a separation barrier that Israel intends to keep.

Carrying out that move, designed to ensure the longevity of a Jewish majority inside Israel's final boundaries, would also entail the economic separation now quickening in Gaza. A World Bank assessment last week said frozen tax transfers, trade restrictions and future reductions in foreign aid would result in "a one-year contraction of economic activity equivalent to a deep depression," warning that per capita income in the territories would fall 30 percent this year.

As those sources dry up in Gaza, an economy dependent on public salaries, agriculture and foreign aid to sustain its 1.3 million people is already lifeless. Regular rocket fire into southern Israel, carried out by the radical group Islamic Jihad, has turned the northern strip into an artillery range. Prices have soared in stores as the supply of flour, sugar and dairy products that come from Israel is constantly interrupted.

"The thing we get most is the horror," said Ibrahim Harb, an unemployed father of 10 in the village of Um el-Nasser. "There is a panic here."

The village, alive with rowdy children one recent morning, sits on the edge of an area in the northern strip that Israel has designated a no-go zone. An Israeli artillery shell whistled high above the Harbs' sandy street, followed by a nearby bang. The children didn't pause from their play.

Among dunes in the near distance, a pair of tires mark a makeshift border. Israel declared the area beyond the tires off-limits in order to have a freer hand in targeting Palestinian fighters who launch crude rockets from there toward the smokestacks of the Ashkelon power plant in the middle distance. Earlier in the day, gunmen from Islamic Jihad had done just that.

"We want them to do this far from us," Harb said. "We live here, and we'll be the first ones harmed."

Until last month, Harb was one of the fortunate 4,000 or so Palestinians with a permit to work in Israel, where wages are higher. When his permit expired in February, it was not renewed, as the Israeli government reduces the Palestinian workforce. Harb's family gets by with help from a Hamas-run charity.

"You sit here, there is nothing, so you go inside," said Harb's 68-year-old father, Mohammed, passing a stormy morning on a bench. "That's it."

The Karni crossing, the main trade passage between Israel and Gaza, is nearby. This year, the crossing has been closed more often than not because of Israeli security concerns. A U.N. humanitarian assessment estimated that the 21-day closure that ended in February cost more than $10 million.

The Israeli military opened Karni 10 days ago for several hours a day to allow essential supplies into Gaza, but closed the crossing Tuesday. It has not reopened, and its future remains unclear, even though the Bush administration has paid to upgrade security, including state-of-the-art cargo scanners.

Nasser Jaber, director of the Palestinian Industrial Estates and Free Zone Authority at Karni, has little to do these days. He manages the compound of 30 factories adjacent to the crossing, a complex built in part with U.S. development money. A U.S.-funded security fence was being installed at the time of Hamas's election. That project and other U.S. development work in the territories have been suspended.

Jaber said Israel has closed Karni to move the main crossing to the Kerem Shalom terminal in the south, far from the strip's economic center. On Friday, Israeli defense officials said Kerem Shalom would be opened on Sunday. "This industrial park was invented by the Americans," Jaber said. "Now look at it. Things are being done you can't understand."

At a furniture factory inside one of the long corrugated-steel sheds on the grounds, 17 of 50 employees were still at work finishing stacks of living room chairs. There is no wood to begin new orders, all placed by Israeli companies.

"This will stop soon, too," said Yusef Ahmed, 27, a father of four children from the Jabaliya refugee camp. "Then we don't know what we'll do."

At Netzarim, where most of the Jewish settlement's structures were demolished during last year's evacuation, scavengers still come in hopes that the piles of concrete blocks bristling with wires and weeds may hold something of value. Beneath where homes once stood, a small canyon has become the dumping ground for export-quality peppers and tomatoes from the Palestine Economic Development Corp.

The company, formed to manage the greenhouses that were bought with international funds on behalf of the Palestinians, is nearly bankrupt. Amid al-Masri, the project manager, said he will recommend that the business be closed and its 4,000 workers laid off at the end of the month if Karni is not opened soon.

Even if it is, Masri said, the failure of the November agreement to keep the crossing running has cost him future investors he counted on to develop the greenhouse operation. He estimated that the closures have cost him more than $6 million.

"The worst time to make a decision is during moments of chaos," Masri said. "And right now we're in such a moment."

On Eve Of Vote, Belarus Braces For Aftermath (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 18 — There are no campaign posters or billboards here, not even for President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, who has otherwise thoroughly orchestrated his re-election to a third term on Sunday.

The security services barred campaigning in the city's center. Handing out leaflets — even possessing them — risks arrest. Dozens have already been jailed in the prelude to the vote, some of them senior campaign workers for the democratic opposition.

The results of the election on Sunday, widely denounced here and abroad as undemocratic, are a foregone conclusion. But the vote is only a prelude to the real struggle against Mr. Lukashenko's government, one that many fear could end in violent reprisals along the monumental streets of Minsk, the capital.

A text message sent to Belarussian mobile phones on Saturday, from an unknown sender, carried an ominous warning about what might unfold on Minsk's central square. "On the evening of March 19, 2006, on October Square, provocateurs are preparing bloodshed," said the message, apparently intended to discourage attendance. "Protect your life and health."

In an attempt to replicate the popular uprising against a rigged presidential election in Ukraine in 2004, two opposition candidates, Aleksandr Milinkevich and Aleksandr V. Kazulin, have called on their supporters to assemble Sunday night to protest what they denounced as a chimera of a democratic process. They have done so in defiance of a ban on Election Day rallies and threats that those who gather could face charges of terrorism.

"We will stay for 24 hours," said Alyaksei Yanukevich, a close aide of Mr. Milinkevich's, describing a plan to occupy the square in peaceful protest. "If on Monday night there are more people than on Sunday, then that means the process will continue."

What might happen after that, he could not say. Mr. Lukashenko vowed to crush any protests, warning Belarussians not to participate and foreign governments not to encourage them.

"We know where they met, whom they met with and what discussions they had," Mr. Lukashenko said during remarks made at an auto factory in Zhodino on Friday, according to the Interfax news agency. "God forbid that they should try to perpetrate something in the country. We will twist off their heads as though they are ducklings."

The United States and European Union have warned of sanctions. In Washington, the White House released a report on Friday that accused Mr. Lukashenko of having created "a repressive dictatorship on the doorstep of the European Union and NATO."

The report, citing news accounts and critics, accused him of personally enriching himself and asserted that he was "likely among the most corrupt leaders in the world."

Mr. Lukashenko, already shunned in the West, has responded with defiance as the election campaign unfolded. The arrests of opposition workers and the restrictions on public events "have limited the scope for a vibrant election campaign," the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said in a report based on the findings of its observers here.

The most prominent independent newspaper, Narodnaya Volya, or People's Will, had 250,000 issues seized on March 3 as they were being delivered from a printer in Smolensk, Russia. On Monday, the printer suddenly annulled the paper's contract, said the editor, Iosif Seredich.

He found another printer in Russia, but after Tuesday's copies were seized, he shut down the newspaper, one of the last public forums available to the opposition candidates.

"There is no sense," he said.

Mr. Lukashenko himself forswore campaigning. He has instead carried on with official duties, which state television has extensively covered while it has ignored the opposition except to criticize it.

DOJ_NMG_0018973

One of his campaign managers, Vladimir Gostyukhin, declined a request to be interviewed. He said that he was very busy, and that he would vote early on Saturday — a widespread practice that Mr. Lukashenko's critics warn would be used to rig the results in the absence of observers — and then leave Minsk.

On Friday night, Mr. Lukashenko gave a short, televised address. He urged people to vote, defended his government from accusations of authoritarianism and reassured viewers that there would be no coup.

"The fact that four candidates are taking part in the ongoing election campaign is also evidence of democracy in this country," he said in remarks transcribed by the BBC. (In addition to Mr. Milinkevich and Mr. Kazulin, a fourth candidate, Sergei Gaydukevich, is a Lukashenko supporter.)

"Some candidates insistently call on people to take to the streets if the results of the vote are not in their favor," he added. "Is this their understanding of democracy? It is unrest, pogroms and violence?"

His opponents vowed only peaceful demonstrations. "I beg you to come out with smiles and flowers and balloons," Mr. Kazulin, who was beaten and detained during a confrontation with security officers on March 2, told an overflowing crowd of hundreds in a tattered movie theater on the edge of Minsk on Friday night. "Take chocolates or sweets and give them to the police."

The rally was the first joint appearance for Mr. Kazulin, a former university rector, and Mr. Milinkevich, a former physics professor who is the more prominent opposition candidate, representing a coalition of 10 parties. The audience erupted into chants of "Long live Belarus."

"The mood of the people now is different," Mr. Milinkevich said when asked about the expected announcement of an overwhelming victory for the president. "The people will laugh now, and that is what the authorities are most afraid of."

Beyond those who attend opposition events, fear remains pervasive. People asked about the election invariably refused to give their names. "Are they filming?" a middle-aged woman asked near Victory Square. She had no doubt about the outcome, she said, because she had no illusion about democracy here.

"Like Fidel Castro, he will be president forever," she said and hurried off.

The democratic changes in Ukraine — as well as in Georgia in 2003 and Kyrgyzstan in 2005 — inspired many here, but Mr. Lukashenko's government took note, too. In December, his government enacted new laws increasing criminal penalties for organizing the sort of public protest now being planned.

"He analyzed very well the mistakes made by Shevardnadze and Kuchma," said Igor Marinich, referring to former leaders of Georgia and Ukraine whose autocratic governments were swept aside by protests. He is the son of Mikhail Marinich, an opposition leader who was jailed in 2004, the first of what he predicted then would be a wave of politically motivated arrests.

"And they," he added, "were not the dictators he is."

Belarus President Expected To Win Reelection (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Despite suppression of media and opposition, a poll shows Lukashenko getting a third term. Democracy groups vow to demand honesty.

MINSK, Belarus — Those who missed the highlights of American history in their civics class had only to turn on the television last week in Belarus, a small nation on Europe's eastern border where old Soviet-era propaganda machines are kept lovingly lubricated.

The program, "America Without Makeup," described Richard Nixon's attempt to bug Democratic campaign offices in 1972, Ronald Reagan's covert sale of weapons to Iran, the Pentagon's arming of Iraq and murky hints of conspiracy behind the deaths of Robert Kennedy and Marilyn Monroe.

"It's not for nothing that people say democracy demands sacrifice," a narrator commented wryly. "Money doesn't smell — that's the main principle of American democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0018974

Here in Belarus, President Alexander G. Lukashenko has a stake in giving democracy a black eye: The U.S. government is spending more than $9 million a year here on attempts to develop a sophisticated political opposition and a well-informed electorate, tools for combating one of the most repressive dictatorships in the world.

Voters go to the polls today for an election that is widely expected to hand Lukashenko, Belarus' president since 1994, a third five-year term. In echoes of recent revolutions in Ukraine and Georgia, the opposition plans to muster thousands in the streets to demand a free election.

Belarus state security, still known as the KGB, threatened Monday to charge protesters "who try to destabilize the situation" with terrorism. That prompted an immediate protest from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which has sent observers to monitor the balloting.

"I am particularly shocked … that peaceful demonstrators could face charges of terrorism, carrying a sentence of eight years' imprisonment to the death penalty," OSCE Chairman Karel De Gucht, the Belgian foreign minister, said in a statement Friday. "Is that a way to conduct democratic elections?"

"We haven't seen such a politicization of people since perestroika," said opposition candidate Alexander Milinkevich, referring to the era that preceded the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. "The reason is not socioeconomic. It's a moral protest. People don't want to live in fear and humiliation. I call it a revolution of the spirit."

Lukashenko's government has all but shut down the independent media, arrested hundreds of opposition campaign activists, kicked and beaten one presidential contender during a campaign rally, expelled students and reportedly fired state workers who did not toe an ideological line that reads like a reissue of the Communist-era Pravda. The KGB has been accused of operating secret death squads responsible for some of the disappearances and deaths of half a dozen journalists, businessmen and political opponents since 1999.

Why, then, does a recent InterMedia poll show Lukashenko drawing an easy 52.9% of the vote, far ahead of his rivals?

Belarus officials say it is because they have succeeded in doing what the conventional wisdom in the West says is not possible: maintaining a state-run economy with one of the strongest growth rates in Europe, generating increases in wages and pensions, boosting productivity and minimizing the disparities in wealth that have destabilized so many of the former Soviet republics in their transition to market economies.

State-owned oil refineries here buy Russian oil and sell its products to Europe at a hefty profit. Collective farms abound and have been merged with profitable enterprises, such as tractor companies, to bring their balance sheets out of the red. Unemployment is officially at 1.5%, although thousands more may simply be unregistered.

The World Bank does not know quite what to make of the model, but said in a November report that it wouldn't last without major reforms.

Advocates of overhaul say the entire economy is operating on the good graces of neighbor Russia, which buys large quantities of Belarusian goods and sells natural gas to its closest ally at subsidies worth an estimated $3 billion a year.

Still, many Belarusians say they are ready to vote again for Lukashenko, if only for the sake of stability and his pledge that the government will keep paying pensions and salaries on time.

"People want to live quietly. They want stability, they want jobs, they want their children to walk safely in the streets," said Yelena Yeseyeva, 40, a bookkeeper at a state-owned communal services company. "I think the president has chosen the right way."

Yet support for Milinkevich, a U.S.-educated physicist chosen by a broad coalition of pro-democracy parties, and Alexander Kozulin, a former university rector and leader of the Social Democratic Party, has grown among Belarusians who say the nation's economic gains are illusory and its growing climate of repression intolerable.

"These are myths they're talking about. Simply myths. Yes, in Belarus there are no pension arrears. But if a pension in Russia were as small as it is in Belarus, it would be paid on time too," said Svetlana Kalinkina, managing editor of Narodnaya Volya, the last remaining independent daily in Belarus.

Milinkevich has drawn crowds of several thousand throughout Belarus, despite arrests and beatings.

DOJ_NMG_0018975

Opposition candidates were allowed to make addresses on state-run television and radio, but their remarks were censored. The omitted remarks were aired as part of a new 24-hour-a-day radio broadcast into the country, European Radio for Belarus, that began Feb. 26 with a $2.4-million grant from the European Commission.

U.S.-funded organizations such as the National Democratic Institute and the International Republican Institute, banned in Belarus, have set up shop in neighboring Ukraine and Lithuania. From there, they offer a democracy primer to activists, women and youths, which the Belarus government calls a covert attempt by the West to engineer an overthrow of the regime.

"When it comes to foreign financing of the political processes inside the country, we, as any other country in the world, do not welcome that … in the same way the U.S. doesn't welcome that, in fact prohibits it, according to federal laws," said Foreign Minister Sergei Martynov.

In an interview, Martynov said the United States may fear "the emergence of an entity in the area of the former Soviet Union which will be in a position to challenge the United States," and said Belarus' growing economic union with Russia could be perceived as such a threat.

"We're not trying to resurrect the former Soviet Union, it would have been stupid and unrealistic." Opposition leaders say that getting out their message in Belarus is next to impossible without outside help. In recent years, the government has prevented the few remaining independent newspapers from printing in Belarus, and when they began printing at a private press in Russia, the government prohibited sales at kiosks and distribution through the mail.

Publishers of Narodnaya Volya found volunteers to handdeliver the paper in all major cities of Belarus, but this month, authorities stopped the trucks bringing the paper into the country and seized all the copies.

"What's happening now is totally unprecedented, even for the entire rule of Lukashenko. Everybody is under KGB surveillance, telephones are bugged. If in the past they would interrogate people when they were detained on the street, now they send official invitations to parents to bring their children in and answer questions," said Irina Toustsik, an activist with the underground youth movement Zubr.

At campaign rallies last week in southeastern Belarus, Milinkevich urged citizens to imagine a future in which jobs are not dependent on loyalty to the government, small entrepreneurs can flourish and losing state businesses give way to more productive private enterprises.

"The entire world is getting integrated, and we're being self-isolated," he told supporters in Mazyr.

Outside the hall, Ivan Kovalenko, 64, a retired oil company employee, said he was ready for an alternative to Lukashenko.

"What right direction for the country can you talk about if people are scared, if they're being persecuted?" he said. "The only hope is that the number of people who begin to understand, who begin to see things in a proper light, is growing. And I am an example of such people."

Keeping The Opposition In Check, If Not In Jail (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Though Favored to Win Today's Vote, Belarus Leader Uses Fear as Tactic

MINSK, Belarus, March 18 -- Syrghei Marchyk, a 20-year-old former law student, has been running from the law since being charged recently with "unsanitary practices." He said he could only guess that an arrest warrant was issued for him because he was spotted putting up posters for Alexander Milinkevich, an opposition candidate in the presidential election here Sunday.

The last couple of months have been tough for Marchyk. In February, he was expelled from law school for "disciplinary problems." He said the action resulted from his political activities against the incumbent president, Alexander Lukashenko. Before his expulsion, he was briefly jailed for silently holding candles on a street with about 20 other young people to commemorate four government opponents who are missing and presumed dead. The authorities called it an unsanctioned rally.

"This may sound a little pathetic, but I love my country and I want to fight for my motherland," Marchyk said. "If I have to wait for a change of regime to continue my studies, I'll wait."

Dissent carries a real price in this country of 10 million people, sandwiched between the European Union and Russia, where Lukashenko has ordered that no one other than Lukashenko can be called "president." Hundreds of presidents of companies, clubs and associations have had to change their titles.

Opposition activists say students who step out of line often receive failing grades or face trumped-up disciplinary charges that lead to expulsion from school. State workers, who commonly have one-year contracts, are routinely dismissed if they question the president's rule. Political activists are arrested and sometimes beaten. Independent newspapers are shut down or lose an entire edition to police seizures.

"We will wring their necks as one might a duck," Lukashenko, 51, said Friday while touring an auto plant, referring to unnamed opponents he said were planning a coup. The head of the KGB, as the security service is still called in this former Soviet republic, said this week that people who protest the outcome of the election could face the death penalty.

"There are two problems in Belarus: The first is fear and the second is apathy," Milinkevich, 58, a physics professor, said in an interview at a campaign stop. "We can ruin apathy at least. Fear is more difficult."

The repression, activists say, is designed to prevent the emergence of a strong opposition to Lukashenko, a former collective farm manager who came to office as a reformer in 1994 and has ruthlessly centralized power since. Members of his inner circle have declined to be interviewed, but analysts say they are particularly anxious about preventing the kind of popular revolt that toppled post-communist governments in Ukraine and Georgia.

What makes Lukashenko more than an average autocrat is that he is genuinely popular with a significant segment of the population -- people who value the modest but secure life that the state-controlled economy offers. Lukashenko plausibly could win a free and fair election, the opposition concedes.

According to a recent survey by Washington-based InterMedia, Lukashenko will receive at least 52.9 percent of the vote and looks set to win in the first round Sunday, avoiding a runoff. Milinkevich is projected to get 6 percent.

Lukashenko also faces Alexander Kozulin, a former rector of Belarusan State University who was once close to the president, and Syarhey Haydukevich, seen by political analysts as a Lukashenko ally whose role is to create the appearance of competition. The InterMedia poll of 1,085 Belarusans gave Kozulin 4.7 percent and Haydukevich 0.5 percent.

About 17 percent said they were undecided. Others declined to answer or said they would not vote. Polls sanctioned by the government show Lukashenko winning at least 60 percent of the vote.

Andrei Vardomatskii, a Belarusan pollster, said in an interview that the climate of fear in the country causes many people to say publicly that they will vote for Lukashenko. That results in an overestimate of his support in polls by at least 10 percent, meaning he probably could not secure a first-round victory in a fair vote, Vardomatskii said.

But there is no question that Lukashenko remains popular among many Belarusans. In a historically brutalized country -- as much as one-third of the population was killed during World War II, and the Chernobyl nuclear disaster of 1986 in Ukraine blighted a large swath of the Belarusan countryside -- stability is a value that can trump liberty.

"I don't love him like an idol, but during his time many positive changes have occurred," said Natalia Kazachenko, 52, who retired from her job as a kindergarten director last year. She said her pension was generous and stable, allowing her to vacation in Egypt and remodel her apartment. Kazachenko said she was also happy that both her sons had free educations, followed by secure jobs as construction engineers. Her eldest, who is 30, just bought his own apartment, she said proudly.

"People have something to lose with change," Kazachenko said, adding that her entire family would vote for Lukashenko.

Through his absolute control of the broadcast media, Lukashenko has warned repeatedly of chaos if the opposition, which is demonized as a puppet of the West, should ever gain political power. The dislocation, emigration and poverty caused by the transition to capitalism in the neighboring Baltic states and Poland is a constant Lukashenko theme.

The political divide is as generational as it is ideological. At a rally this week in the industrial city of Zhodino, about 50 miles northeast of the capital, Minsk, younger members of the audience enthusiastically welcomed Milinkevich. But he received glowers from older people, many of them local bureaucrats, who emulated the state media by portraying him as a Western stooge of uncertain background and values.

"Why didn't your son serve in the military?" one man asked during a question and answer session.

"Because he has a serious kidney condition," Milinkevich replied.

DOJ_NMG_0018977

As Milinkevich spoke, three of his local campaign workers were sitting in jail. Police would not say what they were charged with.

In the interview, Milinkevich said he was not running to win -- not this time. The goal of his campaign, he said, is to raise the possibility of an alternative to Lukashenko as president for life. In 2004, in a referendum that outside observers condemned as rigged, the country adopted a constitutional amendment that lifted the two-term limit for presidents.

Kozulin said in an interview that he entered the race to siphon off disaffected voters, particularly among state workers, who would never support Milinkevich in part because he is a favorite of students and the well-educated.

Both Kozulin and Milinkevich said the president's control of the media has limited their ability to present their ideas to the electorate. The 55-nation Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe found that more than 94 percent of news broadcasts about the candidates were devoted to Lukashenko.

French Protests Over Youth Labor Law Spread To 150 Cities And Towns (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

PARIS, March 18 — Students joined forces with teachers, workers, retirees, opposition politicians and labor union leaders in more than 150 cities and towns throughout France on Saturday in the largest nationwide protest against the government's new youth labor law.

A number of public figures joined in, including the mayor of Paris, Bertrand Delanoe; the Socialist party leader, François Hollande; a former culture minister, Jack Lang; and the Communist Party leader, Marie-George Buffet.

The demonstrations were the climax of a week of protests that have shut down dozens of universities and confronted Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin with one of the most serious crises in his 10 months in office.

The giant left-wing C.G.T. workers' union estimated that 1.5 million people protested nationwide; the Interior Ministry put the total at more than 500,000, with 80,000 in Paris.

Protesters vowed to continue until the government backed down.

Bernard Thibault, the C.G.T. leader, said, "If they don't listen to us, we are going to have to think about moving to a general strike across the entire country."

Jean-Claude Mailly, the leader of the leftist union, Force Ouvriere, said in a telephone interview after the protest, "The Prime Minister must understand that he must renounce" the labor law "before a true dialogue can begin."

Bruno Julliard, the leader of the student union that first organized the protests, threatened that if by Saturday night, "the government doesn't withdraw this initiative, we'll continue."

The protesters want the abolition of a new law — known as the First Employment Contract and set to take effect in April — that allows employers to fire new workers under the age of 26 without cause for two years.

Designed by the government to help ease the crisis of chronic high unemployment, particularly among poor youth after riots last fall in the suburbs, the law is seen by its opponents as a step toward eroding long-cherished employment rights and benefits.

Protesters point out that the law was pushed through Parliament without debate and charge that it is age discrimination. They have dubbed the law the "Kleenex contract" because young workers could be discarded like a facial tissue.

Unemployment in France is at almost 10 percent, and 23 percent of French citizens under 26 are jobless, one of the highest rates in Europe; in some of the major city suburbs, the figure is nearly double that.

President Jacques Chirac appealed on Friday for the marchers to show "calm and respect," and security police officers in riot gear were out in full force throughout France on Saturday.

Authorities were on alert for what they called "professional thugs" after street fights broke out late Thursday in Paris. The police used tear gas and water cannons to quell the violence.

The protests for the most part were peaceful.

Under sunny skies in Paris on Saturday afternoon, the police, anticipating trouble, urged shopkeepers along the march route to shut down.

DOJ_NMG_0018978

But the demonstrations started with a party spirit, with balloons and music of the Rolling Stones and Madonna. Protesters were joined by parents with children. Officials from the major unions distributed banners and flags from the back of trucks. Vendors sold hotdogs and kebabs.

"I'm sick and tired of all these phony contracts and I want to protect my children's future," said Carole Cases, a 43-year-old nurse, with two of her children, from the Paris suburb of Noisy-le-Grand. "They're trying to dupe the young."

"Villepin, you nonelected jerk," read one banner. In a sign that spring, the season of protests and strikes in France, is coming, another banner read, "Long live spring."

There is little indication that the jobs measure is welcomed by unemployed youth in the suburbs, who are also worried that it does not provide any long-term job security.

"It's stupid," said Mariam Sidibe, a 17-year-old student of Malian descent from Les Mureaux, a working class suburb of Paris rocked by last fall's riots, who marched in Paris. "There's going to be more unemployment."

The police in Paris used tear gas to disperse a small band of youths who thraew bottles and stones at them at the Place de la Nation, on the right bank, the official end point of the protest. Protesters broke shop windows and one car was set afire.

In Lyon, French youths protesting the law clashed with Turks demonstrating against the construction of a memorial to Armenian victims of a 1915 massacre, Reuters reported. The youths shouted, "Fascists!" and "Go home!"

The two sides threw objects at each other and engaged in fistfights. The police used water cannons to disperse them.

In Marseille, the police used tear gas to disperse protesters who replaced the tricolor French flag at city hall with a black and red banner reading, "Anticapitalism and self-management."

In Nancy, about 200 youths blocked railroad tracks for an hour, throwing rocks at the police, who used tear gas against them.

In Rennes, protesters blocked a railway line for about an hour. The police used tear gas to disperse protesters who attacked the local office of the governing U.M.P. party.

The police are still investigating which groups or individuals were responsible for violence in the heart of Paris on Thursday evening.

It was during that protest that antiriot police fired tear gas to disperse bands of youth who threw rocks and bottles at police and burned a newspaper kiosk near the upscale Bon Marché department store. The police also used water cannons against protesters who had set fire to a bookstore and destroyed the terrace of a cafe in the square in front of the Sorbonne.

Extreme right, extreme left and anarchist groups are being blamed for inciting trouble. The youth branch of the extreme right National Front, for example, has distributed antileftist leaflets that say, "Parasites, out of our universities."

About 300 people have been arrested in a week of protests. More than 100 police and 21 protesters have been injured.

In meeting with antiriot police officers on Friday, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, who, like Mr. de Villepin, hopes to run for president next year, held up a damaged police helmet for the cameras. "Those who do this are not demonstrators, they're thugs," he said.

Thus far, Mr. de Villepin, whose poll ratings have collapsed recently, has been the main target of criticism by the law's opponents, and Mr. Sarkozy has said little about its merits.

On Friday evening, Mr. de Villepin met with a group of university presidents who asked him to suspend the new measure for "a period of reflection" of six months.

"We told him that things are getting worse and that next week could prove very risky," said Yannick Vallée, first vice president of the conference of university presidents.

Mr. de Villepin called on protesters to end their blockades and allow nonstrikers to study. "We want students to be able to prepare confidently for their exams and to have the freedom to study," he said.

Well over half of France's 84 public universities remained either closed or partially closed because of student blockades, according to the Ministry of National Education. On Friday, students demanding the right to study demonstrated in Paris and several other university towns.

Rallies Across France Protest New Job Law (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0018979

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Unions Bring Many Thousands to Streets

PARIS, March 18 -- Hundreds of thousands of demonstrators marched in anti-government protests Saturday across France, with the largest of the rallies ending in clashes between riot police and protesters at one of the largest plazas in Paris.

Teachers, unionized government employees and retired workers joined students in escalating demonstrations against a new law that would allow companies to fire employees under age 26 at will during their first two years of work.

Protesters jammed the streets of about 150 cities and towns in mostly peaceful, union-orchestrated demonstrations. On a perfect sunny day for a protest in Paris, families joined in the march, which began in an atmosphere of a friendly weekend outing of songs and chants with political overtones.

But as the hours-long parade drew to a close in the chill of the early evening darkness, several hundred protesters turned on police at the Place de la Nation in the southeastern part of the city, throwing stones, garbage and sticks at riot police who huddled behind protective shields.

Demonstrators smashed windows, burned a car and set a pile of boxes ablaze. City police said 14 protesters were detained and four officers were slightly injured in the standoff.

Union organizers said 1.5 million people participated in marches throughout the country, while police officials estimated the number at just more than 500,000.

The demonstrations have grown larger and have spread to more cities in recent days at the urging of France's powerful student and worker unions, creating a crisis for Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and his Union for a Popular Movement party as France heads toward presidential elections next year.

Villepin pushed the new law as a vehicle to prompt companies to hire more young people at a time when joblessness among that group averages 23 percent and exceeds 40 percent in some poor neighborhoods populated by immigrants and their French-born children. Villepin argued that under existing labor laws, employers were increasingly reluctant to hire young people because of job protections that make it all but impossible to fire workers, even if they are incompetent.

Young people and unions argue that the law -- expected to take effect in April -- will allow employers to discriminate against their youngest workers.

"It's always better to earn one franc than nothing," said Sophia Lamri, 23, a law school graduate interning at a law firm. "The government is just about to get rid of a social policy that took over a hundred years to build. Change shouldn't mean regression."

The new law has become the latest target of youth anger at a government that many young people believe has become increasingly divorced from them.

"People say the young people are lazy and can only think about how much money they'll make," said Jean-Francois Dessessard, who walked among the Paris protesters, one arm draped around his wife and the other resting on the shoulder of his 17-year-old daughter. "But they just want to have it like we had it when we were their age."

As the march passed the Prison de la Sante, inmates waved in support from behind wire mesh windows. A sign hung out one window declared "Chirac belongs here," a reference to President Jacques Chirac.

French Youths Riot Over Jobs Law (WT/AP)

By Angela Charlton, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

PARIS -- Police loosed water cannons and tear gas on rioting students, and activists rampaged through a McDonald's and attacked storefronts in the capital yesterday as demonstrations against a plan to relax job protections spread in a widening arc across France.

The protests, which drew an estimated 500,000 people in about 160 cities across the country, were the biggest show yet of escalating anger that is testing the strength of the conservative government before elections next year.

DOJ_NMG_0018980

At the close of a march in Paris that drew a crowd of tens of thousands, seven officers and 17 protesters were injured during two melees, at the Place de la Nation in eastern Paris and the Sorbonne university. Police said they arrested 156 persons in the French capital.

Four cars were set afire, police said, and a McDonald's restaurant was attacked along with storefronts at the close of the march.

Tensions escalated later yesterday as about 500 youths moved on to the Sorbonne, trying to break through tall metal blockades erected after police stormed the Paris landmark a week ago to dislodge occupying students. The university has become a symbol of the protest.

Police turned water cannons on the protesters at the Sorbonne and were seen throwing youths to the ground, hitting them and dragging them into vans.

"Liberate the Sorbonne," some protesters shouted. "Police everywhere, justice nowhere." In an apparent effort to set fire to a police van serving as a blockade, protesters instead torched the entrance of a nearby Gap store, apparently by accident, engulfing the small porch in flames.

With commerce snarled in some cities, people asked whether Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin would stand firm on implementing the change that he says is needed to encourage hiring. The usually outspoken leader was silent yesterday.

Protest organizers urged President Jacques Chirac yesterday to prevent the law from taking effect as expected in April.

The group issued an ultimatum, saying it expects an answer by tomorrow, when leaders will decide whether to continue protests that have paralyzed at least 16 universities and dominated political discourse for weeks.

"We give them two days to see if they understand the message we've sent," said Remi Jouan of CFDT, France's largest union.

The law would allow businesses to fire young workers in the first two years on a job without giving a reason, removing them from protections that restrict layoffs of regular employees.

Companies are often reluctant to add employees because it is hard to let them go if business conditions worsen. Students see a subtext in the new law: make it easier to hire and fire to help France compete in a globalizing world economy.

Youth joblessness stands at 23 percent nationwide, and 50 percent among impoverished young people. The lack of work was blamed in part for the Muslim riots that shook France's depressed suburbs during the fall.

Protests yesterday reached every corner of France -- most of them largely peaceful -- with organizers citing 160 marches from the small provincial town of Rochefort in the southwest to the major city of Lyon in the southeast.

In Marseille, extreme-leftist youths climbed the facade of City Hall, replacing a French flag with a banner reading "Anti-capitalism." Police used tear gas to disperse them and made several arrests.

Police also fired tear gas at a protest in Clermont-Ferrand, a central city where 10,000 people marched and about 100 youths threw beer cans and other projectiles at a building.

The Paris protest march was the biggest, attracting some 80,000 people, according to police. Organizers put the number at 300,000.

Widespread discontent with the government has crystallized around a new type of job contract that Mr. de Villepin says will alleviate France's sky-high youth unemployment by getting companies to risk hiring young workers.

Critics say the contract abolishes labor protections crucial to the social fabric.

"Aren't we the future of France?" asked Aurelie Silan, a 20-year-old student who joined a river of protesters in Paris.

Government spokesman Jean-Francois Cope insisted on the need for a "spirit of dialogue." "The hand is extended; the door is open," he said on France-3 TV network. However, he limited dialogue to "improving" Mr. de Villepin's plan -- not withdrawing it.

Waves of red union flags topped the densely packed crowd in Paris, which overflowed onto side streets and stretched more than 3½ miles under bright sunshine.

"Throw away the job contract; don't throw away the youth," chanted a group of students shaking tambourines. Many wore plastic bags to illustrate their feeling that the new law reduces young people to disposable workers.

DOJ_NMG_0018981

Some demonstrators became violent as the march ended. Youths set a car on fire, smashed a shop window, trashed a bus stop and threw stones, golf balls and other objects at police. Police responded with tear gas during skirmishes that lasted several hours.

Mr. Chirac has pushed Mr. de Villepin to act "as quickly as possible" to defuse the crisis, but has backed the contested measure.

Dutch Convert To Islam: Veiled And Viewed As A 'Traitor' (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

A Woman's Experience Illustrates Europe's Struggle With Its Identity

BREDA, Netherlands -- Rabi'a Frank sees her Dutch home town through the narrow slit of the black veil that covers her face.

The looks she receives from the townspeople are seldom kindly.

On a recent winter afternoon, the wind tugged at her ankle-length taupe skirt, olive head scarf and black, rectangular face veil as she walked to her car from an Islamic prayer meeting in downtown Breda. Two blond teenagers on bicycles stared, their faces screwed into hostile snarls. Other passersby gawked. Some stepped off the sidewalk to avoid coming too near.

She tried to act like it didn't offend her. But it did. She knows what they think of Muslim women like her.

"If you cover yourself, you are oppressed -- that's it," said Frank, a lanky, 29-year-old Dutch woman who converted to Islam 11 years ago, about the time she married her Moroccan husband. "You are being brainwashed by your husband or your friends."

Or, you're a potential terrorist.

"Sometimes I make a joke and say, 'Oh, you don't have to be scared of me.' " Other times, she gets so fed up that she yanks up her hand under her robe like it's a pistol and shouts, "Boom!"

Frank spoke on a recent day in her living room in this city of 162,000 people near the Netherlands' southern border with Belgium. "They don't have the right to treat me different," she said. "It's like staring at someone in a wheelchair. It's not polite. I'm human, even if you don't like the way I appear."

This day-to-day struggle for acceptance on the streets of her home town is one woman's confrontation with a deepening rift in West European societies, where the emergence of a 15 million-member Muslim minority is reshaping concepts of national and personal identity.

Some European governments have passed laws they say are intended to help preserve national identity. Critics argue that the measures reflect Islamophobia and fears of terrorism triggered by the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the subsequent transit bombings in Madrid and London.

The Netherlands, with nearly 1 million Muslims, almost 6 percent of its population, is particularly on edge. The 2002 assassination of an anti-immigrant politician, Pim Fortuyn, by an animal rights activist was followed by the execution-style murder in 2004 of the filmmaker Theo van Gogh, who had just released a controversial film seen as anti-Islamic. A young Muslim radical admitted to the killing.

A country with a history of tolerance is now adopting or debating some of the most restrictive anti-immigration and anti-Muslim laws in Europe. One proposed measure would ban women from wearing face veils, called niqab , in public. Another would outlaw the speaking of languages other than Dutch on the street.

Immigrants must learn some Dutch, pass a history and geography test and, to get a feel for whether they can live in this society, watch a film on Dutch culture that includes two gay men kissing and a topless woman walking on a beach.

Geert Wilders, a member of the Dutch parliament, said he was drafting a bill that would ban all immigration for the next five years. "Our culture is based on Christianity, Judaism and humanism," Wilders said in an interview in his tiny office in the parliament building in The Hague. "We should not be ashamed of it. This is who we are and who we should stay."

In Belgium, some cities have banned women from wearing face veils and burqas , which cover the entire body and face, in public places. A year ago, France barred women and girls from wearing head scarves in public schools. A London school district has imposed a similar ban.The Path of a Convert

For natives such as Frank who have converted to Islam, the hostility is often greater than that directed at immigrants.

"They think you are a traitor," said Frank, whose thin, pale face is framed by long blondish-brown curls. "You're not acting like a Dutch girl anymore.

"I'm a Muslim, a woman and also Dutch," she continued. "What upsets people is that I'm a Muslim first."

Frank can recall the instant she decided to wear a face veil: She had just stepped into Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport last year after making her first hajj, or pilgrimage to Mecca, and going to Medina, in Saudi Arabia. They are the holiest sites in Islam.

It is more difficult, she said, to describe the evolution that took the former Rebecca Frank to her dramatic decision.

It began at age 14 as teenage defiance. She developed a crush on a 16-year-old Moroccan boy named Ali who had moved to the Netherlands as a child with his parents. He was exotic, he was different -- and, to the daughter of a Catholic mother and a Jewish father, he was off-limits.

Over the years, as the relationship became more serious, Ali told Rebecca he could not marry her because she was not Muslim, even though he was not particularly religious. It's not about Islam, he explained, it's about culture.

Without consulting him, she began reading books about Moroccan culture and Islam. Then she decided to read the Koran. "I felt like, 'This is it,' " said Frank, whose parents were divorced and who, like many teenagers, was searching for an identity.

When Ali took her to meet his mother and announced they planned to marry, his mother said she would "break both legs" if he did that, Frank said. Her future husband didn't see his family for the next three months.

Her own mother was so upset over the wedding that she brought flowers to the 18-year-old bride, broke down in tears and left before the Islamic ceremony began. Her father did attend the wedding.Clothing as a Statement

Like most of her Muslim convert friends, Frank said, she found that the process of fully embracing Islamic thinking and dress was gradual. But eventually the clothing became the outward statement of her identity. "I smiled at all the Muslim women I saw in the streets," she said. "But to them, I was just a plain Dutch girl with brown hair and blue eyes. I wanted to be recognized as a Muslim woman."

She changed her name from Rebecca to Rabi'a and began giving lectures about Islam. After she published an article on Islam in a local newspaper, a woman wrote her a letter demanding: "Go back to your own country."

"I'm in it now!" she thought angrily.

The more Frank studied her religion, the more convinced she became that she should take the final step and wear not only a head scarf but a face veil. "It took me two years to convince my husband I wanted to do it," Frank said. "He really didn't want me to wear it because of the reaction when we go out together."

Frank had begun focusing on the words of one of the Koran's foremost ancient interpreters, Rasulullah, who warned that "a woman who reveals her body" violates the tenets of Islam.

During her pilgrimage to Saudi Arabia with her husband and mother-in-law, she covered her face in public for the first time. Far from feeling oppressed, she said, she felt liberated.

"It's like the song," Frank said. She began softly singing the English lyrics of "The Veil," a popular song on Muslim Web sites.

They tell her, 'Girl, don't you know this is the West and you are free?

You don't need to be oppressed, ashamed of your femininity.'

She just shakes her head and speaks so assuredly. . . .

This Hijab, this mark of piety

Is an act of faith, a symbol

For all the world to see.

But on the streets of Breda, covered by her veil, Frank stands out as an anomaly -- a curiosity to some, a freak to others.

A few weeks ago, her middle son, 7-year-old Ismail, pleaded with her, "Why don't you take it off? The children are laughing at you at school."

"I won't take it off," she insisted. "For me, it's like driving a car without a seat belt."

She gazed out her living room window at the street that winds through her suburban enclave of brick townhouses and front gardens browned by winter frosts.

"I am a Muslim," she said with finality. "That's my identity."

Spain Scrambles To Cope With Tide Of African Migrants (NYT)

By Renwick Mclean

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

MADRID, March 18 — Spain's deputy prime minister began an emergency visit to the Canary Islands on Saturday to discuss ways to control a record flow of African migrants arriving in boats from Mauritania that has led to at least 25 deaths in the last week.

The Spanish government says more than 1,000 migrants have been detained at sea in the last 10 days while trying to reach the islands from Mauritania on North Africa's western coast, a voyage of 500 miles.

The migrants, mostly sub-Saharan Africans, crowd into boats carrying dozens of passengers in hopes of reaching the islands and thereby gaining entry to the European Union.

The detentions have overwhelmed government and Red Cross officials on the islands, prompting them to ask residents to provide clothes and mattresses and to ask Spanish and European Union authorities for help.

"We've never seen anything like this," said an official in the central government's offices on the islands, who followed Spanish protocol by requesting anonymity to avoid upstaging his superiors.

The government of Mauritania has said that without aid from abroad it is practically helpless against the vast numbers of migrants who are collecting within its borders in hopes of going to the islands.

Before traveling to the islands on Saturday, Spain's deputy prime minister, María Teresa Fernández de la Vega, said the Spanish government would do all it could to help stem the flow of migrants and to help care for those who had been detained, many of whom arrive malnourished, dehydrated and in serious need of medical attention.

Juan Antonio Corujo Machín, a Red Cross official on the islands, said, "Most of them are completely disoriented when they arrive."

The Canary Islands, which are 70 miles off Morocco's southwestern coast, have been drawing boatloads of illegal migrants since 1995. They became a particularly popular destination in 2002, when close monitoring at the Strait of Gibraltar persuaded many migrants to look for an alternative route to Spain.

Immigration to the islands slowed over the last couple of years, partly because of a crackdown by Moroccan authorities.

In 2005, more than 4,700 migrants were detained while trying to reach the Canary Islands, down from 8,500 the year before, according to figures from the Spanish government.

The trend appears to be reversing itself this year, however. After less than three months, the number of detentions has already surpassed 3,500.

According to Spanish officials, the resurgence suggests that the Moroccan crackdown has been less effective than previously thought, because the migrants have responded by pushing their departure point south to Mauritania.

The change can add hundreds of miles to the journey, increasing the chances that the boats will wander off course, capsize or otherwise be lost at sea.

Even for migrants who are relatively well prepared, the journey can be hazardous.

All of the 25 bodies found off the coast of Mauritania this week were wearing life jackets, and one had a Global Positioning System navigator, the Spanish government said. The majority of the migrants appear to be departing from Nuadibu, in the north of Mauritania, Spanish officials said. Mauritania has estimated that more than 10,000 potential migrants have gathered in the city in hopes of reaching Spain.

U.S. Warships And Piracy Suspects Exchange Gunfire (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, March 18 (AP) — Two United States Navy warships exchanged gunfire with people suspected of being pirates Saturday off the coast of Somalia, killing one of them and wounding five, the Navy said.

DOJ_NMG_0018984

No American sailors were wounded and 12 suspects, whose nationalities were not known, were taken into custody, said Lt. Cmdr. Charlie Brown, spokesman for the Navy's Fifth Fleet.

The battle started about 25 miles off the Somali coast when the American warships Cape St. George and Gonzalez spotted a 30-foot fishing boat towing skiffs and prepared to board the vessels. The suspects were holding what appeared to be rocket-propelled grenade launchers, the Navy said. When the suspects began shooting, naval gunners returned fire with mounted machine guns.

Navy Warships Fire On Suspected Pirates Off Somalia, Killing One (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Two U.S. warships opened fire on suspected pirates in a small boat in the Indian Ocean off the coast of Somalia yesterday when the pirates brandished shoulder-fired rocket launchers at the ships as they approached, the Navy said.

One of the pirates was killed and five were wounded, the Navy said. Twelve suspects were taken into custody. Sailors worked into the night to quell a fire on the suspected pirate craft ignited by the warships' machine guns. No Americans were injured.

Cmdr. Jeff Breslau, a spokesman for the U.S. Navy Central Command at Bahrain, said the USS Cape St. George, a guided-missile cruiser, and the USS Gonzalez, a guided-missile destroyer, were conducting security patrols in international waters off Somalia's central coast when they spotted a small utility boat towing a pair of skiffs.

"All three were wooden boats," Breslau said in a telephone interview from Bahrain. "They were about 25 miles off the coast and heading west, toward shore." Breslau said the incident occurred at 5:40 a.m. local time.

He said the waters off Somalia, a country that has been in turmoil for the past 15 years, are infested with pirates, seaborne armed robbers who board any boat or ship they can approach and rob the crew at gunpoint.

"A lot of it is targets of opportunity," he said. "They'll take over fishing or merchant vessels, then head back to territorial waters where they demand a ransom." Under international law, watercraft in territorial waters cannot be easily boarded by foreign flagged ships.

Breslau said Cape St. George and Gonzalez, both based in Norfolk, were part of Task Force 150, which oversees security operations and interdictions at the Arabian Sea approaches to the Gulf of Aden and the Gulf of Oman. "The main focus," he said, "is to prevent terrorists from using the sea."

Breslau said the suspected pirate vessel was less than 40 feet long and either had two smaller skiffs in tow or was leading them toward shore. Cape St. George is 567 feet long, and Gonzalez is 505 feet long. Both ships are armed with Tomahawk cruise missiles and an arsenal of other weapons.

The warships were maneuvering to come alongside the suspect boat in preparation for boarding and search when the pirates opened fire with automatic rifles and a rocket-propelled grenade launcher, Breslau said. Sailors manning machine guns on board the warships returned fire, he added.

"There is one confirmed dead and five injured," Breslau said. "We took 12 people into custody, including the injured men." He said the firefight ignited the suspects' vessel, but sailors were working to put out the blaze in hopes of salvaging documents or other intelligence materials.

Congo Warlord Handed To International Court (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

THE HAGUE, March 18 — A Congolese militia leader accused of abducting children and turning them into soldiers and sex slaves has become the first suspect to be delivered to the new International Criminal Court, the chief prosecutor announced Saturday.

The former warlord, Thomas Lubanga, arrived at the court's detention center in The Hague late Friday after being flown here on a French military plane, the prosecutor said. Mr. Lubanga had been imprisoned since last year in Congo, whose authorities handed him over to the court for trial.

"He has been accused of conscripting and enlisting children under the age of 15 into armed groups and using them in hostilities," the prosecutor, Luis Moreno-Ocampo, said at a news conference. The crimes involved were "extremely serious," he said. "Throughout the world, children are being trained to become machines of war."

Mr. Lubanga is scheduled to appear at a court hearing on Monday, the start of a new phase in the history of the I.C.C. The court, the first permanent international war crimes court, was founded in The Hague in 2002 over the objections of the United States.

Mr. Lubanga, 45, was the founder and leader of the Union of Congolese Patriots, one of the most dangerous militias in the Congo's northeastern Ituri district.

Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said that investigators had worked for months in the region almost surreptitiously because armed groups were still active in the area "and they could kill our witnesses." He said that further charges against the militia leader were still being prepared, but much evidence was already available, including photographs from camps where children as young as 7 were being trained to become soldiers.

According to Unicef, the United Nations children's aid agency, an estimated 30,000 children, most of them abducted, have been used by armed groups in Congo as fighters, messengers, cooks and sex slaves.

Mr. Lubanga's case will be one in a series of cases against militia leaders in Congolese-Rwandan border region, the prosecutor said.

The militias have been financed and supplied by a number of countries, including Uganda and Rwanda, in a fight over a region rich in minerals and timber.

"We think this is an important first step and we urge the prosecutor to go further and higher, up to the political actors who were manipulating these militias for their own ends," said Richard Dicker, a director of Human Rights Watch, based in New York.

Wonderful World? (NYT)

By James Traub

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

We live in a world that is objectively more dangerous than the one we knew at the outset of the millennium; whatever our disagreements, since 9/11 both our foreign policy and our domestic politics have pivoted around this ineluctable fact. And because the terrorists who struck us represent a global phenomenon, we assume that the world is objectively more dangerous for everyone. But is it?

The answer, it seems, is no. In recent years, scholars have been gathering data in an attempt to measure global trends in conflict and violence. The emerging view is that conflict worldwide is in fact diminishing, not growing. According to "Human Security Report 2005," a study that relies on this recent scholarship, the number of armed conflicts has been dropping steadily since the end of the cold war. Major civil wars, which exploded around the world between 1946 and 1991, declined sharply in the ensuing decade. Indeed, the trend holds true for virtually every category of conflict — coups, interstate wars and even genocides and so-called politicides, in which political belief rather than ethnicity is the criterion for killing. The only exception is international terrorism — as we know all too well.

The study, issued by the Human Security Center, a policy institute at the University of British Columbia, is not entirely convincing. Because, for example, no sound metric exists for tallying them, the "indirect deaths" caused by conflicts that uproot vast numbers of people, disrupt agriculture and shatter health-care systems have not been counted.

Nevertheless, once we get past our initial disbelief, the notion that we live in an era of comparative peace shouldn't be so surprising. Colonial struggles largely ended by the mid-70's. Cold-war proxy battles also ended. And over the last decade or so, the international community has developed a set of mechanisms to put the brakes on incipient warfare. In fact, the authors of the study argue that "the single most compelling explanation" for the decrease in conflict is that preventive diplomacy and peacemaking missions, as well as U.N. peacekeeping operations, which had been almost impossible to mount during the cold war, now accompany almost every major crisis. As a result, outright warfare is now concentrated, albeit to an extraordinary degree, in one area — sub-Saharan Africa. Entire regions that were strife-torn 20 or 30 years ago, including East and Southeast Asia, are largely peaceful today. North Africa is quiet; Latin America suffers from political instability but not warfare.

This is certainly good news, especially for the beleaguered United Nations. But it does nothing to relieve our own sense of vulnerability, since terrorists are not amenable to negotiation or peacekeeping. You can, therefore, draw a troubling inference from the data, which is that for all the talk of "globalized" threats, the American experience of the world is becoming less, not more, similar to that of our allies and trading partners. Our world has become more dangerous; theirs, with some important exceptions, less so.

Why is it so hard for Americans to recognize how very different the world appears when seen from beyond our borders? The authors of "Human Security Report" hypothesize that myths about a rising tide of violence propagated by the media or international organizations "reinforce popular assumptions." O.K., but why the popular assumptions? Why are our intuitions about both the past and the present so far from the reality?

The answer has to do with fundamental differences between the cold war and the Age of Terror. In the cold war, the chief combatants never fought one another — thus the "coldness" of the war between them. The rest of the world was aflame with proxy combats, but the fear of provoking nuclear war served as a heat shield for the West. The authors of "Human Security Report" note that the scholarly description of the post-World War II era as the "long peace" is "deeply misleading." But psychologically it was accurate.

Now the relationship between threat and actual fatalities has been reversed. International terrorism has killed an average of 1,000 people a year over the last 30 years, according to "Human Security Report." That's not a lot. But the threat of terrorism is out of all proportion to its lethality; that is, in a way, the whole point of terrorism. It is true that since 9/11, nothing has happened in the United States, but anything can happen, anywhere, at any time. And of course something has happened. We all had nuclear nightmares in the depths of the cold war, but we recognized them as nightmares, or as scenes from apocalyptic movies. Yet in the case of terrorism, we had the apocalypse before we even had the nightmare. And so while we may accept the idea that we live in a less-war-torn age, the mind rebels at the thought that we live in a less dangerous age.

But that's us; it's not even "the West." In his famous essay "Of Paradise and Power," Robert Kagan argued that Europeans have stepped out of the Hobbesian world of anarchy — our world — into their own Kantian world of "perpetual peace." With Islamic terrorism a growing threat in Europe, Kagan's Mars/Venus distinction may not be quite as salient as it seemed. But outside the West, where in general the world really does feel less lethal than it used to, President Bush has had a very hard time enlisting allies in the war on terror. Many developing nations would rather talk about development and trade than about sleeper cells. Yet we need their help in the fight against terrorism.

The Bush administration has discovered the hard way that diplomacy is more difficult today — and arguably more important — than it was during the cold war. You can only hope that this discovery points toward a wiser and more supple view of the world we have been forced to inhabit.

TERRORISM NEWS:

From left and Right, doubt on Wiretaps (MJS)

By Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 18, 2006

But Feingold's call for censure of President won't fly

Washington - While most senators recoiled last week from Wisconsin Democrat Russ Feingold's resolution to censure the president, many of them agreed with one of its basic premises: that the wiretapping of Americans without a warrant is against the law.

Doubts about the legality of the government's once-secret domestic surveillance program can be found among both liberal and conservative scholars and on both sides of the aisle in Congress.

In other words, unlike his proposal for censure, Feingold's claims about "illegal wiretapping" are well within the mainstream of congressional debate on the issue.

But critics of the censure resolution make two very different arguments about those claims.

One is an unqualified assertion of the program's legality, offered by the Bush administration and on the Senate floor last week by Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, a Republican.

The other doesn't go nearly that far. In dismissing the notion of censure, some senators argue not that the wiretapping is necessarily legal, but that the question is unanswerable for now, either because too little is known about the program or because the courts haven't put the big constitutional issues to rest.

Chief among them: whether a 1978 law against warrantless domestic wiretapping is trumped by the president's inherent constitutional powers as commander in chief.

Moments after Feingold introduced his censure resolution, Illinois Democrat Dick Durbin posed a question on the Senate floor to Republican Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and a central figure in the wiretapping debate.

Did Specter agree with Frist that the wiretapping is legal?

"I neither agree nor disagree. I do not know," said Specter, who in that spirit introduced a bill Friday that would require the government to seek legal approval for its surveillance program from a special foreign intelligence court established in the late 1970s.

Specter said Friday that he's taking a "middle ground" between those who claim the program is legal and doesn't require a change in the law or judicial review, and those, like Feingold, who claim it's flatly illegal.

Of Frist's claim of legality, Specter said, "Senator Frist is not a judicial official."

Of Feingold's claim of illegality, Specter said there are too many unknowns about how the program works, and "I certainly think you ought not castigate the president as a criminal until you do know the answers to those questions."

Feingold, who sits on both the judiciary and intelligence committees, rejects that argument.

"I don't think there will ever be any additional information that is going to make this more legal," Feingold said at a news conference last week.

Then he proceeded to offer the legal case against the National Security Agency's surveillance program, which is intended to monitor calls between the United States and a foreign country that involve al-Qaida suspects.

Argument number one: that the program is in clear conflict with the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which makes it a crime to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant from a court.

On this point, Feingold has plenty of company. Specter himself called the program a "flat violation" of the 1978 law on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Feb. 5.

Argument number two: that the Bush administration is wrong when it claims that the warrant requirement in the 1978 law was superseded when Congress passed a resolution in 2001 authorizing the president to use "all necessary and appropriate force" against those responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made that case when he testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Feb. 6.

"That's been laughed out of the halls of Congress," Feingold said last week, and not many lawmakers have endorsed the administration's view on this point.

DOJ_NMG_0018990

The Republican Specter told Gonzales that his argument "defies logic and plain English." South Carolina Republican Lindsey Graham told the attorney general that his reasoning was "very dangerous." Graham said when he voted to authorize force against al-Qaida in 2001, "I never envisioned that I was giving to this president or any other president the ability to go around (the 1978 law) carte blanche."

But the debate over the legality of the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping also turns on a third question that is more divisive among lawmakers and in the legal community: whether the 1978 law's requirement for a warrant is outweighed by a president's "inherent" constitutional powers as commander in chief.

How clear is the law?

This question was batted around by the legal experts who testified before Specter's committee late last month. They debated not only whether the surveillance program is legal or illegal, but also whether the law itself is gray or black-and-white in this area.

Yale Law School Dean Harold Koh told the Senate panel that the eavesdropping program is "as blatantly illegal a program as I've seen."

Koh, a liberal scholar who served under President Clinton, said the program lacked the basic standards required under the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Two conservative legal scholars also told the panel the program was illegal, though they disagreed over whether it was a close call.

"This case is very easy," said Bruce Fein, a former Reagan administration official, who cited a landmark 1952 Supreme Court ruling involving the government's seizure of a Youngstown, Ohio, steel mill. In that case, Justice Robert Jackson held that presidential authority is at its high point when it's used in concert with congressional authorization, but that it's at its "lowest ebb" when it's "incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress."

Another conservative scholar, Robert Levy of the Cato Institute, agreed that Bush's inherent powers don't allow him to ignore the 1978 surveillance law. Levy called the eavesdropping program "illegal" but also called it a difficult question.

President's powers defended

Among those defending the program's legality at the hearing was Robert Turner of the University of Virginia's Center for National Security Law.

Turner said the control of foreign intelligence is "at the core of executive discretion," and that regardless of the 1978 law, "I don't think Congress could take away the president's independent powers."

Douglas Kmiec of Pepperdine University Law School also asserted the constitutionality of the government's actions. Kmiec, who served under President Reagan and the first President Bush, said the administration's legal arguments regarding both inherent powers and the 2001 use-of-force resolution were "plausible."

"Reasonable minds can differ on this question," Kmiec said.

Spectrum of opinion

In the Senate, minds clearly do differ. Much of the Democratic minority and at least one Republican (Rhode Island's Lincoln Chafee) agree with Feingold that the spying program is against the law. Some Democrats are more agnostic on the question. Among Republicans, there also appear to be two prevailing views. One group believes the program is legal. Another has doubts or questions that it hopes to resolve by passing legislation, putting the matter before the courts, or both.

Graham, the South Carolina Republican, warned Gonzales last month that the "inherent powers" argument "seems to have no boundaries when it comes to executive decisions in a time of war" and could be used to "almost wipe out anything Congress wanted to do."

In an interview last week, Graham said he disagreed with both of the administration's main legal arguments in defense of warrantless spying.

But at the same time, he contended that the "law in this area is unsettled" and said, "This idea of censuring the president really throws politics into the middle of a good, healthy debate."

Feingold said last week he decided to offer the censure resolution after sitting through several judiciary and intelligence hearings, listening for "reasonable legal arguments," and not hearing any.

He called the "inherent powers" argument very weak. And in an interview on the "Charlie Rose Show" on PBS Friday, Feingold said he is afraid the Supreme Court may view the issue as a political conflict between the other two branches and never take it up.

"If you just leave this up to the judiciary, what you're doing is giving up Congress' role," Feingold said. "Why wouldn't we assert our role, our constitutional role, which is that we make the laws?"

Slain Al Qaeda Leader Leaves Testament To Violence (WT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0018991

By Nadia Abou El-magd, Associated Press
The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

CAIRO -- The slain leader of al Qaeda in Saudi Arabia vowed in his final testament that his group would overthrow the royal family and stage more attacks against the kingdom and Americans in the region, according to a video released yesterday.

The video showed Fahd Faraaj al-Juwair wearing a white head scarf and robes as he read his will in front of a map of Saudi Arabia with the slogan, "Expel the infidels from the Arabian Peninsula." Elsewhere in the video, he appears smiling, wearing a red T-shirt and what appears to be a belt of explosives.

Addressing the Saudi royal family, al-Juwair said, "If you know what the youth are preparing for you, you would be rushing to escape this peninsula."

The video was sent to the Associated Press in an e-mail. In it, al-Juwair also warned the Americans: "Get out of Muhammad's peninsula, get out of all Muslim lands, stop supporting the Jews in Palestine, halt supporting Christians in Muslim lands, or else you'll have nothing but killing, destruction and explosions."

Al-Juwair was reported killed by Saudi security forces along with four other leading militants in a Feb. 27 raid in the capital, Riyadh. The raid was launched in the wake of an al Qaeda attack on the Abqaiq oil complex, the largest oil-processing facility in the world.

The e-mail accompanying the video confirmed his death, with the phrase, "May God accept him as a martyr," and identified al-Juwair as the former head of al Qaeda's branch in the kingdom and as the supervisor of the attack on Abqaiq.

The authenticity of the e-mail, signed by "The Voice of Jihad for Media Production," could not be independently confirmed.

In the video, al-Juwair addressed Saudi police who have been pursuing militants, urging them to join al Qaeda's jihad, or holy war.

"What are you going to tell God when you kill a holy fighter in defense of the Americans, or if you are killed while you are defending the despots?" he asked. "Stop working for the oppressors and join the mujahedeen."

Al Qaeda militants launched a campaign of violence in 2003 in Saudi Arabia, the birthplace of group leader Osama bin Laden. Saudi security forces have carried out a heavy crackdown since, killing or capturing most of the group's leaders.

The Feb. 24 suicide bombing on Abqaiq was the first attack on Saudi Arabia's vital oil infrastructure. The kingdom is the world's largest producer of oil.

Bombers in two explosives-laden vehicles tried to ram through the facility's gates, but were stopped by guards who opened fire on them, detonating the vehicles.

Judge In Moussaoui Trial Faces A Delicate Task (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano
The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Deciding when attorney who 'tainted' witnesses will testify while keeping jury intact are her foremost concerns.

WASHINGTON — With the sentencing trial for Zacarias Moussaoui stumbling forward again, lawyers for the two sides were sharply at odds Saturday over when a government attorney would testify about why she tried to influence witnesses.

The coaching efforts by Carla J. Martin nearly shattered the prosecution's effort to have Moussaoui receive the death penalty for his role in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Defense lawyers want Martin on the stand as soon as Monday in the trial over whether Moussaoui, 37, should be executed or sentenced to life in prison.

Prosecutors want to delay Martin's appearance until the middle of the week and have her testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment against self-incrimination.

"We see no reason" to have Martin take the stand "simply to have [her] invoke her rights," prosecutor Robert A. Spencer said in court papers.

In the middle of the dispute is Judge Leonie M. Brinkema.

Clearly irked by the revelations about Martin early last week, Brinkema has made no secret of her view that the lawyer with the Transportation Security Administration may end up with criminal or civil sanctions for attempting to coach several witnesses.

But Brinkema also is trying to keep together a jury that has been left in the dark over the developments in the case — the only one to be tried in the U.S. that stems from the 2001 attacks.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to plotting with the hijackers. The government contends he should be put to death because he failed to alert the FBI to the plot, which resulted in the deaths of almost 3,000 people.

"I'm fully aware of how important it is for this matter to become resolved," the judge told the prosecution and defense teams in a teleconference session late Friday. "I'm fully aware of the huge resources that have been expended on this case, the fact that we summoned 850 jurors, that we have an excellent jury of 17, and I agree that it would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward …. "

One week into the trial, Brinkema abruptly stopped it Monday when word surfaced that Martin had attempted to influence witnesses from the transportation agency and the Federal Aviation Administration. Martin briefly appeared in court on Tuesday but declined to testify and was excused until she could find legal representation.

Her newly hired lawyer, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., has since said she was eager to testify but needed some time to prepare.

"She is entitled to a fair opportunity to prepare and present her side and a fair judgment of her intentions, her conduct and the conduct of others," Howard said.

Brinkema first banned from the trial all testimony and evidence about aviation security because of Martin's action. But the judge scaled back her ruling Friday, allowing prosecutors to present one or two witnesses on the issue who were not "tainted" by Martin.

For prosecutors, that decision drew new breath into their case for the death penalty for Moussaoui.

They had told jurors they would prove that, had the French citizen cooperated with the FBI upon his arrest on an immigration violation in August 2001, the government would have tightened airport security across the country. Those measures, prosecutors said, could have prevented hijackers from making it onto the airplanes used in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said in court papers that he wanted Martin on the stand after he finished cross-examining FBI Special Agent Harry Samit on Monday morning, which is where the trial left off when it was postponed.

He said she should be the next witness before the prosecution brought in any "untainted" witnesses on aviation security because her testimony would provide "critical information" about the nature of the witness-tampering effort.

Ashcroft: Cooperation's Key In Fight Against Terror (AP)

By JESSICA GRESKO, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, March 19, 2006

MIAMI GARDENS - Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft said Saturday that he does not believe the threat of terrorism has passed and that the United States must work with other countries to combat it.

In an hour-long talk as part of a conference on economic crime, the nation's former top law enforcement officer also discussed the importance and challenges of prosecuting financial crime and the emphasis after the 2001 terrorist attacks on "prevention over prosecution."

"As we fight against terror . . . We need to remind ourselves of the necessity and value of being extremely cooperative with individuals of other nations and in other settings," Ashcroft said.

Ashcroft also drew laughs with some self-deprecating remarks. He also joked that the crowd of approximately 200 students, professors and attorneys at St. Thomas University School of Law would not have to remember anything he said.

"The good part about this lecture is that none of it will be on the quiz or the final," he said.

Not mentioned as part of his speech was the pending case in Miami against alleged terror suspect Jose Padilla, who was arrested almost four years ago while Ashcroft was attorney general. Announcing Padilla's arrest in June 2002, Ashcroft said he had planned to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the United States, charges not mentioned in the current case. Padilla's trial is expected to begin in September.

Ashcroft left the attorney general's office in early 2005 and was succeeded by Alberto Gonzales. He is now a professor at Regent University in Virginia Beach, Va.

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Games Poke Fun At Government (AP)

By Wayne Parry

AP, March 19, 2006

HAMILTON, N.J.

In this send-up of "Monopoly," players don't pass "Go" and they don't go directly to jail _ they go to Guantanamo Bay.

Instead of losing cash for landing on certain squares, they lose civil liberties. And the "Mr. Monopoly" character at the center of the board is replaced by a scowling former Attorney General John Ashcroft.

"Patriot Act: The Home Version" pokes fun at "the historic abuse of governmental powers" by the recently renewed anti-terrorism law, according to its creator's Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0018993

But while it may be fun, creator Michael Kabbash, a graphic artist and Arab civil rights advocate, is serious about how he feels the law has curtailed Americans' freedom.

The object of the game is not to amass the most money or real estate, but to be the last player to retain civil liberties.

"I've had people complain to me that when they play, nobody wins. They say `We're all in Guantanamo and nobody has any civil liberties left,'" he said. "I'm like `Yeah, that's the point.'"

The real Patriot Act, passed after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks and renewed earlier this month, gave law enforcement new investigative and prosecutorial powers. Critics say it unacceptably impinges on civil liberties, but the government defends the law as a vital tool that has helped prevent another terror attack.

Kabbash decided to keep Ashcroft as the visual focus of the game, even though he stepped down in January 2005, because "he really is the icon that people associate with the Patriot Act."

In a nod to President Bush's prewar comments, the "Go" space in is renamed "Bring It On!" Players roll the dice to determine how many civil liberties they start out with, accumulating them from a variety of categories: U.S. citizens get 5; non-citizens 1. Whites and Asians get 5; Arabs 1. Ultra right-wingers get 6; Democrats 3 or 4.

Instead of landing on, say Oriental Avenue, players land on a color- coded spaces corresponding to the national terror alert. A player who lands on a red space loses one civil liberty, as does anyone else within five spaces. A player who lands on an orange space gets to designate another player to lose one civil liberty.

"Chance" cards are now "Homeland Security Cards," with orders such as, "FBI wants you for questioning; Lose one turn;" and "You provide the local authorities with speculative information on your next door neighbor; Collect one civil liberty from each player."

Kabbash, of Green Brook, created a few full board sets but is also distributing the game free over the Internet, with the game board and playing cards all printable. More than 2,000 copies have been downloaded since it debuted in 2004.

"I wanted it to be not only a parody but a teaching tool," said Kabbash, 38, who teaches graphics at the College of New Jersey. "This is my way of putting my political ideas forward, hoping people will wake up. There's a lot of apathy, and we have to realize that we're in a democracy, that we're all allowed to say something."

Ashcroft had no comment on the game when asked about it Saturday during a crime conference in Miami Gardens, Fla., but he laughed when told "jail" had been replaced with Guantanamo Bay. U.S. Justice Department public affairs did not immediately return a call Saturday seeking comment.

Kabbash says his next project will probably have something to do with the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program. He is reasonably certain "there's a file on me somewhere."

Asked if the FBI keeps a file on Kabbash, a bureau spokesman refused to comment.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Cabinet Drilled On Response To Smallpox (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 18 — Cabinet secretaries participated in a drill on Saturday that simulated a smallpox attack as the government tested plans to counter the potential use of bioweapons by terrorists.

"The purpose of this exercise, which was only a drill, was to address the federal government's response to a potential smallpox attack," said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman. "While there's concern, we do not have any concern that a smallpox attack is imminent."

The World Health Organization reported the disease was eradicated in 1980. Still, there are fears that smallpox may be used by terrorists as a biological weapon.

The United States ended routine childhood vaccination against smallpox in 1971. But after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks, the Bush administration ordered some military personnel vaccinated and recommended shots for some health care workers.

Officials from various government agencies, including Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, participated in the four-hour exercise. Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Michael O. Leavitt , the health and human services secretary, were among the cabinet members who were part of the drill.

Montgomery Homeland Security Unit's Scope Challenged (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

When it comes to defending the homeland in suburbia, Montgomery County stands alone.

The county's 15-month-old Homeland Security Department, national experts say, is the only such agency to maintain uniformed officers apart from its local police force. The 60-person unit is charged with being the eyes and ears of a small but growing homeland security apparatus.

County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) wants to increase the department's $5 million budget by 20 percent in the next fiscal year, in part to provide the officers -- most of whom work unarmed -- with pepper spray and body armor. But after an incident last month in which a homeland security officer told public library patrons that they couldn't view Internet pornography, some County Council members are questioning the size and role of the department and its security unit.

"I'd probably advise the next county executive not to have a Department of Homeland Security," said council President George L. Leventhal (D-At Large). "We don't want them swaggering around trying to figure out whether Osama is in the house at the Little Falls library."

Jurisdictions across the country have reorganized in reaction to the post-Sept. 11 era and the creation of the federal Department of Homeland Security. Part of the motivation was to make sure they didn't miss out on millions of dollars in federal funding.

Fairfax County has a Homeland Security Committee made up of senior officials. Prince George's County has an Office of Homeland Security. And the District's Emergency Management Agency plays a coordinating role in homeland security efforts.

None approaches the scale of Montgomery's department, which Duncan began pushing for in late 2004 to "boost the security of our homeland and ensure more coordination within county government."

The council concurred, although it initially resisted moving the security division from Public Works and Transportation into the new agency. Duncan won a council majority for the move during budget deliberations early last year.

"We've taken what should be a small unit and made it much larger than it needs to be," council member Marilyn Praisner (D-Eastern County) said last week.

Controversy surrounding the library incident might also be swelling. The county has informed the Homeland Security Department officer involved that it intends to suspend him without pay for three days because of his conduct. The officer, Ralph Gerharz, recently hired lawyer Robin Ficker, a Republican candidate for county executive, to represent him during disciplinary proceedings.

Montgomery officials contend that Gerharz did not maintain decorum or conduct himself in a professional manner Feb. 9 when he and a fellow officer entered the Little Falls library in Bethesda, Ficker said.

After Gerharz saw adult male patrons viewing explicit pornography on library computers, Ficker said, he told the men that displaying such images was a violation of the county's sexual harassment policy and asked one to leave the library with him to discuss the matter. Other patrons and librarians intervened, and an argument ensued. One librarian felt Gerharz was becoming "abusive" and called police, according to a county report of the incident.

"He was being very authoritarian -- throwing his weight around," said Asher Hyatt, a retired scientific administrator who was volunteering at the library that day.

Gerharz "was offended, and he tried to do something about it and it got a little bit out of hand," Ficker acknowledged. He said the county is making Gerharz a "political fall guy" and failing to address the underlying issue: how to control the display of pornographic materials where children might see them.

Montgomery's policy governing Internet use in public libraries says librarians "will intervene to ensure compliance with state law" and prevent minors from accessing obscene materials, including child pornography. The policy also says that librarians will call police if they believe an adult patron is accessing child pornography.

County officials have condemned the actions of Gerharz and an officer in training who witnesses said stood silent. "What they did was wrong, and I do not condone in any way, shape or form their behavior," Duncan said last month.

Immediately after the library incident, security officers were trained in the need to respect the constitutional rights of library patrons and reminded that their role is to secure and protect county facilities and personnel but not to enforce laws or policies, said Homeland Security Director Gordon Aoyagi.

Aoyagi said county officials moved the security division from the Department of Public Works and Transportation into Homeland Security last year to better integrate the division's officers into the county's emergency response systems.

But he conceded that there was no budget for training.

DOJ_NMG_0018995

Duncan's proposed budget increase includes $102,000 to pay for security officer instruction. Gino Renne, president of United Food and Commercial Workers Local 1994, which represents the officers, said the training and additional equipment were funded in part because of pressure from the union.

Advance Workers For Bush Impersonated Reporters (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

The White House said yesterday that it will discipline two government employees who masqueraded as journalists this month while scouting locations for a presidential visit to the Gulf Coast.

A Mississippi couple whose home was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina said two men who later identified themselves as Secret Service agents pretended to be Fox News journalists when surveying their neighborhood in advance of a March 8 visit from President Bush.

The men arrived on March 3 at the site of the beachfront home that Jerry and Elaine Akins are rebuilding in Gautier, Miss., Elaine Akins said in a telephone interview yesterday.

"They didn't show any cards or anything," Akins said. "They just came up and said they were with the media, and then they said they were with Fox. They just talked to us and asked us about rebuilding our house. Then, after everything was over with, they approached us and they were laughing, and they said: 'You know, we really weren't with Fox. We're government, Secret Service men.' "

Ken Lisaius, a White House spokesman, said the employees were out of bounds.

"This incident has been brought to our attention, and this is clearly not appropriate, nor is it part of our standard operating procedures," he said. "The individuals involved will be verbally reprimanded."

Tom Mazur, a spokesman for the Secret Service, said he did not know who the men were but they were not Secret Service officials.

"I checked with our people down there in Mississippi who were involved in the advance, and it was not Secret Service people who identified themselves as members of the media," Mazur said. "We wouldn't do that."

Asked whether he could confirm where the employees worked, Lisaius simply reiterated his earlier statement. The incident was reported in yesterday's editions of the Biloxi Sun Herald.

Akins said the men were friendly and looked around the home site for about 20 minutes. The following Wednesday, Bush flew to the small, working-class town. He appeared with Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R) outside the Akins home to call attention to federal efforts to aid in reconstruction.

"Our job and our purpose is to help people like the Akins rebuild," Bush said.

The men eventually revealed their identities and displayed blue lapel pins bearing the presidential seal. Akins said she does not mind that the men temporarily misled her about their identities.

"What could they do?" she said. "They couldn't walk up and tell us who they were, because then we would have been a lot more suspicious about the president coming."

"We didn't know" about Bush's visit "until about an hour before the president actually got there," she added. "I think they handled it great."

Louisiana Faces An Exodus From The Coast (WP)

By Cain Burdeau

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

LAFITTE, La. -- Once the salt water is in your veins, Louisiana's coastal folk say, it's hard to give up the lifestyle of moonlit shrimping trips, the town "fais do-do" dances and afternoons spent on the bayous angling for catfish. But since last year's catastrophic hurricanes, this swampy land defined by Cajuns, cypress and tupelo gum forests, bayou-side saloons and, more recently, subdivisions may have become too vulnerable for that lifestyle to continue.

Even before the devastation caused by Katrina, Louisiana's swampy coast had been sinking by as much as 2 inches a year. Along with that subsidence, the area is even more susceptible to flooding because last year's hurricanes damaged vast tracts of wetlands _ already shrinking because of man's activities _ that used to buffer the area from storms blowing in off the Gulf of Mexico.

All of those factors will be reflected in new Federal Emergency Management Agency flood-vulnerability maps due to be released soon that are the basis for flood insurance rates.

DOJ_NMG_0018996

The maps will likely make the insurance more costly, force residents to spend heavily to raise homes out of flood plains to qualify for coverage, make many other homes uninsurable and make lenders less willing to loan money for construction in flood-prone areas.

That new reality may threaten the state's coastal population and its heritage of shrimp fishing, alligator hunting, fur trapping and oyster harvesting.

Some of the roughhewn people down here won't leave willingly.

"You've got earthquakes, you've got fires, you've got volcanoes, you've got tornadoes in tornado alley," said A.J. Fabre, an outspoken leader among shrimp fishermen in Lafitte, about 30 miles south of New Orleans. "Where are you going to have everybody? In Missouri?"

Nearly every house in the area, most of them built on slabs, was flooded by Hurricane Rita. Now, families live in trailers as they rebuild.

"It's a quiet community. Virtually no crime. Kids steal a couple of bicycles," Fabre says.

But the future is gloomy. Fabre's place, a small brick house he inherited from his grandfather, has been condemned because of wind and flood damage. The only thing left of a shrimp processing plant there is a concrete slab, and the old family dock is barnacled, broken and useless.

With no flood insurance, Fabre isn't sure if he'll be able to rebuild. He and his wife might have to demolish the place and buy a mobile home.

He insists he is not defeated and lashes out at politicians, importers, the federal government.

"The fight has just begun," he said.

But many of his neighbors and friends aren't so sanguine.

"We're doomed," said Jimmy Terrebonne, a 46-year-old boat builder. He tells his children to get an education and get out of the fishing trades.

As for himself, he said, "I can't do anything else. I don't have an education. I ain't leaving until it's gone. When the land's gone, I'm leaving."

Many coastal experts believe life along the coast is going to change dramatically with the new flood maps.

"Where we had subdivisions in the marshes, they will not come back," said Shea Penland, a coastal scientist with the University of New Orleans. "I can't believe they're sustainable."

"There are going to be some significant changes across the board," said Butch Kinerney, a FEMA spokesman.

For one thing, much more is known since FEMA last calculated the area's flood vulnerability in 1984 about the area's rate of subsidence.

Last year, the National Geodetic Survey issued a report saying the area was sinking by a half-inch to 2 inches a year, and that was as of 1995.

"When they built the levees, it wasn't below sea level. It was dry land. Now it's dry land only because of the levees," said Roy Dokka, a Louisiana State University subsidence specialist.

About 1,000 homes damaged by Rita's storm surge in the heavily Cajun region southwest of Lafayette called Vermilion Parish might need to be raised to be eligible for insurance, said Robert LeBlanc, the parish's emergency preparedness director.

Younger people might leave, LeBlanc said.

Many others, however, are determined to stay.

"People like where they live, they're content," said Kimberly Chauvin, the wife of a shrimper who is thinking of raising their already-raised home up to 10 feet higher. "I wouldn't want to move to the city, not at all."

New Orleans Assesses Bureaucratic Tradition (LAT)

By Sam Quinones

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

It has seven property assessors whose jobs are virtually inherited. But an upcoming election and the 'I Quit' slate could end that.

NEW ORLEANS — The upcoming election here will attract national attention as residents vote on who will lead their reconstruction.

But beneath the hullabaloo is an obscure, less riveting issue that advocates of change say could be just as big a step in helping the city reinvent itself.

Now is the time, they say, to revamp the city's antiquated system of property assessment, a system that some view as wasting money and encouraging cronyism.

DOJ_NMG_0018997

For more than a century, New Orleans has had seven elected property assessors — each with their own staff and responsibility for a separate district — to assess the city's 164,000 parcels. The system is unique in Louisiana and is believed to be like no other in the country.

Los Angeles County, in comparison, has one elected assessor, whose staff assessed value on 2.6 million properties last year, the office's website says.

New Orleans assessor jobs have been handed down from father to son and husband to wife; one seat has been in a family since 1904.

"We have a screwy, curious, historically developed property-assessment system," said Shaun Rafferty, a local attorney who is leading the nascent movement to overhaul the assessor system. "We've kind of tolerated it. But the hurricane has caused everybody to reanalyze everything."

Since Hurricane Katrina, a new political activism has replaced the city's long-standing complacency. Many people here see the hurricane as a rare chance to discard an outdated system and begin renovating New Orleans' image as a backwater of corruption and inefficiency that left the city vulnerable before the storm.

The assessor system "didn't have anything to do with the emergency response" to Katrina, said Paul Cordes, another lawyer seeking to revamp the system. "But the general fragile nature of our city government — this is the bedrock of it."

Riding the wave of change, a group of lawyers and businessmen have qualified a slate of assessor candidates — known as the I Quit Ticket — for the April 22 city elections.

The candidates — who all hope to be listed on the ballot with the nickname "IQ" — vow to lobby for legislation allowing voters to approve consolidating their offices into one, and resign en masse when that happens. Their resignations would force a special election of a single assessor.

"Everybody felt it was chasing after windmills to take on the assessors," said Bill Aaron, a former city attorney now in private practice and an I Quit Ticket board member. "Now, with Katrina, all bets are off."

Still the issue shows how slowly change can come here, even after hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

A bill to allow a vote on consolidating New Orleans' seven assessors into one failed 8-6 in a state legislative committee last month. Among those opposing it were two legislators whose brother and father, respectively, are New Orleans assessors.

New Orleans has what critics contend are layers of redundant government that it can no longer afford, given its greatly reduced population and budget.

For example, Orleans Parish, whose boundaries are essentially the same as the city's, has a criminal sheriff, a civil sheriff and a coroner — positions that many counties combine in one job. There are several court clerks, each with separate staff, handling the job one court clerk does in most counties.

But the best example of duplication and waste, they say, has been the assessors. Several studies have suggested that consolidating the offices under one appointed assessor would lead to sustainable city financing, and make assessing more accountable, predictable and efficient.

"Every other parish gets by with one," said Janet Howard, of the Bureau of Government Research, a nonpartisan think tank that has studied the system and advocated changing it. With assessor salaries and retirement benefits, New Orleans pays more than $700,000 a year for an assessor, Howard said.

"Even with seven assessors, the job doesn't get done," she said, in part because the money that should pay to modernize and hire appraisers goes to the assessors' salaries. The offices are understaffed and employ people with insufficient training.

The result has been a patchwork of inconsistent assessments for comparable properties. "The only people who are actually paying the taxes are new home buyers" who get their homes reassessed when the sale goes through, said Aaron, the former city attorney. "A lot of the wealthy people are not paying the taxes they should be paying and a lot of the middle-class people are actually bearing the tax burden."

The Times-Picayune newspaper investigated the system in 2004 and found assessments 41% below market value. In response, the Louisiana Tax Commission found that owner-occupied homes in the city were assessed at least 25% below market value. Last year, the commission ordered the New Orleans assessors to reassess all their residential housing — a task they had embarked on when Katrina hit.

Uneven assessments, critics say, have created taxpayer distrust, lawsuits, a culture of corruption and shaky city finances.

Erroll Williams, the 3rd district assessor, doubts that consolidation would save much money. The New Orleans system is poorly funded compared with others around the state, he said, and "you can't save money when you're under-funding it." Moreover, he said, now is no time to change the system because the storm threw property assessment into chaos.

Also, Williams said, one assessor "could be corrupting. If you change it to one assessor in New Orleans, he's going to anoint the mayor. He could influence who becomes your councilmember, your state rep."

But that's exactly what the system now breeds, critics say.

DOJ_NMG_0018998

Staying in office for years, assessors develop relationships with their constituents, which promotes lowering assessments as political favors.

"There doesn't need to be this personal relationship with your assessor," said Arthur Sterbcow, president of Latter & Blum, the region's largest real estate firm, in New Orleans, and an I Quit Ticket board member. "That's a thinly veiled way to say, 'Come see me. We'll work out a deal.' "

The success of the I Quit Ticket depends on the election of all seven of its candidates. (The group is appealing a court order that would prevent the candidates from being listed on the ballot with the "IQ" nickname.) The Legislature must also approve putting the idea of a single assessor before voters during its spring session, which runs from March to June.

Until voters approved the consolidation, he said, the candidates would use their salaries to hire professional appraisers to do the job.

The I Quit Ticket will test Orleanians' commitment to revamping the bureaucracy, Cordes said, because changing the assessor system probably would increase assessments for some of the town's wealthiest families.

"With Katrina, we can reproduce a model city," he said. "This assessor thing is a huge building block in that. It's not the apparent problem, but it is the tumor deep within that needs to be removed."

Storied Church May Be Victim Of Katrina (WP)

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

St. Augustine, Founded in 1841, Is Called Vital Link to Culture of New Orleans

NEW ORLEANS -- Parishioners at one of the nation's oldest African American Catholic churches may have celebrated their last Mass as a parish last Sunday, even as they continued their efforts this week to keep the doors open at St. Augustine.

The church, in the Treme neighborhood near the French Quarter, is a center of racial harmony and great jazz, playing a central role in New Orleans history and culture. With so much of the city devastated by Hurricane Katrina, local residents are rallying behind the church and hoping the parish can be saved.

"The people of New Orleans have lost so much; we don't want to lose this," said Sandra Gordon, 52, a church volunteer who has been coming to St. Augustine since 1965, when Hurricane Betsy destroyed her former church.

In the face of a much-reduced city population and physical damage to many churches post-Katrina, the Archdiocese of New Orleans is closing seven parishes and delaying the reopening of 23 churches. Attendance at St. Augustine, down to fewer than 200 people pre-Katrina, increased significantly afterward. But archdiocese officials said current attendance is not enough.

The church sustained about half a million dollars' worth of damage to the roof and bell tower from Katrina, and it was already hurting for money for a needed renovation.

Like New Orleans itself, St. Augustine is an eclectic mix of the ancient and the contemporary, black and white, song and dance. The church was built in 1841 by slaves and by Italian and French immigrants.

It was one of the first churches where slaves, free blacks and whites worshiped together. After a period as a segregated white church and then a black church, it has had an interracial congregation and services that blend elements of Catholicism with African spirituality and homegrown New Orleans culture. Portraits of the African American "Mardi Gras Indians" are displayed side by side with saints on the walls, and the church is known for popular jazz masses and jazz funerals, including an annual "Louis Armstrong Jazz Mass."

Archdiocese spokesman William Maestri said the 250 parishioners registered at St. Augustine will have access to more classes and social services by joining the 8,000-member parish at St. Peter Claver, another Catholic church a few blocks from St. Augustine with a predominantly African American congregation.

He said St. Augustine's parish was recommended for closure in a 1999 study: "We've kept the parish open and subsidized it long beyond the recommendation."

The church would still remain open for weddings, funerals and weekly Masses. But parish priest Jerome LeDoux, a beloved local figure, would no longer minister there.

St. Augustine members said they would miss LeDoux, 76, an African American vegan musician who speaks several languages and has charmed visitors from around the world with his energetic, multicultural services.

"You can't overstate how important St. Augustine's and Father LeDoux are to the African and Creole tradition of the city," said Morgan Clevenger, former executive director of the New Orleans Jazz Legacy Foundation. "Father LeDoux has always acknowledged the black Indians, the social pleasure clubs, the jazz of New Orleans. He acknowledged the spirituality of African people before Catholicism. The loss of Father LeDoux would be a grave loss to the community."

Economist Jacques Morial said the archdiocese should keep subsidizing the parish based on its historical and cultural importance. He is the brother of former mayor Marc Morial, and their family goes back nine generations in New Orleans.

"We need the archdiocese to reconnect itself to the souls and lives of people who need it most, not just the people who have money," Jacques Morial said.

Music Landmark Caught In Tug Of Priorities After Storm (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, March 16 — The doors of the deserted Milne Boys Home flap open in the wind, and anyone who cares to brave the dank interior here in the heart of the drowned Gentilly neighborhood can find crumbling logbooks noting who visited in the early 1900's and yellowing sheet music in the attic.

A bronze plaque on the weather-beaten facade announces that Milne is "A Landmark of American Music," but it hardly looks the part, taking its place among the city's once-grand buildings ruined by floodwater after Hurricane Katrina.

Nonetheless, what happens to this 11-acre campus of wide lawns and oak trees is of more than casual interest to many people here because of its ties to Louis Armstrong, arguably this city's most famous native son.

Before Milne was built in the 1930's, part of it was called the Colored Waif's Home for Boys, the institution where Armstrong was incarcerated at age 11 after firing a pistol to celebrate New Year's Day 1913. It was there that he learned to play the cornet.

Armstrong is but one of a host of noted jazz musicians to train at the Colored Waif's Home, and later at Milne, to which he was a friend throughout his life.

In a city that long ago demolished Armstrong's birthplace, along with Storyville, the neighborhood where early jazz developed, and the original waif's home, Milne stands as one of the last physical connections to the city's musical past, and many wonder if it will have a place in the new city. Other than the landmark plaque placed by a national music group, it was hardly noted in the old one.

"You might say this is the second, if not the third, opportunity to do something with a Louis Armstrong site where the opportunity has been missed," said Bruce Boyd Raeburn, curator of the Hogan Jazz Archive at Tulane University here. "A lot of the old jazz sites have been torn down to make new parking lots."

Mr. Raeburn added, "The track record on preserving jazz-related sites is pretty dismal for New Orleans."

Yet this is a city that is probably more dependent on the marketing of jazz than any other, as tourism is one of the few engines of the local economy. In an acknowledgment of that, the city renamed its airport after Armstrong in 2001. But when asked about the cultural importance of the Milne site, the city official overseeing arts and entertainment said he did not know much about it. Mayor C. Ray Nagin's office did not return calls for comment.

In the chaos of dealing with an acute housing shortage, a coming mayoral election and tens of thousands of displaced residents, city officials have had little energy or resources to deal with issues like the arts or historic preservation.

But it is precisely at times like these, local activists say, that pieces of the culture slip away — especially in areas like Gentilly, where mostly modest homes line quiet streets that in feeling and geography are miles away from better known destinations like the French Quarter and the Garden District.

"It certainly is a chance once again for a rebuilt New Orleans to seize an opportunity that in the past it did not seize, and to actually help its own cause," said Lee Hampton, executive director of the Amistad Research Center, an archive for the history of African-Americans and other ethnic groups, at Tulane. "Certainly I think it would be worth preserving and worth the effort put into upkeep. I think it could actually repay the city in its interest to outsiders, to tourists."

Long neglected, Milne was not in pristine shape before the storm and had not housed children since the 1980's, becoming instead the setting for after-school social service programs and athletics. The home, not far from the London Avenue Canal, which breached the levees in two spots, flooding Gentilly and surrounding neighborhoods, had capacity for 80 boys before it closed as a residence.

The home was named for a Scottish philanthropist, Alexander Milne, who arrived here in the late 1700's and provided money for the care of troubled children in his will after making a fortune in bricks and hardware.

"The problem with the city now is, where do we place our priorities?" said Tad Jones, a local historian and co-producer of the annual Satchmo Summer Fest, a celebration of Armstrong's music. "Since we're not getting much direction from the city or the feds, all the local homeowner associations in Gentilly and around the lake are coalescing and talking about how to revitalize the neighborhoods. That's a good thing and a bad thing because we're not all on the same page."

Over the decades, not everyone in solidly middle-class Gentilly has been thrilled about having a haven for troubled youth in the area. Some wanted Milne done away with years ago. Others want to see it come back just as it was, as a scaled-down social service and recreation center. Still others want at least part of it to be a memorial to Armstrong and a reminder of what can happen when a poor child gets a chance at a better life.

"Louis Armstrong is the poster child for that," Mr. Raeburn said.

DOJ_NMG_0019000

Officials said the city was negotiating with the Federal Emergency Management Agency to determine how much federal money might be available for the site. The city holds a 99-year lease on the property from the Milne Trust, a private foundation. Part of the complex has been gutted, and the roofs are protected by blue tarp.

Armstrong was born to a teenage mother in a neighborhood so notoriously dangerous, even by New Orleans' rough port-town standards, that it was called "the battlefield." He was largely abandoned by his father and dropped out of grade school, and entertained people by singing and dancing for change around the brothels of Storyville.

He occasionally got into trouble with the police, but around Storyville, he also got to hear the likes of Buddy Bolden and Jelly Roll Morton, pioneers of early jazz.

Peter Davis, the music teacher who invited Armstrong to play in the waif's home band, retired from Milne in 1949 and died in 1971.

Armstrong wrote about Mr. Davis in his memoir, "Satchmo: My Life in New Orleans."

"Every day I practiced faithfully on the lesson Mr. Davis gave me," Armstrong wrote. And later: "All in all, I am proud of the days I spent at the Colored Waif's Home for Boys."

Richard Winder, director of the city's Department of Human Services, which controls the site, said that these days, "We're in limbo."

"We don't know where we are, post-Katrina," Mr. Winder said.

Still, as a former superintendent of the home, he could not imagine losing Milne. "Those worries should be removed down the line," he said, "once we get some normalcy in this city."

WAR NEWS:

Bush: 'Fighting And Sacrifice' Needed (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

On the eve of the third anniversary of the Iraq invasion, President Bush today promised to "finish the mission" with total victory, urging the American public to remain steadfast but offering no indication when victory might be achieved.

"More fighting and sacrifice will be required," Bush said in his weekly radio address. "For some, the temptation to retreat and abandon our commitments is strong. Yet there is no peace, there's no honor and there's no security in retreat. So America will not abandon Iraq to the terrorists who want to attack us again."

Bush's address comes at a time when confidence in the administration's Iraq strategy appears to have reached all-time lows. A Washington Post-ABC News poll this month found that 65 percent of Americans surveyed thought Bush had no plan for victory, while 35 percent -- the lowest level ever recorded by the poll -- said he did.

Bush used the radio address to draw attention to a series of speeches he is giving this month to rally support for the Iraq war. Last week the first of these focused on efforts to train Iraqi troops and success at mitigating the threat of terrorist bombings and casualties caused by the explosion of roadside "improvised explosive devices."

A White House "Fact Sheet" on Iraq that accompanied the radio address noted that casualties from the explosive devices had been halved in the past 18 months and that nearly half of the devices are being found and disabled before they can be detonated.

The fact sheet also buttressed the president's assertion last week that Iraqi security forces were assuming greater battlefield responsibility. The fact sheet said that "Iraqi forces now conduct more independent operations throughout the country that do Coalition forces."

Democrats noted last week, however, that a recent Pentagon report said the number of "level one" Iraqi units capable of operating independent of the United States had dropped from one to zero in recent months.

And for the most part, the fact sheet ignored the missteps and false starts that have dogged the Iraq war since the invasion in March 2003 and instead contrasted Iraq under Saddam Hussein with Iraq today.

Three years ago, the fact sheet said, "life in Iraq was marked by brutality, fear and terror," and Iraqis "had no voice in their country or their lives." Today, by contrast, "the reign of terror has been replaced by a democratically elected government."

In his radio address Bush noted that sectarian violence plagues Iraq, but urged Iraqis to "reach across political, religious and sectarian lines," to convert December's democratic elections into a "government that can confront the terrorist threat and earn the trust and confidence of all Iraqis."

"These past three years have tested our resolve," Bush said. "The enemy has proved brutal and relentless . . . and our troops have shown magnificent courage and made tremendous sacrifices" which, along with Iraqi sacrifices, had given Iraq a "historic opportunity" to rebuild itself.

"The security of our country is directly linked to the liberty of the Iraqi people," Bush said. "We will settle for nothing less than complete victory."

Bush: Violence Creating Urgency In Iraq (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, March 19, 2006

President Bush on Saturday braced Americans for more bloodshed in Iraq but said recent civil strife has motivated warring political factions to move quickly to set up a representative government.

"Our ambassador to Iraq, Zal Khalilzad, reports that the violence has created a new sense of urgency among these leaders to form a national unity government as quickly as possible," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

"I urge them to continue their work to put aside their differences, to reach out across political, religious and sectarian lines, and to form a government that can confront the terrorist threat and earn the trust and confidence of all Iraqis."

Bush's broadcast came in advance of a speech he plans to deliver in Cleveland on Monday, the second in a series of talks marking Sunday's three-year anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. In the speech, Bush will discuss how the United States is working with various sectors of Iraqi society to defeat terrorists, restore calm and help rebuild homes and communities.

The president said victory in Iraq will come when terrorists and loyalists of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein no longer threaten Iraq's democracy, when Iraqi security forces can ensure safety for citizens and terrorists can't call Iraq home.

"More fighting and sacrifice will be required to achieve this victory," he told listeners.

Democrats are calling on Bush to provide more leadership to unify fighting political sectors in Iraq and prevent the nation from spiraling into civil strife. The Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite mosque and subsequent violence led to the deaths of hundreds of people and pushed the country to the brink of civil war between rival Muslim sects.

According to the latest AP-Ipsos poll, more than three-fourths of Americans, 77 percent, say they think a civil war is likely in Iraq. Seventy percent of Republicans and 90 percent of Democrats felt that way. People are evenly split on whether they think a stable, democratic government will be formed in Iraq, according to the poll taken in early March.

Bush has said that as Iraqi security forces step up, U.S. troops will be able to stand down. But critics of the administration's handling of the war say that the Iraqis must be told that the American military will not be in Iraq forever, and they must realize that the eventual pullout will be on U.S., not Iraqi, terms.

"We need the president to urgently exercise the leadership necessary to bring Iraq's political factions together," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., said in the Democratic radio response Saturday. "In no uncertain terms, the president must immediately inform the Iraqi people that they need to get their political house in order."

Feinstein said the Iraqis need to be told that they must get a government and key ministries up and running, that they need to quickly secure their streets by ramping up the deployment of a viable police force, and they must reconcile differences between Sunnis and the Shia.

"Iraqis must know that we will exit on our terms, not theirs," she said.

Bush's speeches — a total of three this month and possibly more in April — would be similar in tone to a series of talks he made in December to help turn public opinion on the war in his favor. In those talks, he combined steely resolve with frank acknowledgments that mistakes have led to changes in U.S. strategy.

The president said that, in Ohio on Monday, he would provide concrete examples of how U.S. strategy in Iraq is succeeding.

"In recent weeks, Americans have seen horrific images from Iraq: the bombing of a great house of worship in Samarra, sectarian reprisals between Sunnis and Shias, and car bombings and kidnappings," Bush said.

"Amid continued reports about the tense situation in parts of that country, it may seem difficult at times to understand how we can say that progress is being made," he said. "But the reaction to the recent violence by Iraq's leaders is a clear sign of Iraq's commitment to democracy."

Iraq's True Cost Continues To Grow (HC)

By BOB DEANS, Cox News Service

Houston Chroncile, March 19, 2006

The bottom line includes a staggering death toll among troops and civilians, Pentagon spending at $6 billion a month and damage to U.S. credibility

DOJ_NMG_0019002

WASHINGTON - Three years after President Bush launched the invasion of Iraq, the war grinds on amid escalating costs — in lives, money and U.S. influence abroad.

Saddam Hussein and his repressive regime are no longer in power and democracy has taken some important, if shaky, first steps.

Iraq has a "hopeful future," Bush said, despite the problems there.

"We will finish what we started in Iraq," the president said in a speech. "We will complete the mission."

But sectarian violence verges on civil war. More than 130,000 troops remain in Iraq. And the toll on Iraq and the United States is far beyond anything the administration prepared Americans for in the lead-up to the March 19, 2003, invasion.

The war has divided the United States, set it at odds with friends and rivals alike abroad, and dominated an often-ugly national political debate. Three years on, the costs continue to mount.

According to Pentagon figures (as of March 15), 2,310 U.S. troops have died in Iraq since the launch of the invasion. Of those, 1,808 were killed in combat and 502 died from accidents, illnesses or other causes.

Another 17,124 American troops have been wounded. Of those, 9,212 were returned to duty within 72 hours. The rest had more serious wounds, including about 400 who have lost an arm, leg, hand or foot.

The figures do not include American civilians killed or wounded in Iraq while working for the U.S. government, private businesses and non-governmental aid organizations.

There are no independently verifiable estimates of the number of Iraqi soldiers killed during the first several weeks of the war, and no official estimates of civilian casualties.

Bush recently estimated the Iraqi dead at somewhere near 30,000.

A London-based human rights group called Iraq Body Count estimates that at least 33,638 Iraqi civilians have been killed as a result of the war and up to 37,754 may have died, based on the group's independent tabulation of deaths confirmed in media reports.

The number includes civilians killed by insurgent attacks as well as operations by U.S. and coalition forces.

The U.S. taxpayers' tabAmericans have spent $250 billion on military operations and reconstruction efforts in Iraq, a war that is currently costing the Pentagon roughly $6 billion a month, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

This spending does not include so-called fixed costs that are part of Pentagon spending — such as pay for the troops — but accounts for only the direct war costs, such as bonus pay for combat operations, as well as fuel, munitions and other war-related expenses.

The war's true price tag, however, will include expenses not included in this reckoning, particularly the long-term costs of providing lifetime health care to soldiers wounded in the war or suffering from mental health issues related to the conflict, recurring expenses certain to range in the billions of dollars per year.

Nor do these costs include the interest on the additional debt incurred to finance the war.

"There will be tail costs," said U.S. Comptroller General David Walker, head of the Government Accountability Office, a congressional agency that oversees federal spending. "There will be costs that will be coming down the road."

Billions of dollars in tanks, aircraft, communications gear and other military equipment has been worn out, destroyed or given to new Iraqi forces during the conflict. "

Some replacement funds are included in the Pentagon's current spending. But military officials say billions in additional spending will be needed to bring inventories of critical gear back up to pre-war levels.

U.S. image abroadAs bloodshed and destruction have mounted, the war has undercut America's image among other countries around the world.

"After the war in Iraq, the image of the United States plummeted in most countries and has only recovered in a few," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center, a nonpartisan opinion monitoring group in Washington.

Bush led the country to war on the claim that Iraq possessed chemical and biological weapons and was working to reconstitute earlier efforts to build a nuclear weapon. No stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction were found, nor has evidence of a viable nuclear weapons program surfaced. Bush has said the intelligence he received in the lead-up to the war was faulty.

Those failings have undercut U.S. efforts to press for international sanctions against Iran, which is pursuing a nuclear program that Bush fears could produce weapons, and for diplomatic pressure on nuclear-minded North Korea.

A Sliding Scale For Victory (LAT)

By Doyle McManus

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019003

As the conflict in Iraq enters its fourth year and civil war threatens, the Bush administration is again working to lower expectations.

WASHINGTON — Three years ago, as they ordered more than 150,000 U.S. troops to race toward Baghdad, Bush administration officials confidently predicted that Iraq would quickly evolve into a prosperous, oil-fueled democracy. When those goals proved optimistic, they lowered their sights, focusing on a military campaign to defeat Sunni-led insurgents and elections to jump-start a new political order.

As the conflict enters its fourth year today, the Bush administration faces a new challenge: the prospect of civil war. And, in response, officials again appear to be redefining success downward.

If Iraq can avoid all-out civil war, they say, if Baghdad's new security forces can hold together, if Sunni Arabs, Shiites and Kurds all participate in a new unity government, that may be enough progress to allow the administration to begin reducing the number of U.S. troops in the country by the second half of this year.

In increasingly sober public statements — and in slightly more candid assessments from officials who insisted that they not be identified — the administration is working to lower expectations.

"It may seem difficult at times to understand how we can say that progress is being made," President Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address, acknowledging that much of the recent news from Iraq has been bad. "But … slowly but surely, our strategy is getting results."

"We may fail," said a senior official directly involved in Iraq policy. "But I think we're going to succeed. I think we're going to nudge this ball down the road…. It's not going to be easy, and it's going to take time."

The more sober tone is not entirely new; officials, from Bush on down, have tacitly acknowledged for more than a year that trying to stabilize Iraq is proving more difficult than they expected when they launched the war in 2003.

But independent foreign policy analysts say they see signs of a more fundamental shift in the administration's position — a creeping redefinition of U.S. goals in Iraq that increasingly allows for the possibility that the nation may remain unstable for years to come.

"It isn't going to be perfect," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said last month. "It isn't going to be pretty. It isn't going to look like the United States of America. It's going to be an Iraqi solution politically, and Iraqi solution economically and an Iraqi solution from a security standpoint."

"Initially, we were going to stay until the insurgency was defeated," noted James F. Dobbins, a former special envoy under Presidents Clinton and Bush. "About a year ago, we amended that in a fairly important way by saying we were going to stay until the Iraqi government and its army and police were capable of coping with the insurgency. We redefined victory in terms of the Iraqis' capability instead of the defeat of the insurgency."

"Now even that measure of success has proven elusive," said Dobbins, who is now with Rand Corp. "At this point I think we would be content if we could diminish our presence, allow the Iraqis to simply hold their own against the insurgency and prevent the country from rupturing into an even more serious civil war than the one that now exists."

The violence between Sunni and Shiite Arabs in recent weeks, which increased after the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, touched off what one official called "a moment of fear" within the administration — a sense that events in Iraq could spiral beyond any measure of U.S. control.

In the aftermath of the bombing, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said, "We have opened the Pandora's box…. There is a concerted effort to provoke civil war."

And Rumsfeld, asked whether U.S. forces would intervene in an intra-Iraqi conflict, said, "The plan is to prevent a civil war, and to the extent one were to occur … from a security standpoint, have the Iraqi security forces deal with it to the extent they're able to."

Before the recent violence, U.S. military officials said they hoped to reduce the number of troops in Iraq from about 130,000 to about 100,000 over the year. Officials said last week that the violence could slow the U.S. drawdown but that they still expected some troop reduction to occur.

The good news, Rumsfeld and other officials noted, was that U.S.-trained Iraqi security forces did not disintegrate, and Iraqi political leaders, particularly in the Shiite community, quickly intervened to stop the violence from escalating further.

But the senior official said the U.S. strategy of nurturing a unity government and building multi-ethnic Iraqi security forces was still dangerously vulnerable.

"Sectarian violence … is not going down as [quickly] as we would like to see," he said. "A surge further in sectarian violence, way below what I would call a civil war, is still enough to really threaten what we're trying to do there, because it strengthens the militias, it strengthens the radicals, it weakens the security forces."

DOJ_NMG_0019004

The most important immediate step, President Bush and other officials said, is for Iraqi politicians from all three major communities to form a unity government. "I urge them … to form a government that can confront the terrorist threat and earn the trust and confidence of all Iraqis," Bush said Saturday.

But that is proving difficult. Sunni and Kurdish leaders are unhappy with the decision by the Shiite bloc, the largest in the new parliament, to reelect Ibrahim Jafari for the post of prime minister. U.S. officials are unhappy with the choice, too; many of them consider Jafari incompetent and divisive. The result, at least in the short run, has been a political deadlock.

"They have to step up to the plate," the senior official said, reflecting the administration's frustration with the Iraqi leaders. "They cannot just sit aside and press their short-term interests."

Unless a unity government succeeds, said a civilian advisor to the Pentagon, "you are heading for a de facto independent Kurdistan, a Shia Iraq that is very close to the Iranians and a Sunni Iraq which is rebellious in perpetuity."

One of the major goals of U.S. policy in Iraq has been to avoid choosing sides. But that goal may be slipping away, outside analysts said.

"In a sense, as your own forces diminish, you have to choose sides," Dobbins said. "We may be forced to do that. We already have to some degree."

"The Sunnis already see us as having chosen sides," said Steven Biddle, a former professor at the U.S. Army War College who is at the private Council on Foreign Relations.

Biddle has argued that by building new Iraqi security forces dominated by Shiites and Kurds, the United States in effect has armed and trained two of the sides in the Iraqi conflict. The Sunnis, he wrote in a recent article, "perceive the 'national' army and police force as a Shiite-Kurdish militia on steroids."

"I think we're in a civil war now. We've been in a civil war for more than a year. It's just a civil war that's being fought at low intensity," he said in an interview.

Instead of trying to build Iraqi security forces quickly, Biddle argues, the United States should slow down its training program, slow its own military withdrawal, and concentrate on strengthening political leaders — especially among the Sunnis — who can make compromises.

But Biddle acknowledges that there is no political support in the United States for a longer or larger troop deployment.

"If we had the troops, I'd increase the troops," he said. "But we don't have the troops."

Administration officials say that waning U.S. public support for the war has become one of their major concerns, if only because Iraqis on all sides increasingly wonder how long the Americans will stay.

A poll released last week by the Pew Research Center found that public support for keeping U.S. troops in Iraq had reached its lowest point since the 2003 invasion. Half of the respondents said they wanted to bring U.S. troops home as soon as possible, compared with 44% who said the troops should stay "until the situation is stabilized."

Reflecting the increasingly partisan cast of the issue, Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, in the Democratic response to Bush's radio address Saturday, called on the president to give the Iraqi government more responsibility for security "so our troops can responsibly be redeployed."

"The administration's dangerous incompetence has made the job harder," she said.

A former senior official said that he did not expect political pressure to affect Bush's decisions on Iraq this year but that the 2008 presidential election could be a different story.

"There is deep concern in the White House that 2008 will be a referendum on Iraq," he said. "I don't think the president will be affected by the congressional elections. But in 2007, at some point, does he say, 'I'm going to do what's right, no matter what the political consequences?' Or does he say, 'We gave the Iraqis every chance; we can't want a successful Iraq more than the Iraqis want it?'

"Leaving Iraq in its current state would be a very serious strategic setback for us," he said. "It would be a defeat. We can dress it up. We can try to recover from it. But it's a defeat."

The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)

By Nina Kamp, Michael O'Hanlon And Amy Unikewicz

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

AS we reach the third anniversary of the start of the war, the confusion on the ground in Iraq seems to have spread to American generals' public pronouncements. Last Monday, just days after saying that pacification efforts with the Iraqis were going "very, very well," Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told an audience that Iraq is "a place that is having some real difficulties right now" and that "everything is in place if they want to have a civil war." Unfortunately, an examination of trends in Iraq backs up General Pace's later, more sober comments.

DOJ_NMG_0019005

The country's economy continues to disappoint. Although it had a fairly quick recovery in 2003 and early 2004, when gross domestic product was restored to Saddam Hussein-era levels, violence and instability have prevented much further progress. And while subsidies for gasoline and some other goods, which have been costing the Iraqi government about $10 billion a year, or a third of gross domestic product, have been reduced, projections that the country's economy will grow by 10 percent a year for the rest of the decade look increasingly suspect. Current growth sputters along at less than 5 percent despite sky-high prices for oil exports. Most utilities (except telephones and Internet services) are still performing below Baathist-era levels. Unemployment remains very high.

Politically, Iraqis have been stalemated in forming a new government since the impressive Dec. 15 elections, primarily over issues like ensuring fair distribution of Iraq's oil revenue and devising ways to reintegrate lower-level former Baathists into society. This political inertia reinforces the widespread Sunni Arab sense of estrangement. And it contributes to remarkably high levels of Sunni Arab approval for violence against coalition troops (almost 90 percent) and even against their own government.

Paradoxically, most of what good news there has been this winter is on the security front. American troop fatalities in Iraq have declined relative to last fall's typical levels. Fatalities among Iraqi security forces have also gone down, as have car bombings. Unfortunately, civilian casualties have been as high as ever and, since the Feb. 22 bombing of the Samarra mosque, sectarian violence is worse than at any time since the invasion.

All that said, according to public opinion polls, more than 60 percent of Iraqis (though very few Sunni Arabs) remain bullish on the future. And Iraqi security forces continue to improve, with far higher percentages having reached the upper half of the four-tier readiness rating system. These statistics may point to the possibility of a troop drawdown strategy for the United States — but while a strategically passable outcome still seems within reach, it is increasingly hard to believe that there are the makings of a major success for American foreign policy in Iraq.

Change Of Heartland (BOS)

On the third anniversary of the invasion of Iraq, many Indianians are no longer strongly behind the war

SOUTH BEND, Ind. -- The third anniversary of the Iraq invasion unleashed a surge of pessimism at a local farmers' market here, where stalwart Republicans, standing amid aisles of produce and miracle cures, said President Bush has messed up a war that looks more like Vietnam every day.

"It's chaos," said Roger Madaras, who voted twice for Bush. "How many more people are going to be killed? We were going in to free the people of Iraq, but as far as I'm concerned, a lot of them are worse off today than they were under the dictatorship."

Madaras, the owner of a plumbing company, said he believed Bush when the president declared major combat to be over in May 2003, and is "disgusted" that Bush's rhetoric was hollow. And he is far from alone.

Support for Bush and his handling of Iraq is sharply eroding across the American heartland, where the overcast skies and the muddy fields of late winter matched a sense of gloom about Bush and the war.

This month, the Indianapolis Star released poll findings that Bush's approval rating among Indiana voters stood at 37 percent -- a drop of 18 points over the past year. The numbers echoed national polls, but were particularly shocking in a state that has not voted for a Democratic presidential candidate since 1964, and where Democratic presidential contenders often do not bother to campaign.

"A 37 percent approval rating in Indiana for a Republican president is unheard of," said Brian Howey, who runs a newsletter for Indiana state political insiders. "Those are Bill Clinton or John Kerry numbers in Indiana. So there is something seriously awry going on right now."

In scattered rural diners and small-town restaurants adorned with 9/11-vintage American flag posters, support for the troops remains high. But many in Indiana also say the war has not turned out the way they thought it would three years ago, and they question whether Bush has what it takes to lead the troops into a happy ending.

Standing behind the counter where she sells bird houses and seed at the farmers' market, Beverly Beisel said she is increasingly fearful that Iraq will inevitably fall apart as soon as US soldiers leave -- making a mockery of the deaths sustained until then.

"It's not going well, that's for sure," Beisel said. "I don't like that fact that we started it. I thought Bush was actually going after the terrorists, wherever they were. We thought they had weapons that they were hiding."

Beisel said she doesn't blame Bush because "he can only deal with the intelligence he was given" and still supports him because she opposes abortion. But she added that plenty of her friends think "we should get out of there and they're probably sorry they voted for him."

Drinking coffee at Louie's Café in LaPorte, Ken Schreiber, who commands respect among the regulars because he coached the local high school baseball team to seven state championships, said he doesn't understand why the administration never sent enough troops in to stabilize Iraq's security.

Schreiber said he primarily blames the "liberal media" and "partisan politics" for the president's free-falling poll numbers. But he also blames Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld for giving Bush "some bad advice" about how Iraqis would "kiss our feet" for ridding them of Hussein.

"I'm frustrated like everyone else is frustrated," he said. "It's a lingering war like Vietnam. But I still don't think it was a mistake to go in."

As more and more Hoosiers find themselves making the comparison that only liberals and antiwar protesters made a year ago -- Iraq is like Vietnam -- some say they are also starting to doubt Bush's competence to protect America from terrorism on the home front.

John Lackman, a retired manager at an aircraft wheels and brakes factory who was eating breakfast at a table near Schreiber, said the slow federal response to the Hurricane Katrina disaster last year gave many pause.

"That New Orleans situation just piled it on top of the Iraq War," Lackman said. "The security issue is paramount in everyone's mind. If they couldn't respond adequately to that situation, how are they going to respond if there's a dirty bomb?"

Others sharply disagreed, saying local officials were primarily to blame for the New Orleans disaster. But there was nearly unanimous incredulity across Indiana at Bush's support for a deal that would have put a Dubai company in charge of six US ports.

Many connected the Dubai ports row to a state controversy -- Republican Governor Mitch Daniels's efforts to lease the Indiana Toll Road to a foreign firm for the next 75 years. Support for Daniels, a former top aide to Bush, is just as low as it is for the president.

"People don't think Indiana should sell its toll road to foreigners, and they don't want someone with a turban running our ports," said Denny Thomas, a retired trucker sitting near video poker machines at the back of a smoke-filled tobacco bar in LaPorte.

Daniels, who ran in 2004 on the slogan "My Man Mitch," as Bush once referred to him, has also drawn fire for ramming through a law requiring Indiana to join the rest of the country on daylight saving time. The measure is wildly unpopular in rural areas.

Pouring coffee behind the bar of Allie's Café in South Bend, restaurant owner Chuck Sulok -- a self-declared "partisan supporter" of both Bush and Daniels -- said he fears what the "double whammy" of Bush's and Daniels's unpopularity could do in the coming election.

If Democrats can pick up 15 seats, they can retake control of the US House of Representatives for the first time since the Republican tidal wave of 1994, when the GOP picked up 54 seats. Sulok says today's atmosphere in Indiana reminds him of 1994 in reverse.

"The mid-term elections are coming and it scares me to death, speaking as a partisan Republican," he said. "There's a difference between regular dissatisfaction and a dissent that will move an election. There's that feeling in the air."

Joe Donnelly hopes Sulok's fears are well-founded. Donnelly, a local lawyer, is running for Congress against a Republican incumbent, Chris Chocola, in a rematch from 2004. He lost last time by 9 points -- but that was when the Iraq War was still young.

Donnelly said the drop in support for Bush and his handling of the war could swing the election his way, accusing Chocola of being a "rubber stamp" for the administration. Chocola, whose campaign netted $600,000 in a Bush-headlined fund-raiser in February, did not respond to an interview request.

"Truly, everyone out here wants the Iraq mission to succeed," Donnelly said. "But everyone is becoming more concerned and uncomfortable. What we need are Congress people who will ask President Bush tough questions, not be rubber stamps."

John Roos, a political science professor at the University of Notre Dame, said the dissatisfaction with Bush's record in Iraq might hand the 2006 election to Democrats by persuading disgruntled Republicans across the American heartland to stay home.

"It's not that they have become Democrats, and it's not that they have decided the war on Iraq and especially the war on terrorism is wrong," Roos said. "The people of Indiana just think [Bush] is not very good at being president."

Waiting to be seated at Allie's Café, Lee Connett, a retired automotive engineer, said he wondered about the Iraq War from the beginning. He thought it seemed like a diversion from the hunt for the Al Qaeda leader, Osama bin Laden.

But he voted for Bush anyway because he couldn't stand Kerry, the Democratic nominee. Now, he said, as it becomes ever more clear that "Bush doesn't have a plan" for Iraq, he doesn't know what he should do.

DOJ_NMG_0019007

"I voted for Bush in 2000 and in 2004 . . . because he seemed like the lesser of two evils as I saw it at the time," Connett said. "How could anyone know he was going to do what he's done? He's not settled anything in Iraq and we're getting no clue as to what the outcome is going to be."

All the talk lately about Bush and the problems with Iraq bemuses Susan Grimes, a waitress at the South Junction Café, a lonely outpost at the intersection of state roads 6 and 35. Grimes said listening to her customers complain has turned her off politics.

"I hear all these people come in and say: 'That President Bush, we got to get that guy out of there.' But you ask them who they voted for, and they hush up because they were the ones who voted him in. He's their boy."

Bush Using Straw-Man Arguments In Speeches (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, March 19, 2006

"Some look at the challenges in Iraq and conclude that the war is lost and not worth another dime or another day," President Bush said recently.

Another time he said, "Some say that if you're Muslim you can't be free."

"There are some really decent people," the president said earlier this year, "who believe that the federal government ought to be the decider of health care ... for all people."

Of course, hardly anyone in mainstream political debate has made such assertions.

When the president starts a sentence with "some say" or offers up what "some in Washington" believe, as he is doing more often these days, a rhetorical retort almost assuredly follows.

The device usually is code for Democrats or other White House opponents. In describing what they advocate, Bush often omits an important nuance or substitutes an extreme stance that bears little resemblance to their actual position.

He typically then says he "strongly disagrees" — conveniently knocking down a straw man of his own making.

Bush routinely is criticized for dressing up events with a too-rosy glow. But experts in political speech say the straw man device, in which the president makes himself appear entirely reasonable by contrast to supposed "critics," is just as problematic.

Because the "some" often go unnamed, Bush can argue that his statements are true in an era of blogs and talk radio. Even so, "'some' suggests a number much larger than is actually out there," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania.

A specialist in presidential rhetoric, Wayne Fields of Washington University in St. Louis, views it as "a bizarre kind of double talk" that abuses the rules of legitimate discussion.

"It's such a phenomenal hole in the national debate that you can have arguments with nonexistent people," Fields said. "All politicians try to get away with this to a certain extent. What's striking here is how much this administration rests on a foundation of this kind of stuff."

Bush has caricatured the other side for years, trying to tilt legislative debates in his favor or score election-season points with voters.

Not long after taking office in 2001, Bush pushed for a new education testing law and began portraying skeptics as opposed to holding schools accountable.

The chief opposition, however, had nothing to do with the merits of measuring performance, but rather the cost and intrusiveness of the proposal.

Campaigning for Republican candidates in the 2002 midterm elections, the president sought to use the congressional debate over a new Homeland Security Department against Democrats.

He told at least two audiences that some senators opposing him were "not interested in the security of the American people." In reality, Democrats balked not at creating the department, which Bush himself first opposed, but at letting agency workers go without the usual civil service protections.

Running for re-election against Sen. John Kerry in 2004, Bush frequently used some version of this line to paint his Democratic opponent as weaker in the fight against terrorism: "My opponent and others believe this matter is a matter of intelligence and law enforcement."

The assertion was called a mischaracterization of Kerry's views even by a Republican, Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record) of Arizona.

Straw men have made more frequent appearances in recent months, often on national security — once Bush's strong suit with the public but at the center of some of his difficulties today. Under fire for a domestic eavesdropping program, a ports-management deal and the rising violence in Iraq, Bush now sees his approval ratings hovering around the lowest of his presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0019008

Said Jamieson, "You would expect people to do that as they feel more threatened."

Last fall, the rhetorical tool became popular with Bush when the debate heated up over when troops would return from Iraq. "Some say perhaps we ought to just pull out of Iraq," he told GOP supporters in October, echoing similar lines from other speeches. "That is foolhardy policy."

Yet even the speediest plan, as advocated by only a few Democrats, suggested not an immediate drawdown, but one over six months. Most Democrats were not even arguing for a specific troop withdrawal timetable.

Recently defending his decision to allow the National Security Agency to monitor without subpoenas the international communications of Americans suspected of terrorist ties, Bush has suggested that those who question the program underestimate the terrorist threat.

"There's some in America who say, 'Well, this can't be true there are still people willing to attack,'" Bush said during a January visit to the NSA.

The president has relied on straw men, too, on the topics of taxes and trade, issues he hopes will work against Democrats in this fall's congressional elections.

Usually without targeting Democrats specifically, Bush has suggested they are big-spenders who want to raise taxes, because most oppose extending some of his earlier tax cuts, and protectionists who do not want to open global markets to American goods, when most oppose free-trade deals that lack protections for labor and the environment.

"Some people believe the answer to this problem is to wall off our economy from the world," he said this month in India, talking about the migration of U.S. jobs overseas. "I strongly disagree."

Analysis: Envoy Dives Into Iraq Diplomacy (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, March 19, 2006

Zalmay Khalilzad spends a lot of time these days in a soundproof room at the U.S. Embassy, sitting in front of television cameras and repeating a single message: Iraq must have a unity government and Americans must be patient until that happens.

The 54-year-old, Afghan-born U.S. envoy — a snappy dresser with a soft-spoken, easy demeanor — has become the increasingly effective face of the Bush administration's campaign to restore American confidence in the Iraq mission.

Yes, he will acknowledge, mistakes have been made. Yes, Iraq is beset with sectarian and insurgent violence.

But no, he insists, the situation is not hopeless. The United States must soldier on, pressing for a political solution — a democratic outcome to snuff out the savagery.

According to the U.S. argument, formation of an Iraqi government acceptable to and representative of all major ethnic and political factions would:

_Empower and legitimize the leaders of the Iraqi army and police to crush the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency in the name of all citizens, whether Sunni, Shiite or Kurd.

_Cause minority Sunnis, once satisfied they are getting a fair political shake, to turn against al-Qaida in Iraq terror cells that they have either sheltered or tolerated in their midst.

_Calm Sunni-Shiite sectarian tensions and violence as members of each community see their leaders working together to unify — rather than divide — the fractious population.

Khalilzad, born in the northern Afghan city of Mazar-i-Sharif, is unusual among his colleagues in having an instinctual ability to negotiate the tangle of Iraq's variant of Middle East politics. He understands the ways of the bazaar, the need for long talks over many glasses of tea.

And that, perhaps, accounts for his success in getting Iraq's deeply divided political leaders to sit and talk together in one room, overcoming what he calls a cultural "unwillingness" to confront each other directly on issues that concern them directly.

"Their preference seems to be to talk indirectly and to talk to intermediaries," he said.

"What is encouraging to me in recent days is that they are beginning to talk to each other and directly. It seems to me ... this has been working," he added in a recent interview.

With a sly smile, he also acknowledges a bit of subterfuge — his public call for all the major Iraqi political leaders to assemble someplace outside Baghdad for round-the-clock talks "until there is an agreement and white smoke comes out of the chimney."

A day later the politicians announced they would open face-to-face negotiations — in Baghdad.

Some of them, speaking anonymously because they feared angering Khalilzad, said his arm-twisting behind the scenes is more intense.

"While you are taking your time with a government, we (Americans) have lost lives and money. You need to hurry up," one of them quoted Khalilzad as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0019009

Said another, again quoting the ambassador: "Your failure (to form a government) means failure of the whole American policy in the region, a failure for President Bush. There is a major crisis and you must hurry."

So far, however, the meetings reportedly haven't progressed much beyond talking about talks.

There have been inconclusive discussions about forming a national security council to take major decisions out of the hands of individual politicians. That would have allowed Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who faces intense opposition from Sunnis, Kurds and some fellow Shiites, to serve a titular second term with his powers much diminished.

The difficulty in forming a new government had been widely reported to center on al-Jaafari's candidacy to stay on as prime minister. But after three sessions over the past week, the politicians spoke of problems far more widespread than the dispute over al-Jaafari.

"The political crisis that is surrounding us is much deeper than that," said Planning Minister Barham Saleh, a Kurd. "There is no doubt that there is sectarian and ethnic entrenchment in the country even while politicians try to overcome that."

But Khalilzad appears, on the surface at least, unfazed by the difficulties as he urges patience from a U.S. population increasingly eager to be done with Iraq.

"These conversations have been the most serious that I have seen since I've been here in the course of the last seven or eight months," he said. "I think it will take a few more weeks."

Then would come the test of the U.S. theory that a unity government can solve Iraq's problems.

What We've Gained In 3 Years In Iraq (WP)

By Donald H. Rumsfeld

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Some have described the situation in Iraq as a tightening noose, noting that "time is not on our side"and that "morale is down." Others have described a "very dangerous" turn of events and are "extremely concerned."

Who are they that have expressed these concerns? In fact, these are the exact words of terrorists discussing Iraq -- Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and his associates -- who are describing their own situation and must be watching with fear the progress that Iraq has made over the past three years.

The terrorists seem to recognize that they are losing in Iraq. I believe that history will show that to be the case.

Fortunately, history is not made up of daily headlines, blogs on Web sites or the latest sensational attack. History is a bigger picture, and it takes some time and perspective to measure accurately.

Consider that in three years Iraq has gone from enduring a brutal dictatorship to electing a provisional government to ratifying a new constitution written by Iraqis to electing a permanent government last December. In each of these elections, the number of voters participating has increased significantly -- from 8.5 million in the January 2005 election to nearly 12 million in the December election -- in defiance of terrorists' threats and attacks.

One of the most important developments over the past year has been the increasing participation of Iraq's Sunni community in the political process. In the volatile Anbar province, where Sunnis are an overwhelming majority, voter turnout grew from 2 percent in January to 86 percent in December. Sunni sheiks and religious leaders who previously had been sympathetic to the insurgency are today meeting with coalition representatives, encouraging Iraqis to join the security forces and waging what violent extremists such as Abu al-Zarqawi and his al-Qaeda followers recognize as a "large-scale war" against them.

The terrorists are determined to stoke sectarian tension and are attempting to spark a civil war. But despite the many acts of violence and provocation, the vast majority of Iraqis have shown that they want their country to remain whole and free of ethnic conflict. We saw this last month after the attack on the Shiite shrine in Samarra, when leaders of Iraq's various political parties and religious groups condemned the violence and called for calm.

Another significant transformation has been in the size, capability and responsibility of Iraqi security forces. And this is vitally important, because it is Iraqis, after all, who must build and secure their own nation.

Today, some 100 Iraqi army battalions of several hundred troops each are in the fight, and 49 control their own battle space. About 75 percent of all military operations in the country include Iraqi security forces, and nearly half of those are independently Iraqi-planned, Iraqi-conducted and Iraqi-led. Iraqi security forces have a greater ability than coalition troops to detect a foreign terrorist's accent, identify local suspects and use force without increasing a feeling of occupation. It was these Iraqi forces -- not U.S. or coalition troops -- that enforced curfews and contained the violence after the attack on the Golden Dome Shrine in Samarra. To be sure, violence of various stripes continues to slow Iraq's progress. But the coalition is doing everything possible to see this effort succeed and is making adjustments as appropriate.

The rationale for a free and democratic Iraq is as compelling today as it was three years ago. A free and stable Iraq will not attack its neighbors, will not conspire with terrorists, will not pay rewards to the families of suicide bombers and will not seek to kill Americans.

Though there are those who will never be convinced that the cause in Iraq is worth the costs, anyone looking realistically at the world today -- at the terrorist threat we face -- can come to only one conclusion: Now is the time for resolve, not retreat.

Consider that if we retreat now, there is every reason to believe Saddamists and terrorists will fill the vacuum -- and the free world might not have the will to face them again. Turning our backs on postwar Iraq today would be the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis. It would be as great a disgrace as if we had asked the liberated nations of Eastern Europe to return to Soviet domination because it was too hard or too tough or we didn't have the patience to work with them as they built free countries.

What we need to understand is that the vast majority of the Iraqi people want the coalition to succeed. They want better futures for themselves and their families. They do not want the extremists to win. And they are risking their lives every day to secure their country.

That is well worth remembering on this anniversary of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

The writer is secretary of defense.

A Top-Down Review For The Pentagon (NYT)

By Paul D. Eaton

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

Fox Island, Wash.

DURING World War II, American soldiers en route to Britain before D-Day were given a pamphlet on how to behave while awaiting the invasion. The most important quote in it was this: "It is impolite to criticize your host; it is militarily stupid to criticize your allies."

By that rule, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld is not competent to lead our armed forces. First, his failure to build coalitions with our allies from what he dismissively called "old Europe" has imposed far greater demands and risks on our soldiers in Iraq than necessary. Second, he alienated his allies in our own military, ignoring the advice of seasoned officers and denying subordinates any chance for input.

In sum, he has shown himself incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically, and is far more than anyone else responsible for what has happened to our important mission in Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld must step down.

In the five years Mr. Rumsfeld has presided over the Pentagon, I have seen a climate of groupthink become dominant and a growing reluctance by experienced military men and civilians to challenge the notions of the senior leadership.

I thought we had a glimmer of hope last November when Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, faced off with Mr. Rumsfeld on the question of how our soldiers should react if they witnessed illegal treatment of prisoners by Iraqi authorities. (General Pace's view was that our soldiers should intervene, while Mr. Rumsfeld's position was that they should simply report the incident to superiors.)

Unfortunately, the general subsequently backed down and supported the secretary's call to have the rules clarified, giving the impression that our senior man in uniform is just as intimidated by Secretary Rumsfeld as was his predecessor, Gen. Richard Myers.

Mr. Rumsfeld has put the Pentagon at the mercy of his ego, his cold warrior's view of the world and his unrealistic confidence in technology to replace manpower. As a result, the Army finds itself severely undermanned — cut to 10 active divisions but asked by the administration to support a foreign policy that requires at least 12 or 14.

Only Gen. Eric Shinseki, the Army chief of staff when President Bush was elected, had the courage to challenge the downsizing plans. So Mr. Rumsfeld retaliated by naming General Shinseki's successor more than a year before his scheduled retirement, effectively undercutting his authority. The rest of the senior brass got the message, and nobody has complained since.

Now the Pentagon's new Quadrennial Defense Review shows that Mr. Rumsfeld also fails to understand the nature of protracted counterinsurgency warfare in Iraq and the demands it places on ground forces. The document, amazingly, does not call for enlarging the Army; rather, it increases only our Special Operations forces, by a token 15 percent, maybe 1,500 troops.

Mr. Rumsfeld has also failed in terms of operations in Iraq. He rejected the so-called Powell Doctrine of overwhelming force and sent just enough tech-enhanced troops to complete what we called Phase III of the war — ground combat against the uniformed Iraqis. He ignored competent advisers like Gen. Anthony Zinni and others who predicted that the Iraqi Army and security forces might melt away after the state apparatus self-destructed, leading to chaos.

It is all too clear that General Shinseki was right: several hundred thousand men would have made a big difference then, as we began Phase IV, or country reconstruction. There was never a question that we would make quick work of the Iraqi Army.

The true professional always looks to the "What's next?" phase. Unfortunately, the supreme commander, Gen. Tommy Franks, either didn't heed that rule or succumbed to Secretary Rumsfeld's bullying. We won't know which until some bright historian writes the true story of Mr. Rumsfeld and the generals he took to war, an Iraq version of the Vietnam War classic "Dereliction of Duty" by H. R. McMaster.

Last, you don't expect a secretary of defense to be criticized for tactical ineptness. Normally, tactics are the domain of the soldier on the ground. But in this case we all felt what L. Paul Bremer, the former viceroy in Iraq, has called the "8,000-mile screwdriver" reaching from the Pentagon. Commanders in the field had their discretionary financing for things like rebuilding hospitals and providing police uniforms randomly cut; money to pay Iraqi construction firms to build barracks was withheld; contracts we made for purchasing military equipment for the new Iraqi Army were rewritten back in Washington.

Donald Rumsfeld demands more than loyalty. He wants fealty. And he has hired men who give it. Consider the new secretary of the Army, Francis Harvey, who when faced with the compelling need to increase the service's size has refused to do so. He is instead relying on the shell game of hiring civilians to do jobs that had previously been done by soldiers, and thus keeping the force strength static on paper. This tactic may help for a bit, but it will likely fall apart in the next budget cycle, with those positions swiftly eliminated.

So, what to do?

First, President Bush should accept the offer to resign that Mr. Rumsfeld says he has tendered more than once, and hire a man who will listen to and support the magnificent soldiers on the ground. Perhaps a proven Democrat like Senator Joseph Lieberman could repair fissures that have arisen both between parties and between uniformed men and the Pentagon big shots.

More vital in the longer term, Congress must assert itself. Too much power has shifted to the executive branch, not just in terms of waging war but also in planning the military of the future. Congress should remember it still has the power of the purse; it should call our generals, colonels, captains and sergeants to testify frequently, so that their opinions and needs are known to the men they lead. Then when they are asked if they have enough troops — and no soldier has ever had enough of anything, more is always better — the reply is public.

Our most important, and sometimes most severe, judges are our subordinates. That is a fact I discovered early in my military career. It is, unfortunately, a lesson Donald Rumsfeld seems incapable of learning.

What Will Happen Next In Iraq? (KCS)

By Ramesh Ponnuru

The Kansas City Star, March 19, 2006

"I suspect the shape of the year to come is going to depend crucially on the next few weeks, particularly on whether there's a political settlement in Iraq. If that happens, then it is possible the security situation improves. If the political situation comes unglued, then we've lost the last great, positive thing we have going for us. That is a scenario for either civil war or some kind of ignominious kind of American retreat, followed by civil war.

"There is reason to hope. The political situation has been better than the security situation. The question is whether the fact that a civil war would serve no one's real interest will ultimately exert enough pressure to keep that (civil war) from happening."

U.S. Rep. Ike Skelton

Ranking Democrat, House Armed Services Committee

"Who has a crystal ball? Two things have to happen: You have to get the security situation under control and … all the ministries have to function, and the Iraqi people have to respond positively. If those two things don't happen, Humpty Dumpty will not be put together again, and you can bet your bottom dollar you will have a melee like you have never seen before.

"The American people strongly support the troops, (but) the support for the mission is beginning to wane. With some good luck, this can all come out at the end of the day with a responsible government and with Iraq forces quelling the violence. We're going to have to have good luck along with some hard work."

Danielle Pletka

Vice president, foreign and defense studies, American Enterprise Institute

"I expect a drawdown of American troops. It's hard to misread the signals that we're getting from the administration. I think the (Iraqi) government will be formed. They're taking a long time coming together, but this is a big challenge. With the security force on ground, they're going to get better because they've got the best training ground in the world, unfortunately.

"I think instinctively the American people want to bring the troops home. They don't want to bring troops home prematurely if they sense there's a political overlay to the decision-making. If it's timed for the midterm election, that's a reasonable thing for the American people to have some skepticism about. I think Americans have enormous staying power. They'd have liked the Bush administration to have been more competent. But they're not just going to throw the Iraqi people to their fates saying, 'Whoops. Sorry. That was a mistake.' "

John Pike

Director, GlobalSecurity.org, a defense and security information Web site

DOJ_NMG_0019012

"I think that over the next 12 months, the surprise-free scenario is that the American casualty rate drops by half and the American troop presence goes below 100,000. But this whole thing could fly apart in 48 hours. The whole thing could degenerate into a genocidal civil war very quickly, and political support for American troops (staying in Iraq after) getting caught in crossfire could collapse pretty fast. You could see political support for this in Washington collapse very quickly if there was no discernible purpose for the American presence there.

"I think we're going to bomb Iran over the next year or two. What impact is that going to have on Iraq? That's hard to say. It has to be in the back of everybody's mind as to how do we stay away from that probability."

Shibley Telhami

Anwar Sadat professor for peace and development, University of Maryland, and noted author of several books on the Middle East

"I opposed the war because we have the power to reshuffle the deck in Iraq, but we don't have the power to determine where the cards will fall. The cards are still falling. Once you dismantle a state, it is an uphill battle to reconstruct it. The forces at work are highly volatile and unpredictable. I wouldn't rule out that things could get better. I wouldn't rule out that things could get worse.

"The momentum is for more sectarian violence and civil war. Once you have central authority destroyed, all it takes is a determined minority that wants civil war. We have a determined minority that wants civil war. Even with the best of intentions, it is very difficult to overcome."

Paul Rieckhoff

Executive director and founder of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America, a nonpartisan group that favors a strong military and encourages veterans to run for office. An Army 1st lieutenant, he served a year in Iraq as an infantry platoon leader.

"What you are going to start to see that is most alarming is the real cost of the overextension of our military. Every active duty division has been through at least once. The numbers are starting to look like a drawdown (of troops). But it's not going to be because of the political stability in Iraq or the political pressure on Bush at home. The generals are going to sit down and say to him, 'You are going to have to choose, one or the other: Continue the level of engagement or keep our homeland secure.'

"Like when you were a kid and played 'Risk,' you only have a certain number of pieces to play."

Diminishing The U.S. Footprint (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Two important and related changes in the Bush administration's strategy for the long war on global terrorism emerged here last week. One tiptoed in quietly. The other came with trumpets blaring for political effect. It might have worked better the other way around.

The quiet change was suggested in classified briefings for friendly diplomats and visiting foreign officials: U.S. troops will be moving out of Iraq's streets and then out of Iraq's cities by the end of this year as part of a coordinated drawing down and concentration of all foreign forces. Troops from Italy and other nations will leave the country, and a reduced British force will redeploy into a smaller area of operational responsibility.

This is part of a new internal exit strategy that President Bush hinted at in Monday's Iraq speech. U.S. forces will stay in Iraq beyond 2006 to fight al-Qaeda and other Islamic extremists who are using Iraq as a platform for terrorism. Iraqi units -- operating with U.S. logistical assistance from remote locations and embedded command help -- are to be given primary responsibility for containing the domestic insurgency. This is what Bush calls Iraqis standing up to allow Americans to stand down.

Drawing lines between global and local terrorists will be a difficult task, as U.S. officials privately acknowledge. And Iraqi security forces and their political leaders, deadlocked in an intensifying power struggle, still must demonstrate they can carry out their part of the internal exit strategy.

But on its face, that strategy is a coherent way of reducing the foreign occupation footprint that fuels much of the conflict in Iraq. It realistically scales down what Iraqi units can be expected to accomplish: a long-term containment of terrorist attacks to a level that does not destroy the country's fraying ethnic and sectarian balances, rather than a quick final victory over the rebels. Finally, an internal exit is consistent with the administration's newest National Security Strategy white paper, released with fanfare Thursday.

The White House has struggled since Sept. 11, 2001, to define with precision both the enemy that Americans confront and the path to victory they must take in the war on terrorism. The Bush team gets closer with this exercise, which portrays the long war as a global ideological struggle that hinges on a battle of ideas within and about Islam.

That is change: The words "ideology" and "Islam" were each mentioned only twice, and in passing, in the 12,629-word version of the strategy document issued in 2002. They are at the conceptual heart of this year's paper (longer by one-third), which argues that Washington and its allies must "counter the lies behind the terrorists' ideology" by empowering "the very people the terrorists most want to exploit: the faithful followers of Islam. . . . Responsible Islamic leaders need to denounce an ideology that distorts and exploits Islam for destructive ends and defiles a proud religion."

Bush himself steered drafters away from any discussion of Islam in the earlier paper, I am told, and his concern about attacking another religion is reflected in a caveat this year that "the War on Terror is a battle of ideas . . . not a battle of religions." But this year's realistic acknowledgment of the decisive role of moderate Muslims in defeating al-Qaeda and its allies is a welcome adjustment.

The heavy emphasis on ideology -- explicitly al-Qaeda's and implicitly Bush's -- is less useful. By proposing democracy as a cure-all for the vast frustrations and delusions of al-Qaeda's target audience, the White House skips over a lot of the hard work that must still be done to shape the military and political battlefields of the long war, trying instead to rally U.S. and foreign support for Iraq and Afghanistan.

A new tone of realism about those conflicts has taken hold in internal administration discussions of the way forward. Nothing could reassure Americans more than publicizing that change.

The intensity of the power struggle in Baghdad was brought home to me when my phone rang shortly after a column reporting that Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari is fighting to keep his job was published last week. The president of Iraq, Jalal Talabani, was calling to say that he, too, is dug in: The Shiite alliance that backs Jafari should present an alternative candidate so a "national unity" government can be formed "in the next two weeks."

Talabani, an acquaintance of 30 years, would not discuss his reasons for opposing Jafari now. But speaking in English, he emphasized that the presidency needs new powers to block "extreme demands from the other side."

As they say, stay tuned.

Bleakness In Baghdad (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

At this moment, one of the most dangerous since World War II, America's perils are exacerbated by the travails of a president indiscriminately despised by Democrats and increasingly disregarded by Republicans. What should he do?

First, concentrate the public's mind on the deepening dangers beyond Iraq. Second, regarding Iraq, accentuate the negative and eliminate the positive -- that is, emphasize the dangers of failure and de-emphasize talk about Iraq's becoming a democracy that ignites emulative transformation in the Middle East.

The dangers? Iran's regime proceeds with its drive for nuclear weapons, unfazed by threats of "isolation." North Korea has received less attention lately than have Denmark and Dubai. In Afghanistan, according to Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, "insurgents now represent a greater threat to the expansion of Afghan government authority than at any point since late 2001." That government has an army of only 35,000 for a country nearly 50 percent larger than Iraq. The insurgency, by draining the government's energy, serves the lords of the heroin trade that accounts for at least a third of Afghanistan's gross national product.

But more than any presidency in living memory, George W. Bush's will be judged by a single problem -- Iraq, where on May 30 the war will be twice as long as was U.S. involvement in World War I. Today the impotence of Iraq's quasi-government is prompting ethnic recleansing: The government is too weak to prevent private groups from pursuing coercive reversals of Saddam Hussein's various ethnic cleansings. And in the absence of law and order, Iraqis seek safety in sectarian clustering.

Maples delicately says that although Iraq is not "at this time" in a civil war, "the underlying conditions" for such a war "are present." But civil wars do not usually begin with an identifiable event, such as the firing on Fort Sumter, or proceed to massed, uniformed forces clashing in battles like Shiloh. Iraq's civil war -- which looks more like Spain's in the 1930s -- began months ago.

In Spain, the security forces were united and in three years were victorious. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Gen. John Abizaid, U.S. commander in the Middle East, recently said that Iraqi forces would cope with a civil war "to the extent they're able to" (Rumsfeld) and "they'll handle it with our help" (Abizaid). Their problematic assumption is that Iraq's security forces have a national loyalty and will not fracture along the fissures of Iraq's sectarian society.

Tom Ricks, military correspondent for The Post, has doubts. He recently returned from his fifth visit to Iraq. In March 2003 he thought that the invasion was a strategic mistake in the struggle against terrorism. His assessment of subsequent events is the title of his book, coming in September: "Fiasco." Now, however, he thinks that a U.S. withdrawal would leave chaos that might lead to radical Islamists acquiring what they most want: Saudi oil fields and Pakistani nuclear weapons. So America, he thinks, needs a plan to reduce fatalities to two or three a week, then two or three a month.

But who, he wonders, will control the likes of Moqtada al-Sadr? Imagine, Ricks says, another cleric, the Rev. Al Sharpton, controlling the Bronx with a militia he can call into the streets at any time. Last Monday, when Bush again celebrated Iraq's progress from tyranny to December's "elections for a fully constitutional government," this was life in Iraq, as reported by the New York Times:

"Shiite vigilantes seized four men suspected of terrorist attacks, interrogated them, beat them, killed them and left their bodies dangling from lampposts. . . . In Sadr City, the Shiite slum in Baghdad where the terrorist suspects were executed, government forces have vanished. The streets are ruled by aggressive teenagers with shiny soccer jerseys and machine guns. They set up roadblocks and poke their heads into cars and detain whomever they want. . . . 'This is our government now,' [a retired teacher] said, nodding toward Mr. Sadr's glowering face on television."

Conditions in Iraq have worsened in the 94 days that have passed since Iraq's elections in December. And there still is no Iraqi government that can govern. By many measures conditions are worse than they were a year ago, when they were worse than they had been the year before.

Three years ago the administration had a theory: Democratic institutions do not just spring from a hospitable culture, they can also create such a culture. That theory has been a casualty of the war that began three years ago today.

The Stuff That Happened (NYT)

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

Three years ago, the United States invaded Iraq. We can all run the story through our minds: Shock and Awe, Coalition of the Willing, Mission Accomplished, looting, "Stuff happens," no W.M.D., suicide bombers, purple fingers, blasted shrine.

Many who supported the invasion have taken this anniversary to argue that it all would have been worthwhile if things had been run better. They argue that if the coalition forces had been large enough to actually secure the country, to keep insurgents from raiding Saddam Hussein's ammunition depots, to give the people a sense of safety, the country might well be on the road to a hopeful future.

We doubt it. The last three years have shown how little our national leaders understood Iraq, and have reminded us how badly attempts at liberation from the outside have gone in the past. Given where we are now, the question of whether a botched invasion created a lost opportunity might be moot, except for one thing. The man who did the botching, Donald Rumsfeld, is still the secretary of defense.

The generals on the ground understood what a disaster they were creating in the pell-mell race to Baghdad, which left in its wake an entire country full of places where Saddam Hussein's loyalists could regroup and prepare to carry on a permanent war against the Americans and their fellow Iraqis. As the new book "Cobra II" by Michael Gordon of The Times and Bernard Trainor underscores, the generals in the field were overruled by directives from Washington, where military decisions were being made by men who were guided not by reality, but by their own beloved myths about what Iraq was like and how the war was going to be won.

Chances are that at the time George W. Bush did not have an inkling of how badly he was being served by the decision makers at the Pentagon. But the fact that Mr. Rumsfeld continues to hold his job tells us that Mr. Bush doesn't care, that he prefers living in the same dream world that his secretary of defense inhabits.

In their wishful thinking, Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld undoubtedly tell themselves what they tell us: that the Iraqi people are better off than they were under the brutal dictator, that the Iraqi security forces are gradually learning how to take over defense of their own country and that a unified government is still a good possibility. It's true that many Iraqis are better off. Others are in far worse straits — their homes have been ruined, their relatives killed, their jobs evaporated and their ability to walk the streets in safety obliterated. Women's rights are being threatened in the south, and sectarian warfare has put families with mixed Shiite-Sunni ancestry at risk in their own neighborhoods. It is hard to quantify relative degrees of misery and pain in these circumstances. But unlike the horrors of Saddam Hussein, the horrors of the present can be laid at America's doorstep.

If the mission in Iraq was to create a stable democracy in the heart of the Middle East and inspire neighboring countries to follow the same path, the results have been crushingly bad — unless Mr. Bush regards the election of Palestinian terrorists as the leaders in Gaza and the West Bank as a step forward. Iran is extending its sway by the hour. In Afghanistan, American forces are too thin to do much more than protect the central government in downtown Kabul.

The idea that Iraqi security forces are poised to take over the job of protecting the people in a unified country is almost ludicrous. Many of those forces are actually sectarian militias that have been armed by the coalition forces, but not changed by them. So far, attempts at creating a government that could bring the country some modicum of stability have fallen apart. There are no leaders with the strength or credibility or even desire to rally anyone but their own co-religionists or ethnic group.

When Americans ask themselves whether anything has been accomplished in Iraq, they do take note that there have been no terrorist attacks on American soil since 9/11. That has been an enormous blessing, for which law enforcement officials can offer no explanation other than somewhat perplexed guesses. It's possible that the chaos in Iraq has distracted Al Qaeda, diverting its energy to fomenting civil war between Sunnis and Shiites in the heart of the Middle East. If that is so, we may have bought short-term peace while creating a training ground for terrorists and a no man's land where they can operate with impunity.

The Iraq debacle ought to serve as a humbling lesson for future generations of American leaders — although, if our leaders were capable of being humbled, they could have simply looked back to Vietnam. For the present, our goal must be to minimize the damage, through the urgent diplomacy of the current ambassador and forceful reminders that American forces are not prepared to remain for one day in a country whose leaders prefer civil war to peaceful compromise.

While we are distracted by picking up the pieces, there is no time to imagine what the world might be like if George Bush had chosen to see things as they were instead of how he wanted them to be three years ago. History will have more time to consider the question.

Shock, Awe And Humility (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

THREE YEARS AGO TODAY, Iraqis were "shocked and awed" by the power of the U.S. military. Today, Americans are shocked and awed by its limits. If the "cakewalks" of the 1980s and 1990s — Grenada, the Gulf War, Kosovo — restored America's belief in its omnipotence, so badly shaken in Vietnam, the occupation of Iraq has been a humbling letdown.

With a mere 38% of the public still thinking that the war is going well, and more than 2,300 U.S. troops dead, it's become fashionable for the war's initial supporters to have second thoughts. We opposed the decision to go to war. But we will resist the temptation to be fashionable and will take this opportunity to at least concede that the Bush administration's actions were rooted in a strain of American idealism most often identified with Woodrow Wilson. The decision to topple Saddam Hussein's regime was a Wilsonian attempt to preserve the notion of collective security; even more idealistically, it was an attempt to create an oasis of American-style democracy and prosperity that would alter the complexion of the entire region.

So much for the vision. The reality has been — to use a term from another unpopular war — a quagmire. Bush's messianic idealism was never justified, and in any event the administration's flawed execution would have undermined his purpose. The list of gaffes is by now distressingly familiar: the flawed intelligence on weapons of mass destruction, the lack of sufficient troops, the tainted contracting process and so on.

To be fair, Washington has persevered in its quest to create a representative democracy in Iraq. But American surprise at the unfolding Sunni-Shiite schism, and our lack of preparedness to deal with the early dismantlement of the Iraqi military, have made the world's reigning superpower look, once again, oddly naive.

And though it pledges to "stay the course" in Iraq, the Bush administration has long since fled the battlefield of ideas. It embarrassingly resorts only to Orwellian talk of a "war on terror" instead of addressing real issues, and its claims of relentless success are not to be taken seriously.

Most opponents of the war are hardly in a position to gloat about American difficulties in Iraq. Russia, France and Germany all cynically manipulated the run-up to the war for their own purposes, and they comforted Hussein by allowing him to believe that the international community would never take concerted action against him. And much of the mocking by Bush critics about the supposed absurdity of the administration's claims about weapons of mass destruction is revisionist nonsense. As the New York Times reported last Sunday, Hussein's own top military commanders were stunned to learn three months before the start of the war that they had no WMD at their disposal. There is a Shakespearean quality to the tale of the dictator bluffing his way to his own demise, and it's hard for those of us who opposed the war to bemoan his removal.

As it enters its fourth year, the war in Iraq defies simplistic characterizations from both ends of the political spectrum. The heroism of U.S. forces and of ordinary Iraqis going about their daily lives is inspiring. But the future of Iraq remains shrouded in gray uncertainty.

Veterans' Voices on Iraq (WP)

Washington Post, March 19, 2006

The heat, which is like living under a french-fry lamp, like standing in front of the world's biggest hair dryer, like sitting in a sealed car on the hottest summer day in Washington with the heater blasting and someone throwing sand in your face.

The mud, which follows the hot season, cold, slimy, sticky mud that makes you wish it would turn hot again.

DOJ_NMG_0019016

The green that erupts after a spring rain and astounds you the first time you see it. The blue of the timeless sky above and beyond all the troubles. The black of the inky desert night, thickly dusted with stars and galaxies.

The eyes of the children.

These are some of the things they remember from their service in Iraq.

Over the past year, The Washington Post conducted in-depth interviews with 100 of the more than 500,000 veterans of the war. They included men and women, officers and enlisted, active-duty and reserves, combat and support troops. The questions were open-ended. The intent was to hear from them, in their own words, what the experience was like.

They remembered the camel spiders, big, fast and scary-looking. The sand flies, scorpions, mosquitoes and flying crickets. The long, hard days -- 12-hour shifts that easily turn into 20-hour shifts when they don't turn into round-the-clock marathons.

They remembered the roaring metal of System of a Down and Adema, the throbbing rap of Public Enemy and 50 Cent, the soldier-celebrating anthems of Toby Keith:

And I can't call in sick on Mondays/When the weekend's been too strong/I just work straight through the holidays/And sometimes all night long. . . .

Stringing Xbox cables from bunk to bunk to play Madden football or Tony Hawk skateboarding games in the two-man residential trailers known as "cans." Visiting the "hadji marts," clusters of enterprising Iraqis who sell everything from bootleg DVDs to rotgut alcohol on the roadside just beyond the wire of nearly every camp. Watching an entire season of "The Simpsons" or "CSI" or "Saved by the Bell" on your laptop. Watching your baby grow up via e-mail and webcam.

Wondering how honest to be with the folks back home. You don't want them to worry. So you try to sound cheerfully vague and remind them to send gummy candies, which don't melt, rather than chocolates, which do. But all that loving deception ends in a whoosh if a mortar hits during a telephone call to Mom.

Iraq was bad, nearly all of them agreed. "Not knowing day to day what was going to happen." "Hard to figure out who the enemy was." "Never being able to relax." "The rules are that there are no rules."

But it was not bad in the ways they see covered in the media -- the majority also agreed on this. What they experienced was more complex than the war they saw on television and in print. It was dangerous and confused, yes, but most of the vets also recalled enemies routed, buildings built and children befriended, against long odds in a poor and demoralized country. "We feel like we're doing something, and then we look at the news and you feel like you're getting bashed." "It seems to me the media had a predetermined script." The vibe of the coverage is just "so, so, so negative."

No two sets of memories were identical. This almost goes without saying, but not quite, because it underscores a point made by many of the veterans. Some of the deepest impressions left over from Iraq were not the externals -- the sights, sounds, smells, scenes -- but the internal marks. In Iraq, they saw, did and endured things they hadn't seen, done or imagined before, and this affected each one uniquely.

"Each individual over there has his own little war he is fighting," Army medic Joe Drennan explained. "No two people are going to have the same experiences." These personal wars add up to the war they share.

* * * A lot depended on when they were over there.

The invasion -- three years ago today -- was a blur, pulsing with excitement and wired on Adderall. Invasion vets remembered villages of blank-faced Iraqis lining the roads as the armor sped past, and ranks of empty Iraqi tanks bombed out in the desert, and busloads of men in civilian clothes suddenly opening fire, and a sandstorm so thick they could hardly see their hands in front of their faces.

Arriving in Baghdad, "I had an Iraqi citizen come up to me," said Lance Cpl. Daniel Finn, a Marine infantryman. "She was a female. She opened her mouth and she had no tongue. She was pointing at the statue" of Saddam Hussein. "There were people with no fingers, waving at the statue of Saddam, telling us he tortured them. People were showing us the scars on their backs."

After the initial victory came lean months when the war had too much death and not enough infrastructure. Troops slept in their armored trucks -- if their trucks were armored. They ate cold chow and drank hot water and dug pit toilets where they suffered "Saddam's revenge." They scraped the grime from their skin with baby wipes mailed from home. No one had planned for so many Americans to live in Iraq for so long.

Little by little, the cans arrived with their cushioned bunks and air conditioning. Showers and restrooms were built. Apart from the improvised explosive devices, the ambushes, the suicide bombers and the mortar attacks, life became sort of bearable. Rec centers opened with large-screen TVs and air-hockey tables. Dining halls began serving hot food and icy sodas.

Once-a-week phone calls home gave way to broadband Internet connections. Movie theaters and coffee bars opened. Gyms were built on most bases.

"The great stress reliever was exercise" -- veterans reported this again and again. Opportunities for sex apparently varied from one part of the country to another, and drinking was forbidden. A few veterans admitted that they had a swig, or more, of bootlegged or smuggled booze. But the most common way to vent the tension was to pump iron and work the cardio machines for an hour or two at the end of a long day.

With a few exceptions, the veterans described a highly professional, almost spartan force, characterized by resilient morale and good discipline. "I didn't touch a girl or alcohol for seven months, and that was tough," said Sgt. Christopher Johnson of the Marine Reserve. Many said they were ready to return to Iraq.

* * * In some ways, they talked about a war much like all wars for all troops in all times. It was a test, personal and elemental. To understand it, you must go through it; no words could entirely convey the experience to those who were not there. Many veterans described a moment, different for each person, when the test boiled down to a single yes-or-no question -- again, slightly different for each person.

Would you fight or flee? Would you crack under pressure? Would you shoot or freeze? Was it better to know that you hit your target, or not to know?

Army Staff Sgt. Christopher Day spoke of wondering "what I would do when I start getting shot at. Will I fire back or curl in a ball? And sure enough, I fired back right away."

The reason he fired back was also timeless. "It was not so much for myself, but for the guys beside me," Day said. "I was shooting and trying to kill the people that were trying to kill my friends."

He used the word "friends." Others preferred family terms. GIs talked about their "brothers." Officers spoke of their "kids." The intense bonds they formed had little to do with like-mindedness and everything to do with shared risk and mutual dependence.

"Soldiers are nonpartisan," explained Staff Sgt. Larry Gill of the National Guard. "We could give a rat's heehaw about same-sex marriage or other issues. We're given a job to do, and you go out and do your job. Because if you don't, someone's going to get hurt or die."

The officers are often gung-ho. "We are professionals," said Capt. Tyler McIntyre of the Army headquarters staff. "If you just step back, give us some breathing space, let us do our job, we'll get it done."

The enlisted troops, sometimes less so. You "meet a lot of active-duty hoorah guys and then some of us who were National Guardsmen who weren't so sure why we were there," said Spec. Amy Capistran, a mechanic with the Virginia National Guard. In other ways, it has been a war like no other.

Civilian contractors performed many of the support roles that would have been handled by GIs in past wars. Some of these were menial jobs few would have wanted. Other contractors did security work. To many troops, it didn't seem fair that these mercenaries earned big salaries and could party after work.

Technology shaped the war experience in ways both good and bad. The distance between troops and their families was closed by e-mail and satellites and instant messages and blogs. But officers worried constantly that families might discover bad news inadvertently. The bad news as of this weekend was 2,313 killed and 17,124 wounded.

The presence of women in a wider variety of roles also sets the Iraq war apart. Commanders have struggled, in some cases, to know how to manage a coed military. 1st Lt. Tanya Lawrence-Riggins of the Army National Guard said she and the other women in her unit had to bathe outdoors, screened by parked trucks, because an active-duty commanding officer didn't want them in the showers.

Other women complained that every friendship they formed with a male soldier was grist for gossip. "The rumor mill was horrific," said National Guard Lt. Connie Woodyard, whose husband served at another base in Iraq. "I was just like, 'I'm not getting that much sex! If I were, I'd like war a whole lot more.' "

* * * The difference between a hot day and a cold day in Iraq is more than 100 degrees. The historical sites are among the oldest in the world -- the ruins of Babylon, Nineveh and Ur. The poverty in some places is appalling. Iraq is an extreme land, where American troops must cope with extremity.

Extremes of doubt: "It was hard to figure out who the enemy was. Everyone practically looks the same and dresses the same. You didn't know who was a terrorist and who was not," said Spec. Greg Seely, a Virginia National Guardsman.

Extremes of emotion: "The bombs were everywhere," said Army Staff Sgt. John Thomas. "You feel like you are in a movie. You drive through the town, you see the women out in the fields, and children and other people are on the roofs watching. They are waiting on the roofs to see you get blown up."

Extremes of angst: "It's a lot harder than what a lot of people think, especially if you have a family," said Navy Corpsman Nathanial Slenker. "You're worried about your family. About the friends that you're there with. You worry about yourself and your ability to keep handling situations. You're constantly worrying."

Iraqis See Long Road To Recovery (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraqis interviewed on the streets of Baghdad on the eve of the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion said it will take at least a decade, maybe longer, to get their country on its feet.

After three years of war and with no signs of the conflict in Iraq ending soon, many Iraqis said they had lost confidence in their political leadership's ability to pull the country together.

"Saddam [Hussein] was a dictator, it was one-party rule, but now we have 60 parties running the country," said 55-year-old Falah Hassan, referring to the multiple political factions that make up the main political alliances in the national assembly. Tomorrow marks the third anniversary of the invasion that toppled Saddam.

"We don't want to say Saddam is better than this, but the situation is bad," said Mr. Hassan, fingering his Muslim prayer beads as he stood in the entrance of his small hardware store in Baghdad's busy shopping district of Karrada.

"It will not be less than 10 years" before Iraq is back to normal, and we will once again feel safe, Mr. Hassan said.

For 30-year-old Ayad Khaz Ali, who works in Baghdad's leather district selling custom-made leather coats, getting rid of Saddam was like being let out of a cage.

"We felt happy when the dictator fell, but the ones who took that happiness away are the terrorists," he said, adding that business had dropped off as death and violence has dominated the streets.

"We just blame our government and security systems, because they are not doing anything to get rid of the terror here in Iraq," Mr. Ali said.

But he denied that there was a civil war.

"Our brothers are getting killed every day, Shi'ites and Sunnis. But [civil war] must start from the bedroom, because there are a lot of mixed marriages here -- that will never happen," he said.

Despite the mistakes Mr. Ali felt the American-led coalition has made in Iraq, such as disbanding the army, he called on them to stay until Iraq had a leader with a "steel fist" capable of stopping the violence.

"If they left now, it would be a victory for the terrorists," he said.

Others say civil war is already under way, and point out that even repeated curfews have failed to stop sectarian slayings and car bombs that continue to explode daily in the capital.

"Civil war exists right now, but it has not been announced," said Ali Faris, who works in a cigar shop in the once-upscale business district of Arasat.

"It will take 10 years or more to fix Iraq -- if we don't break out in full-scale civil war," he said.

Mr. Faris said the Americans are the only ones who have enough power to roll back the violence. "If the U.S. destroyed the Soviet Union, can they not fix Iraq?" he asked.

The United States currently has about 130,000 troops in Iraq, and last week deployed to the Baghdad area an additional battalion task force from its "call-forward force" in Kuwait.

Life is much more peaceful in the Shi'ite dominated south and Kurdish north, with businesses open late and few of the horrific bombs and attacks that prevail in the strongly Sunni and religiously mixed areas of central Iraq.

Najeeb Hanoudi, an Iraqi Catholic in his 70s who grew up side by side with Muslims in the now-troubled city of Mosul, said the solution to Iraq's lethal triple insurgency of nationalists, former Ba'athists and al Qaeda was not easy, but it was possible.

"They can be bought off," he said, smoking calmly in a Baghdad hotel coffee shop. "You can buy people here by three methods: money, women and food. Every Iraqi, including myself, is amenable to this sort of treatment." All except the al Qaeda group, led by the Jordanian-born Islamic extremist Abu Musab Zarqawi, he said.

"They are the most dangerous. They don't care about human life. They murder, they decapitate, and I don't know why," Mr. Hanoudi said.

A supporter of the Americans when they first arrived in Iraq and their removal of Saddam, Mr. Hanoudi is now much more reserved. His son was shot by U.S. troops, and despite U.S. attempts to help, his son now lies in a vegetative state.

"The current situation is chaotic, dangerous and very unpredictable in every aspect. I'm very sad that it has turned out to be like that," he said, sipping some milky coffee.

After an hour of talking, Mr. Hanoudi concluded: "I might have given a gloomy and pessimistic picture, but still, in the depths of my heart, I am cautiously optimistic for a better future, for freedom, prosperity and democracy for my children and grandchildren."

In military action yesterday, American and Iraqi troops pushing through a desolate area of Iraq's Sunni Arab heartland rounded up dozens more suspected insurgents, including the purported killers of a television journalist, U.S. and Iraqi officials told the Associated Press yesterday.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, a dozen more bodies were found as a shadowy war of Shi'ite-Sunni reprisals went on, and Shi'ite Muslim pilgrims heading to the holy city of Karbala again came under attack, with a roadside bomb killing one and wounding at least five, the AP reported.

How Do You Say Clueless? (WP)

By Muean Aljabiry

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

The noise of the C-130 was deafening. One week after the liberation of Iraq, I was bound for Baghdad. The plane's gray and red colors and the crew's khaki uniforms were in sharp contrast to the attires of the 20 or so passengers: State Department types in suits and ties, women in Eddie Bauer outfits, a few men in blue jeans. At the tail end of the plane, a young woman in uniform, her legs dangling from the edge, was "manning" a gun.

Bottled water and foam ear plugs were distributed to us. The tall cowboy from Oklahoma sitting next to me volunteered to show me how to knead the foam, in order to insert the plugs in my ears. I thanked him and introduced myself. Noticing my accent or the peculiarity of my name, he asked in a loud voice: "Where from?"

I mumbled a few words about being from Northern Virginia and added that I was born in Najaf.

He looked at me as if recalling someone he had known before. "Oh, that's India, right? Never been there, but someday I will." He shook my hand firmly and I learned that Bill was an Army Reserve lieutenant colonel being deployed to Baghdad to work with a unit dealing with civil affairs.

On the bus from the airport in Baghdad, I felt a mixture of exhilaration and nervousness. How, I wondered, would I reach the family with whom I had lost contact since the start of this war? They were unaware of my coming and I had no idea as to their safety or well-being.

The last time I had been on that road was back in October 1981, during the Iraq-Iran war, when, with a broken spirit, I had left Baghdad for the last time. After I had made "Rasheed Street," a film about the history of Baghdad's famous main street, Saddam Hussein's henchmen made me an offer that they said I should not refuse: to make a big budget film with an international cast about the life of the "great leader." Once I rejected their offer, they banned my film and made my life, and that of my family, very miserable. After spending a few days in jail and having all the money in my bank account confiscated, I left, promising never to return until the monster was gone. Now, the absolute thrill of being back in a free Iraq, liberated from that hideous regime, was so overwhelming that I shoved all my anxieties aside and contemplated my task ahead.

I was assigned by the State Department to interpret for the Baghdad Conference (to establish an interim government) and later to provide language support to both Barbara Bodine and retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, the two highest officials in postwar Iraq. I didn't know how the experiment would turn out. But as I arrived in Baghdad, I really believed the United States had an efficient, well-studied plan to put Iraq together after toppling the Saddam regime.

What I witnessed in the year or so I spent helping U.S. officials on the ground in Iraq, and what I have seen more recently, has made me doubtful about our competence for nation building, an exercise the United States initially claimed to have no interest in carrying out. Perhaps for that reason, America didn't seem to have studied Iraq's long history of repulsing occupiers. When the British attempted to build a nation in Mesopotamia at the end of World War I, it was confronted with a great revolt that continues to be a source of pride to Iraqis. I sometimes worry that, like the British enterprise, the U.S. effort to build a pluralistic, democratic society in Iraq will be remembered primarily for the insurgency it has spawned.

When we arrived from the airport, we were ushered into the Baghdad Convention Center, given flimsy mattresses and blankets and told to find a place to sleep. I tried to sleep but the acrid smell of burnt gasoline or rubber tires made it difficult to breathe. With no electricity and in the pitch darkness, everything was stirring in my mind like a film in fast forward. I imagined the voice of Lt. Col. Bill Kilgore from "Apocalypse Now" echoing across the halls of the Convention Center: "I love the smell of napalm in the morning . . . The smell, you know that gasoline smell . . . smelled like . . . victory . . . Someday this war's gonna end." Eventually I collapsed and fell into a deep, deep sleep.

The conference was reminiscent of the commotion in "Lawrence of Arabia," when the British officer T.E. Lawrence gathered the citizens of Damascus back in 1918. There were clerics in white and black turbans, men in traditional tribal headdress, and many who wore Western suits. As Garner addressed the gathering, the audience was shouting complaints about looting and the lack of security, electricity and other services. There was no semblance of order in the hall. Responding to his unruly audience's demands, Garner started assigning security functions to some of the clerics and the tribal sheiks. "Rebels, especially successful rebels, were of necessity bad subjects and worse governors," Lawrence wrote amid the chaos of liberated Damascus. It seemed that the same could be said of these Iraqi generals, clerics and chieftains.

Not long after, my new friend Lt. Col. Bill came to ask me to teach him a few words in Arabic. He said he was assigned to deal with the former Ministry of Culture and that he needed help to interact with its department heads. He inquired if Iraqis' "language" is different from that of Saudis. He wanted to know whether Iraqis say marhaba , instead of greeting each other with salaam alaikum as they do in Saudi Arabia. I managed to teach him how to say shukran, for thank you. And I promised him that learning one phrase per day would make him as good as a native speaker by the time we left Iraq. I could easily tell he did not get the cynicism in my promise.

The motorcade of the new Boss arrived at the main gate of the palace in mid-May. Many smartly dressed men and some women got out of their vehicles. I was trying to get a glimpse of this new presidential envoy, who was sent to make things right in Iraq. The gentleman in the blue suit, striped red tie and combat boots was L. Paul Bremer. He looked sharp even at this broiling temperature. I wondered how long it would be before he started dressing casually like Garner. To me, he looked like a new head of state and I knew that we'd be working closely together. I was assigned to be his interpreter.

It was the season of dreadful heat and dust storms in Baghdad. Bremer kept the massive number of Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) staff working almost nonstop. In addition to interpreting for him in his meetings with Iraqi political leaders, I kept a hectic schedule translating his documents and correspondence.

Nothing was working right in Baghdad. Electricity, water and other services were in short supply. My family, whom I had finally managed to contact, informed me of the terrible situation. They came to fetch me and on the way from the palace to their home, I asked my nephew to drive me through Rasheed Street. It was a ghost town, nothing like the lively street I had known and loved. My mind flashed to a deserted place in Arizona where they used to shoot westerns. I wondered how long it would take to transform this shabbiness into a city center like that of Beirut. U.S. resourcefulness will make this happen very soon, I told my nephew as he cursed the old regime.

At home with my family, I deeply felt the expanse that separated us for so many years. I, in the full comfort of my Virginia surroundings, and my entire family, in Saddam's abyss, were worlds apart. They complained about how bad things were. Food and services were scarce, but they all chipped in to load the dining room table with everything they knew I liked. They were joyful that the nightmare was over, but like most Iraqis lectured me that "you Americans" should do this and that in order to get Iraq moving in the right direction. I assured them of our efforts to institute democracy and revealed to them that we were forming a Governing Council. It would, I promised, lead the country into a true democracy.

My niece, Akila al-Hashimi, a French-educated senior career diplomat, declared that such a dream would unquestionably require some time. "In the conduct of our daily lives," she said, "we Iraqis must liberate ourselves of autocratic ideals, in order to make such a dream a reality." With immense enthusiasm, she pressed our family to do its share in the efforts to achieve this goal. Later, after I introduced her to Bodine and Bremer, she became a prominent member of the council.

Lt. Col. Bill came over to my office to enlist my help in finding him an interpreter. He complained that the officials of the former Ministry of Culture could not speak English. Pointing at a book on my desk, he asked, "So what is this book you are reading?"

"The bible," I started to say.

"But I thought you are Shia!" he cut me off.

I told him that the book, "The Old Social Classes and the Revolutionary Movements of Iraq," was Hanna Batatu's book on Iraq and that it was a must-read for anyone dealing with modern Iraq's political history.

Bill pulled from his back pocket a green paperback, published in the mid-'80s by Iraq's Ministry of Tourism and with a straight face told me, "All I need to know about Iraq is in here."

I yawned.

By then, the process of selecting members to the Governing Council was in full swing. Assorted Iraqi figures were delivered to the palace to be interviewed and evaluated for their political, social and economic views, as well as their attitudes toward the coalition. Often, I asked myself or my colleagues: Who nominated this person? Where did they find this woman? We had people who must have borrowed Col. Bill's book scouting cities and villages in Iraq for candidates to the "GC," as we came to call it. Those who did the recruiting had Arabic vocabularies approaching that of my friend Col. Bill, although their résumés attested to their fluency in Arabic.

From a helicopter, Baghdad looked dusty and pale ocher. In all directions, patches of palm groves dotted the landscape below. On one trip that summer, I found myself surveying the satellite dishes springing up from the roofs and wondered how TV and the Internet would affect future generations.

Iraq, I told the woman sitting across from me, finally had an open window from which to see the world. She was Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski, the commander of the Abu Ghraib prison, and she was taking a large group of coalition and U.N. officials along with several journalists to show off the newly refurbished and redecorated facility. "The sparkling cells," she told her audience that day, "are up to the highest international standards." Outside, and under the scorching sun, hundreds of inmates were gathered in an open-air camp. "Looters," she said, when a journalist asked why the inmates were sequestered there and not in the new cells. I wondered if they would furnish the prison with satellite televisions.

Iraqis are shrewd people. Those we dealt with fell into two very different groups: Those who had opposed Saddam and had just returned from exile and those who had remained in Iraq and had learned to survive by simply saying yes to anything the master said or did. As soon as those from the latter group felt a measure of safety, they unloosed an avalanche of criticism on their master. This tactic was so ingrained that they continued to use it in their dealings with us. But some U.S. officials exhibited a naivete or ignorance that was too glaring for the smart Iraqis, and communication suffered. I suspect that it continues to suffer.

One day I was invited to attend a luncheon for some Iraqi intellectuals in the convention center. The group comprised some university professors, writers, artists and clerics. They were recruited to support our efforts to convene the first session of the Governing Council. They spoke of their aspirations for the new Iraq and wondered about the makeup of the council.

"Iraq is a mosaic, very much like America," someone said. "We want to be the 51st state, and you have to help us," another pleaded. But the black-turbaned cleric from Karbala, who sat silent most of the meeting, finally spoke. "Your president had said that you will not be here one day beyond what is needed. We are very grateful to all your sacrifices to liberate us from Saddam's tyranny. You have to know that Iraq is the cradle of civilization and we gave the world a lot more than just oil. If oil is what you want, then take it and leave us to restore the structure of our society and our culture. You must start thinking of when to leave, for I swear by Allah, if you stay one day longer than what your president promised, we will fight you, men, women and children."

Everyone in the room was wordless. Lt. Col. Bill looked at me for help to break the silence.

Twenty-two men and three women formed the newly established Governing Council. They sat around a large oval table covered in green. The way they were seated was telling. The ambitious Shiite politicians Ahmed Chalabi, Ayad Allawi and Ibrahim al-Jafari sat at the head of the table. Rival Kurdish leaders Massoud Barzani and Jalal Talabani sat across from each other. Two men in tribal headgear sat at the far end of the table, while two women sat next to each other. I noticed my niece Akila sitting separately. Neither representatives of Iraq's political elites from the pre-Saddam era nor Iraqi military officers were present. Those who had not been annihilated by Saddam lived to be ignored by the Western powers. British diplomat John Sawers, the U.N. special representative Sergio Vieira de Mello and Bremer wished them success in leading the new Iraq to the shores of democracy and prosperity.

But an undertow was tugging in the other direction.

Much happened in the months that followed. Everyone in the palace worked heroically to bring a measure of stability and structure to the new Iraq. But reconstruction and budget issues took a toll and the problems of elusive electricity and long gasoline lines continued. The number of car bombs and assassinations escalated. Mortar shells started to come nearer and nearer to the Green Zone. We had insurgency in Fallujah. Al-Qaeda, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and Moqtada al-Sadr and his militia were thorny problems to reckon with and various parties maintained their own militias.

In September 2003, my niece Akila, while on her way to work, was shot in the abdomen by terrorists who attacked her two-car convoy. Bremer recently wrote that he received the news while dining in the United States with his wife and the Bushes. Mrs. Bremer suggested they pray for Akila, and they did. I went to the hospital with the CPA's surgeon general and we moved her to the Green Zone, but she later died of her wounds.

Members of the Governing Council continued to haggle endlessly over every issue. Every word and every sentence in the Transitional Administrative Law were surgically dissected into the late hours of the night. That it eventually passed to serve as the foundation for the country's first democratic constitution was one of Bremer's major achievements. I felt that finally -- despite Col. Bill, the death of Akila, the ruthless terrorists and feckless politicians -- we had done something right.

On June 28, 2004, I was in the studio dubbing a voiceover of the farewell speech delivered by Bremer; he was already on the plane leaving Iraq. A few days later, I too took the road to Baghdad's airport for my return to the United States. But this time, I promised my family and my friends that I would return. Maybe the sequel to that year would end more happily.

Fade to white.

My Iraqi Wedding (WP)

By Manal Omar

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019022

AMMAN, Jordan There was always a fear of sectarian violence in Iraq. But when I arrived in Baghdad almost three years ago, it was only that -- a fear. Back then, right after Saddam Hussein was toppled, the country was full of hope and optimism. And it was in that heady atmosphere that I found love when I met the Iraqi man to whom I am now married.

But the fear of sectarian strife became a searing reality for me last year, on the night before our wedding. Our house of celebration was transformed into a house of mourning when we learned that my husband's brother-in-law, Hussein, had been brutally murdered. As the mourners arrived, we turned away the florist and canceled the photographer. Our festival of love gave way to horror, as we realized that Hussein was just one of the many casualties of what Iraq was becoming-- a volatile mix of tribal tensions and local mafia-style killings.

A Shiite from the Kadhimiyah district of Baghdad, Hussein had been traveling in the Sunni-controlled district of Tarmiyah where he went to a bank to withdraw money. These days, when I tell Hussein's story, people stop me at this point. "What was a Shia man thinking, going to Tarmiyah?" they say. But Hussein had worked in Tarmiyah all his life. He could never have imagined that he would be attacked by armed robbers; he would never have thought that, after his body was pumped full of bullets, it would be dragged through the streets behind his killers' car. Most people didn't think like that a year ago. Now Iraqis have to think like that every day, as hope has given way to constant fear.

Killed just 12 days after his 32nd birthday, Hussein left his wife, Rana, and three children, the youngest of whom was only 6 months old. His death was one of the incidents that sparked a full-blown tribal war between the Sunnis of Tarmiyah and the Shiites of Kadhimiyah. If districts in Baghdad are resorting to bloodthirsty feuds, you can only imagine what is happening in the outlying provinces and rural areas.

These schisms among communities were predictable -- and predicted. The most painful fact is that, early on, the feuding was preventable.

Something went awry. I am continually plagued by the question of how we in the international community could have gotten this so very wrong. I believe that we have dug a grave. And it is the Iraqis who will have to lie in it.

But who will be held accountable?

As soon as I arrived in Baghdad in those fear-free days of 2003 to open the Iraq office of Women for Women International, people from all over the world began calling and writing to ask me what it was like. I used to send out an e-mail journal in response. But over the past year, I've found it increasingly difficult to record what is going on. Even before my brother-in-law's death, I felt stymied. My last journal entry was on April 19, 2005, three days after peace activist Marla Ruzicka was killed by a roadside bomb. At that moment, I realized that the loss of friends and colleagues had become overwhelming. I was losing hope.

The truth is, I used to write to share whatever success stories there were from the people of Iraq -- to try to keep the pulse of hope beating. After Marla's death, I was afraid to admit that the hope we had been clutching was becoming impossible to hold onto.

I developed a means of coping. In order to continue my aid work in Iraq, I allowed myself to fall into the comfortable shadows of denial. And for a while it worked. But however desperately I tried to stuff my head -- like an ostrich -- into the ground, the political earthquakes and violent undercurrents forced me to the surface. Then the bombing last month of the Shiite shrine in Samarra shook me out of denial. There had been signs of sectarian strife long before that: The attacks on Karbala shrines and the kidnappings of young children were reminders that nothing remains sacred in Iraq. But on that late February day, my last glimmer of hope evaporated into thin air like the gold that once shimmered on Samarra's dome.

It must be hard, from a distance, to understand how the situation deteriorated so quickly. When I speak to Westerners about the pain of watching Iraq fall apart, I usually get little sympathy. "It is war; what did you expect?" people say. But those of us who worked in Iraq saw the flame of hope. Now we watch that flame sputter and bear witness to brutal efforts to extinguish it.

When people started to discuss the possibility of civil war two years ago, I didn't believe them; I insisted that the majority of Iraqis would rise above sectarianism. People now say that I have been proven wrong. But I remember a letter I received in the early days: A young woman from Tikrit wrote that she prayed Iraqis would remember that the strength of their country was in their mosaic of religions and ethnicities. If Iraqis had been left to themselves, I tell my doubters, they would have risen above this madness.

The countless international interventions -- from neighboring countries to the coalition forces -- destabilized Iraq at a time when its people needed support from the world. Some continue to be grateful for the collapse of the Baathist regime and entertain dreams that their nation may be on the road to recovery. But for many, the Samarra bombing crushed that dream.

I wonder at the way hope evolved into fear. I had come to Baghdad to help empower Iraqi women after decades of suffering from war and sanctions. Iraqi women had a history of exercising rights in ways other women in the region could not. I was confident that, with the resources and assistance that Women for Women International provides, they would easily reclaim their status.

My background is Palestinian, but I grew up as an American and was prepared to find communities that would reject me. But from Karbala to Fallujah, from Sulaymaniyah to Baqubah, people embraced me as one of their own. Looking back, it seems only natural that there I would meet the love of my life, a fellow employee of Women for Women International.

Against that background of trust, I worked with increasing numbers of widows and abused and marginalized women. But nothing could have prepared me to see Hussein's wife, my husband's dear sister Rana, become a widow. Through her pain, I catch a glimpse into the everyday life of women struggling to overcome the trauma of war. You see, it is not only those who are killed who are casualties, but also their families.

Every day, Rana faces reminders of her loss. There are religious pressures for her to respect the Islamic mourning period, which does not allow her to leave the house for four months. She knew she would have to violate those strictures and flee with her children to Jordan to avoid the battles that erupted after their father's death. Rana also faced the economic pressures of being the sole breadwinner for her children, never having worked outside the home. Rana also joined thousands of widows in a legal battle to protect her children's right of inheritance. Some interpretations of the Koran do not permit children to inherit their father's property if the grandparents are still living. Rana and her children were now at the full mercy of Hussein's family.

Rana brings home to me the fate of thousands of other Iraqi women. Yet she considers herself lucky because she was able to bury her husband. When Rana reminds me of this good fortune, my mind floats to the wife of one of our staff members. Her husband went missing in 2004. There are no clues of what happened to him; there has been no sign of his car or his body. Every night, I fall asleep imagining his wife and two kids anxiously waiting for him. And I tell myself that at least Rana knows her husband's fate.

Now Rana lives, as I do, in Amman. In my apartment building, only two of the 12 units are occupied by Jordanians. The rest are homes for Iraqis who have fled their homeland. Of the 10 apartments, eight are occupied by people who have come to Amman after a family member was killed or, more commonly, kidnapped. Now, the entire building is in mourning over what is happening in Iraq. Just a couple of months ago, the halls and the parking lot were filled with quips about the Saddam trial, and the discussion was about who would be going back to Iraq first. Now, none of us dare speak about going back to Iraq.

Iraq Needed A Benign Dictator (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Interview by Rajiv Chandrasekaran

Kanan Makiya, an Iraqi-born, MIT-trained architect, is a professor at Brandeis University and the author of "Republic of Fear: The Politics of Modern Iraq." The book, which details human rights abuses under Saddam Hussein, was published under a pseudonym in 1989. Makiya, an active member of Ahmed Chalabi's Iraqi National Congress, was among the most vocal Iraqi exiles encouraging the Bush administration to oust Hussein.

Is Iraq in the midst of a civil war ?

We're teetering on the edge of one, and I think as always, politics is going to be the deciding factor. By politics, I mean leadership politics, which has been sorely lacking in Iraq.

Before the war, many Iraqi exiles predicted that the Iraqi people would unite behind moderate leaders. Where are those leaders, and why haven't we seen more moderation?

The failure lies in the inability of Iraqi leaders to rise above their own groups and confessional allegiances. We have not had a visionary, a leader able to think beyond the self-interest of their group. So we have a politics of selfishness . . . [and] a politics of victimhood, an elevation of victimhood into a quality as though it were something in and of itself. In particular, this applies to the Shiite leadership.

Why hasn't a more unifying leader risen from the Shiite community? Where is Iraq's Nelson Mandela or Hamid Karzai ?

We're talking about a completely new elite that has had no experience of government before. They have created a Shiite political organization, identifying Shiiteness over Iraqiness. This, I feel, is the source of their failure. Their interpretation of democracy . . . is of democracy being majority rule as opposed to minority rights.

When you remove the suffocating lid of dictatorship, a dictatorship that has oppressed on the basis of ethnic identity, then it is very natural that those who have been so repressed react by being assertive -- the very thing that has been denied from the days of [Saddam] Hussein. And that is what we are watching today.

Could the Americans have done anything differently from the outset to reduce the chances of sectarian politics and civil strife we're now seeing today? Before the war, you advocated the formation of a provisional government led by Iraqis in exile. Do you still believe that was the right way to go?

There's this old thorn . . . and that is the issue of provisional government versus occupation. Occupation was the wrong formula for dealing with the transition. The U.S. government pushed aside the Iraqi opposition -- both those groups that were in exile and those groups that were inside Iraq, mainly the Kurds. The unwillingness, for instance, to involve the Kurds in deliberations on Iraq as a whole because of how that may look in the rest of the Arab world was a big mistake, I think. The unwillingness to have the Iraqis keep their army. That was another mistake. But that goes hand in glove with the idea of occupation as opposed to a provisional government like what was done in Afghanistan. So what we ended up with was the rhetoric of liberation but the reality of occupation.

Isn't it interesting that 80 to 90 percent of those very same characters who were waltzing in and out of Washington before the war today have been quote-unquote legitimized through elections. Look at the political elite, look at the names, they're all there -- the very same people. But what we have lost in the meantime is three years, a lot of hurt feelings, a lot of bad relations and so on.

The U.S. government bent over backwards in almost every arena of dealings with Iraqis to be seen as being representative. But my point is this: In the moment of transition was representativeness really more important than leadership? I know how bad it would've looked to Europe, to other parts of the world, in the United Nations, for the United States to have installed a puppet government. That's what it is -- let's call things by their name. But the United States could have remained the great benefactor who had removed Saddam . . . [and after] that interim period, there certainly would have been elections. Today you ask me . . . would we have been better off? There would have been a lot more mess in the first month and the first year, but there are certain things that might have been better.

"Occupation" in Arabic has nothing but a pejorative set of meanings, clearly with the occupation of the West Bank by Israel, Algeria by France. We don't have an example in our own history of what you might call an enabling occupation. We only have disabling ones.

Iraqis today care about electricity, they care about looting, they care about a sense of authority. These people have lived under extreme authority for 35 years. You just don't take the lid off and overnight have a democratic experiment. The lid of authority has to be changed and replaced. There is a benign kind of dictatorial authority, a transition between one and the other, which in this case could have been through a provisional government that was profoundly influenced by the United States. Now, after the fact, all of this is too late, but we might've had a different dynamic.

Before the war, you spoke to a number of senior officials in the U.S. government, including President Bush and Vice President Cheney. Do you feel that they understood the depth of the issues, the animus between Sunnis and Shiites, between Arabs and Kurds. Did they understand the complexity of Iraq ?

I honestly don't think that's the source of the problem. This animus is a creation. Look, let me give you a little example. It's almost a childish example. The other day, a good friend of mine interviewed a lady from the neighborhood to work as a cleaning person in his house and the first thing this lady did was say to the woman of the house, "Are you Sunnis or Shiites?" And it so happened that the family that was trying to hire this person was Sunni and the working woman was a Shiite. And she walked out of the house. She said, "Thank you very much," and she left. She told the guard at the end of the house, "I can't work in a Sunni house."

You may think that we're now talking about decades-old prejudices and hatred between Sunnis and Shiites, I say no. I say this is a manufactured consciousness -- new, real. Not that it was not there before. There were all kinds of latent divisions. There were all kinds of ways in which people discriminated against all kinds of other people. But that kind of a conversation has emerged as an issue because of the way Iraqi politics has developed in the last two years. It is the politicians, starting with the Governing Council, who sat down and thought of themselves as Shiites and Sunnis first, that created all of this in the first place. It goes from the top down, not from the bottom up.

Do you regret telling the president that the Iraqi people would "greet the troops with sweets and flowers? "

I regret the phrase but not the intent behind the phrase. By and large, the Iraqi people received the United States very well in the first two or three months -- before the occupation was enshrined.

Bush administration officials have indicated a desire to reduce the number of U.S. forces in Iraq this year. Do you support a reduction in troops ?

I wish they wouldn't draw down their troops so quickly.

You have written extensively about the abuses of Saddam Hussein. Saddam certainly seems to be making a mockery of the proceedings .

He is. Well, of course, he's doing what in some senses was expected of him: to deny the legitimacy of the whole process.

There's something in the design of the court, in the rules of the court that . . . were badly designed. One other thing that I think is wrong is that the case against Saddam Hussein and his henchmen has not yet been properly put. We're dealing with a case where 150 people were executed. I understand the overall strategy is to move from one case to the next case to the next case, but the result is that the Iraqi people, and the Arab world, have not yet been faced with the magnitude of his crimes as a whole.

That picture has not yet been painted by the prosecution. We're talking about an act of revenge in which the president ordered the killing of 150 people. That could apply to a hundred other presidents in some way or another.

We have not yet looked at the magnitude of the crimes of this regime -- the reason why the United States went in there and the reason why this regime was beheaded. But the reasons why this regime somehow stood out in an international community that has many unpleasant regimes in it hasn't yet been presented by anybody. And that is the central failure of this court.

Was it a mistake not to allow foreign judges and foreign prosecutors at the tribunal ?

Yeah, I always thought that was a mistake. I wanted Iraqis involved, but I wanted a meeting of the two. I knew right up front that the judicial system, the judges, were simply not up to the task.

How do you feel when your countrymen in Baghdad now have to endure hours-long blackouts, and miles-long queues for petrol, water shortages, insurgent attacks and pervasive crime? Among both Sunnis and Shiites, some of them say they yearn for the days when Saddam was in power. How does hearing that make you feel?

I feel terrible and I understand why they say that. And I blame Iraqi politicians for it.

But on the issue of electricity and blackouts, there's a part of me, there's some little part of my brain that simply doesn't understand how the most powerful country on Earth just can't simply get electricity back on in Baghdad. . . . I've heard all the explanations. I've seen the reports. I know the technical stuff, but I find it mind-blowing that that was not solved.

It's been almost three years since the liberation of Iraq. Are you disappointed with how things have turned out thus far ?

Yes, no doubt in my mind. I'm sad. I'm very sad.

One Week In Baghdad (WP)

By Zeyad

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

BAGHDAD

SUNDAY, March 12 A sudden whizzzzzz . . . KABOOM sent me flying from the couch where I was dozing off, watching TV.

"What was that?" my father asked from the hallway.

"Probably a mortar round," I replied. "A close one."

"Good. They're lobbing mortars at us now. What's next?" he said and went back to his bedroom.

It's almost 9 p.m., a dangerous time to go outside. Neighborhood watch teams -- young men brandishing AK-47s, pistols, RPGs and even sniper rifles -- set up checkpoints around this time. Many were referred to as the "mujahideen" or insurgents in the past. Now, they are considered defenders of our largely Sunni district against Shiite death squads and militias.

I tried to stay interested in the Steven Seagal action flick on TV, but my focus kept shifting to the occasional rumble of mortar shells outside. After a while I went upstairs to use the Internet.

Just as I set foot in my room, an intense barrage of gunfire erupted on our street. Not good. My cellphone was ringing; it was a friend who lives down our street. "It's an American patrol," he al most whispered. "I can see Humvees from where I am. And it looks like they have Iraqi police with them."

"Keep your head down for God's sake."

I went to check on my younger brother, Nabil. He was playing his guitar to a Metallica tune, oblivious to his surroundings. His room has a better view, but it's not wise to stick one's head out of a window when Americans are nearby. The street was dark, but they have night vision goggles. A sniper bullet in the head is not a fun prospect, so I lay low and tried to listen.

I did hear a radio transmission from an Iraqi police vehicle, and what sounded like an American soldier shouting. The gunfire had ceased, probably after the local vigilantes had realized it was Americans, not militias or Interior ministry forces entering our territory. The vehicles moved away, and the alarm level dropped.

No point in trying to figure out what happened. It could wait for the morning, when people would give you different versions of the incident.

I checked the door locks and called it a night.

MONDAY "The street is blocked," my taxi driver proclaimed as we approached my stop near a bus station in the Bab Al-Sharjee district in central Baghdad. "No problem. I'll get out here," I told him, forking over his fare. He grunted, and shifted into reverse.

I skulked along the remaining 300-meter stretch of street -- the main route taken by security officials from the Green Zone to the ministries' complex, and a favorite location for bombings. I usually just take a deep breath, light a cigarette and keep moving, sticking close to the wall. To my dismay, though, I found a police pickup vehicle parked in front of the bus station. A crowded bus station is already a juicy target for suicide bombers; a police patrol is an added attraction. But one has to shrug those thoughts aside, or we'd all be clinically crazy by now.

Thankfully, the minibus didn't take long to fill -- with a couple of ladies in abayas, their two very noisy kids, a mechanic, a laborer (from the looks of him), an old man flipping through a newspaper, two nondescript young men and me, the suburban dentist. Our destination: a district on the outskirts of the capital.

We passed through countless checkpoints manned by Iraqi troops. This time, the soldiers just waved us through. Sometimes they stop us and ask for our IDs. I gave up carrying mine some time ago; it revealed too much information, such as tribal, regional and sectarian background. I just use my neutral work ID now.

We noticed several American Humvees blocking the street. Our driver lurched onto the sidewalk and tried to squeeze through, but an American soldier yelled at him to go back, pointing his weapon at us. Without a moment's hesitation, the driver took us down a side road. Uh oh, I thought. This is where executed, blindfolded young men turn up every other day. In one case, bodies were found in a minibus -- just like the one I was in.

Any other day, I would have given up and gone home, but I needed to get my salary, because I can't rely on getting to work every day next week. Preparations for the Arbaeen religious anniversary are underway, and this road will be blocked to traffic to accommodate the hordes of Shiite pilgrims heading on foot to Karbala.

TUESDAY We were engrossed in morning preparations at work when a colleague called our attention to the latest "episode" of Saddam's trial -- a form of cheap entertainment for many Iraqis against the backdrop of dreary events in Baghdad. At least it's the one thing that Iraqis of all backgrounds agree upon.

Colleagues rushed, tea mugs in hand, to take a look at TV. Our clinic director wasn't amused, but he didn't protest. After all, there are no drugs in our pharmacy, my dental chair hasn't been fixed for months -- and even if it was, there are no anesthetics.

Iraqis have lost all hope for any real justice in this god-awful country. People here have long been accustomed to taking justice into their own hands -- or forgetting it altogether. "They should just lynch him and spare us this farce," one patient remarked. His comment sparked heated debate. I've heard all the arguments so I try not to listen. Iraqis are divided over everything. They can't even agree over a dictator who ruled them with a fist of steel for 30 years.

WEDNESDAY My neighbors suggested we go out for lunch today. They are a young couple living just across the street, with two kids, a girl and a boy, ages 11 and 5. I often spend time with them in the evening during the curfew, or around tea time.

I learned from my neighbor's wife that a stray bullet injured her mother's cousin during the firefight in our street three nights ago. It went right through her window and shattered her collarbone. It was tragic, considering that her son was killed just months ago by kidnappers after the old widow failed to pay his ransom of $50,000.

We discussed the issue of Abu Ghassan, who lived next door to them until he decided to take his family and relocate to Syria. He is a very well-to-do businessman and a car battery dealer. His lavish lifestyle brought him unwanted attention in our area, and it took him one failed kidnapping attempt to decide to sell up and leave.

It was an excruciating scene, watching neighbors of a lifetime carry their suitcases at dawn to board an SUV to Syria. Being forced to leave your home is not a trivial affair. The country is being stripped of its intelligentsia, and I fear that soon we will be left only with fanatics. Add to that the forced migrations of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds out of mixed areas to sectarian strongholds.

We discussed these issues over a splendid meal of masgoof (roasted fish) on a refreshing sunny day on the bank of the Tigris, in the company of family and friends.

THURSDAY If there is any advantage of the Iraq war, it would have to be the endless stream of national and religious holidays. There was a daytime curfew today because of the opening parliamentary session, and not much activity is expected during the next week as the Arbaeen holiday will be taking place.

The new parliament was sworn in today. Our bickering politicians agreed to disagree yet again, and this time it was over the oath. I sometimes can't help wondering if it was the war that has left us so divided, or have we been that way all along.

The family stayed indoors for most of the day. For my mother it was a relief. She constantly worries and calls us on our phones, asking if everything is okay.

In addition to regular and fixed holidays, it is possible to make up your own, citing an unexpected security incident as an excuse. Many have mastered that useful trick. Personally, I use it sparingly because very often, I actually do get caught up in roadblocks.

People who need to make a living from day jobs, such as laborers, grocers and taxi drivers, are not impressed with the daytime curfews and holidays. Business is already suffering because of deteriorating security, power and fuel shortages. But lazy civil servants such as myself can lie back and enjoy the fruits of "liberation."

DOJ_NMG_0019027

FRIDAY A quiet day, which left me to ponder a question that haunts me: We Iraqis continue to live between the hammer of terrorists and the anvil of American, British and Iraqi security forces. But what kind of a people are we to respond by killing our own?

Iraq's Insurgents: Who's Who (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Long considered a fragmentary and disorganized collection of groups with varying tactics and aims, Iraq's insurgency is showing signs of increasing coordination, consolidation and confidence, those who study it now say. There is no consensus on the precise number of insurgent fighters, but estimates range from a few thousand to more than 50,000. The vast majority of insurgents, probably more than 90 percent, are believed to be Iraqis from the Sunni minority group that largely ruled the country before the fall of Saddam Hussein. But U.S. commanders say that most of the deadliest attacks, and particularly suicide attacks, are committed by foreigners from a range of neighboring countries, including Jordan, Syrian, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Sudan.

-- Jonathan FinerLarger Groups

The formation of the Mujahidin Shura Council , announced on Jan. 21, was a sign of the once-diffuse insurgency's consolidation around the leadership of a few large, powerful groups. It brought together the foreign-backed network of al-Qaeda in Iraq, led by Jordanian Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, and several smaller, Iraqi-led groups. The council's head was said to be an Iraqi, a move made to counter the image of al-Qaeda as dominated by Arabs from elsewhere in the region. This appointment may be little more than a public relations move. The group's tactics include attacks carried out with bombs, small arms and mortar against Iraqi and American soldiers, as well as, increasingly, Iraqi civilians, most of them Shiites. Two of its "brigades," or affiliates, (the bin Malik and the Al-Ansar) are devoted solely to suicide attacks. Another, the Omar Brigade, is said to target only members of the Badr organization, a feared Shiite militia.

Ansar al-Sunnah , which means "partisans of the law," is an offshoot of a group called Ansar al-Islam, which was formed in Kurdistan but has not been heard from in many months. The vast majority of its leaders and foot soldiers are Iraqi Sunnis who adhere to a strict, fundamentalist form of Islam called Salafism, which calls for a return to the practices of early Muslims and has gained radical expression throughout the Arab world. Their tactics -- including lethal suicide attacks -- and religious underpinnings are similar to those of al-Qaeda, but the two groups are considered bitter rivals for influence within the insurgent community. Among their best-known attacks was a roadside bomb blast that killed 14 Marines and an interpreter in August, the deadliest such attack of the war.

The stated goal of the Islamic Army in Iraq is to drive the U.S. military out of Iraq. Comprised almost entirely of Iraqi Sunnis, including many still loyal to Saddam Hussein's regime and Baath Party, it is considered more nationalistic than religious in motivation. As many as three-quarters of its attacks, which include improvised bombs and kidnappings but not suicide attacks, are conducted against U.S. forces and non-Iraqi contractors. It often releases video footage of its operations. The group publishes a monthly magazine called al-Fursan and has denied rumors circulating last summer that it was in discussions with Iraqi officials about laying down its weapons. Its members reportedly include a sniper named "Juba," who gained a cult following when he was said to have killed several American soldiers in Baghdad last summer and fall.

There is some discussion as to whether the Islamic Front of the Iraqi Resistance , one of the most highly publicized insurgent organizations, is actually an armed group or something of a public relations organ for other groups. It maintains a frequently updated Web site and publishes a magazine called Jami, an acronym composed of its Arabic initials, which also mean "mosque" or "gathering." It has claimed responsibility for a number of attacks in and around the northern city of Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city.Smaller groups

Mujahidin Army : A group that has released dozens of videos of bomb, rocket and sniper attacks, most of them directed against U.S. forces. Along with the Islamic Army in Iraq, it denied reports of rapprochement talks with the Iraqi government last year. It is one of a few smaller insurgent groups that called for attacks against Danish troops in the wake of the publication by a Danish newspaper of cartoons depicting the prophet Muhammad last fall.

Muhammad Army : A group made up mostly of Iraqi former Baathists and a few foreign fighters, it claimed credit for the 2003 bombing of the United Nations headquarters that killed 23 people, including the organization's chief of mission.

1920 Revolution Brigades : This group, which has claimed responsibility for a number of high-profile kidnappings of Westerners and Iraqis working with U.S. forces, is named for the Iraqi uprising against the British after World War I. The group calls itself the military wing of the Islamic Resistance Movement, another insurgent organization.

DOJ_NMG_0019028

Conquering Army : A new group that has emerged in the past two months through a series of videos released on the Internet and to regional television networks showing kidnapping victims confessing to various "crimes" such as working with American forces.

Swords of the Righteous : A previously unknown group that gained prominence by claiming responsibility, in videos, for the kidnapping of four Christian Peacemaker workers, one of whom, Tom Fox of Virginia, was found dead March 10.

Iraqi Vengeance Brigades : A little-known group that has released videos showing American journalist Jill Carroll, who was abducted in Baghdad in early January.

Statements By Insurgents (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

"W e refuse completely to participate [in the political process], because it ultimately benefits the occupiers, their followers and their agents. Their wicked aim is to attack Islam and humiliate its people, steal their wealth and support the Jews. . . . We will take revenge against all government figures or anyone related to it or supporting it, because it is a government of unbelief. I swear by Allah that if ever my father dealt with it -- or my mother, brother, sister, cousin or my son, and everyone who is related to me -- I shall cut his throat and I will not be sorry. . . .

". . . Practically and security-wise, we control all cities of Iraq and we challenge [Prime Minister Ibrahim] al-Jafari and all who claim that there is a government in Baghdad or any other city in Iraq to go out in the streets or remove the fortifications surrounding them and bring their families from outside Iraq to live in a normal way here. We have succeeded in placing them in a prison, like in the Green Zone. Even that is not safe anymore and is bombed every day. . . . We, meanwhile, are free to go everywhere in any city and choose our targets . . . .

". . . Be sure that the American Army is living now in a swamp of blood and is suffering a state of collapse. Also, the government forces are corrupt and falling apart psychologically. It will flee and soon, as the Americans announce the withdrawal of their forces, and this will happen very soon, Allah willing. The battle of Iraq will be the beginning of other battles in the area to topple the idols allied with Satan."

--Abu Hafsa al-Ansari, chief aide to al-Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, in a Feb. 23 interview with the Lebanese magazine al-Watan al-Arabiya

"How many times have a few people overcome plenty of people? . . . America has failed in three years to defeat a few hundred mujahidin, and its disgrace is very big. The most powerful army in the world . . . equipped with very sophisticated weapons . . . has failed to control very limited numbers of [mujahidin]. Oh my God, how is that?

". . . It is Allah's work. It is this great religion with all its greatness . . . facing barbarism in its lowest form. They are Allah's people facing Satan's people. . . . it is the mujahidin versus the mercenaries. . . . it is the weapon of faith versus the arsenal of destruction."

--From a document issued by the Global Islamic Media Front, an al-Qaeda mouthpiece

"W e repeat our call to the Muslim people to understand the nature of the battle; they should know the identity of their enemies and what to do with them. We must put our efforts into supporting jihad and the mujahidin, because they are the fence that pushes away the power of the scum and keeps the Muslims safe. All of us know that the Shiite attack on the Sunni sections has been stopped. . . . What stopped it was the unity of the Sunni people with their sons, the mujahidin. . . .

"The mujahidin revealed the truth of the Shiites early. . . . Blood was shed and women dishonored, mosques burned and massacred, the Koran was desecrated by burning, tearing and kicking. They will pay a high price for it, so the Shiites will have only themselves to blame."

On Scene: How Operation Swarmer Fizzled

Not a shot was fired, or a leader nabbed, in a major offensive that failed to live up to its advance billing

By BRIAN BENNETT/AL JALLAM

Four Black Hawk helicopters landed in a wheat field and dropped off a television crew, three photographers, three print reporters and three Iraqi government officials right into the middle of Operation Swarmer. Iraqi soldiers in newly painted humvees, green and red Iraqi flags stenciled on the tailgates, had just finished searching the farm populated by a half-dozen skinny cows and a woman kneading freshly risen dough and slapping it to the walls of a mud oven.

The press, flown in from Baghdad to this agricultural gridiron northeast of Samarra, huddled around the Iraqi officials and U.S. Army commanders who explained that the "largest air assault since 2003" in Iraq using over 50 helicopters to put 1500 Iraqi and U.S. troops on the ground had netted 48 suspected insurgents, 17 of which had already been cleared and released. The area, explained the officials, has long been suspected of being used as a base for insurgents operating in and around Samarra, the city north of Baghdad where the bombing of a sacred shrine recently sparked a wave of sectarian violence.

But contrary to what many many television networks erroneously reported, the operation was by no means the largest use of airpower since the start of the war. ("Air Assault" is a military term that refers specifically to transporting troops into an area.) In fact, there were no airstrikes and no leading insurgents were nabbed in an operation that some skeptical military analysts described as little more than a photo op. What's more, there were no shots fired at all and the units had met no resistance, said the U.S. and Iraqi commanders.

The operation, which doubled the population of the flat farmland in one single airlift, was initiated by intelligence from Iraq security forces, says Lt Col Skip Johnson commander of the 187 Battallion, 3rd Combat Brigade of the 101st Airborne. "They have the lead," he said to reporters at the second stop of the tour. But by Friday afternoon, the major targets seemed to have slipped through their fingers. Iraqi Army General Abdul Jabar says that Samarra-based insurgent leader Hamad el Taki of Mohammad's Army was thought to be in the area, and Iraqi intelligence officers were still working to compare known voice recordings and photographs with the prisoners in custody.

With the Interior Ministry's Samarra commando battalion, the soldiers had found some 300 individual pieces of weaponry like mortars, rockets and plastic explosives in six different locations inside the sparsely populated farming community of over 50 square miles and about 1,500 residents. The raids also uncovered high-powered cordless telephones used as detonators in homemade bombs, medical supplies and insurgent training manuals.

Before loading up into the helicopters for a return trip to Baghdad, Iraqi and American soldiers and some reporters helped themselves to the woman's freshly baked bread, tearing bits off and chewing it as they wandered among the cows. For most of them, it was the only thing worthwhile they'd found all day.

More Insurgents Detained In U.S.-Iraqi Raids (LAT)

By the Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

March 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — American and Iraqi troops pushing through a desolate area of Iraq's Sunni heartland rounded up dozens more suspected insurgents, including alleged killers of a television journalist, U.S. and Iraqi officials said Saturday.

The third day of the sweep through villages near Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, stirred growing unease among leading Sunni Arabs. One called it a needless "escalation" at a time of difficult negotiations over forming a broad-based government.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, a dozen more bodies were found as a shadowy war of Shiite-Sunni reprisals apparently continued. And Shiite Muslims heading to the holy city of Karbala came under attack, with a roadside bomb killing one and wounding five.

Elsewhere, an oil tanker driver was shot dead 50 miles southeast of Baghdad, and a tribal sheik was slain 30 miles west of the capital.

In a radio address the day before the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion, President Bush said the violence in Iraq "has created a new sense of urgency" among Iraqi leaders to form a government.

Those leaders — representatives of the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish blocs in Iraq's new parliament — were taking a break from negotiations to observe Monday's Shiite holiday and Tuesday's Kurdish New Year.

They are deadlocked over how to apportion the most powerful jobs in the new government, as minority blocs seek to limit domination by Shiite Muslims.

In the counterinsurgency sweep through a 100-square-mile area of semidesert northeast of the Tigris River town of Samarra, Iraqi soldiers and units of the U.S. 101st Airborne Division had detained about 80 suspected insurgents as of Saturday, said Lt. Col. Edward S. Loomis, a U.S. spokesman. Seventeen were released after questioning, he said.

Among those detained were six people, not further identified, allegedly responsible for the March 11 killing of Amjad Hameed, director of the Iraqi television station Al Iraqiya, and his driver, Iraqi officials said.

In other action, Iraqi counterinsurgency troops staged a predawn raid near Baqubah, about 30 miles north of Baghdad, touching off a clash in which two gunmen were killed, one was wounded and 18 were arrested, Brig. Saman Talabani said.

DOJ_NMG_0019030

Besides ammunition and weapons, the soldiers seized computer discs of fatwas, or religious edicts, calling for the killing of Iraqi police and soldiers, he said.

At least 2,300 American military personnel have died since the Iraq war began.

Shiite Pilgrims Are Walking Targets In Sectarian Conflict (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 18 — Shiite pilgrims are threading a needle of danger this week as they make their annual pilgrimage to a shrine in Karbala, in southern Iraq.

Many of them are doing it defiantly.

On Saturday, Ali Jassim, 22, was hiking along a Baghdad highway, hoisting a huge Shiite flag, wearing the distinctive all-black pilgrim's uniform and projecting full-blown Shiite pride.

"I know the Sunnis are after us," he said.

His friend, Monir Abd al-Rad, who was trudging alongside him, tried to quiet him down.

"We are all brothers," he said.

"Rubbish," Mr. Jassim shot back. "Nobody wants to say it, but there is a sectarian war. And we are its targets."

The pilgrimage route from Baghdad to Karbala cuts straight across territory so overrun by Sunni Arab insurgents that the American military calls it the Triangle of Death. This year that triangle is deadlier than ever, with Shiite-Sunni tensions peaking.

Hundreds of thousands of Shiite pilgrims are taking the risk, marching the 50 miles from Baghdad to Karbala to commemorate the death of Imam Hussein, the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad.

Several have already paid the price.

On Friday, eight pilgrims were shot in drive-by shootings, though American and Iraqi forces patrolled nearby.

On Saturday, a string of bombs exploded along the route, wounding several people. Several pilgrims are now making the trek with assault rifles slung across their shoulders, for the first time anyone here can remember.

The violence is part of the sectarian shadow falling across Iraq. On Saturday, more bodies turned up. Interior Ministry officials said 16 men, all unidentified, were found dead with their hands tied behind their back and bullets in their heads. In the past week, nearly 200 bodies surfaced on Baghdad's streets, many of them dumped in clusters.

The widespread suspicion is that most were victims of Shiite death squads who went on a quiet but steady killing spree after a bomb attack on a Shiite market in Baghdad one week ago.

In the past few days, American officials in Baghdad have expressed more concern about the security situation than usual.

Despite recent vows to let Iraqi forces take the lead in security matters, United States commanders initiated a large-scale helicopter offensive this week against insurgents near Samarra, the city where an important Shiite shrine was bombed Feb. 22 , the incident that set off a cycle of sectarian killings.

The helicopter operation used a mix of Iraqi and American troops. On Saturday, the military said it had captured more people suspected of being insurgents, bringing the operation's total to 80, though many were quickly released.

An Iraqi army spokesman said Iraqi soldiers had captured six suspects connected to the recent assassination of two Iraqi journalists, though it was not clear if these suspects had been swept up in the Samarra raid.

Also on Saturday, several high-ranking Iraqi officials met with the British defense minister, John Reid, who visiting Baghdad to mark the three-year anniversary of the American-led invasion of Iraq on March 20.

Iraqi leaders have been struggling to form a government of national unity and a new divisive issue has emerged: whether to empower a national security council with executive authority.

Mr. Reid urged the leaders to resolve their differences quickly. "Terrorists love a vacuum," he said at a news conference.

The Iraqi defense minister, Saadun al-Dulaimi, thanked Mr. Reid for helping oust Saddam Hussein three years ago but added, "We can't rely on friendly forces forever."

In Kirkuk, a city north of Baghdad with population of Kurds, Shiites and Sunni Arabs, three people were killed and 11 wounded in a spate of attacks on Saturday.

The American military said two American soldiers were killed by indirect fire, which usually means mortars, near Tikrit on Thursday.

Mortars also seriously injured three Iraqi children in Ramadi on Friday, according to the American military. The children were playing outside when the mortars hit.

The Weekly Standard, March 19, 2006

And other revelations from the Iraqi regime files

SADDAM HUSSEIN'S REGIME PROVIDED FINANCIAL support to Abu Sayyaf, the al Qaeda-linked jihadist group founded by Osama bin Laden's brother-in-law in the Philippines in the late 1990s, according to documents captured in postwar Iraq. An eight-page fax dated June 6, 2001, and sent from the Iraqi ambassador in Manila to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Baghdad, provides an update on Abu Sayyaf kidnappings and indicates that the Iraqi regime was providing the group with money to purchase weapons. The Iraqi regime suspended its support--temporarily, it seems--after high-profile kidnappings, including of Americans, focused international attention on the terrorist group.

The fax comes from the vast collection of documents recovered in postwar Afghanistan and Iraq. Up to this point, those materials have been kept from the American public. Now the proverbial dam has broken. On March 16, the U.S. government posted on the web 9 documents captured in Iraq, as well as 28 al Qaeda documents that had been released in February. Earlier last week, Foreign Affairs magazine published a lengthy article based on a review of 700 Iraqi documents by analysts with the Institute for Defense Analysis and the Joint Forces Command in Norfolk, Virginia. Plans for the release of many more documents have been announced. And if the contents of the recently released materials and other documents obtained by The Weekly Standard are any indication, the discussion of the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq is about to get more interesting.

Several months ago, The Weekly Standard received a set of English-language

documents from a senior U.S. government official. The official represented this material as U.S. government translations of three captured Iraqi documents. According to this source, the documents had been examined by the U.S. intelligence community and judged "consistent with authentic documents"--the professionals' way of saying that these items cannot definitively be certified but seem to be the real thing.

The Weekly Standard checked its English-language documents with officials serving elsewhere in the federal government to make sure they were consistent with the versions these officials had seen. With what one person characterized as "minor discrepancies," they are. One of the three documents has been posted in the original Arabic on the website of the Office of the Director of National Intelligence. A subsequent translation of that document is nearly identical to the English-language text that we were given.

These documents add to the growing body of evidence confirming the Iraqi regime's longtime support for terrorism abroad. The first of them, a series of memos from the spring of 2001, shows that the Iraqi Intelligence Service funded Abu Sayyaf, despite the reservations of some IIS officials. The second, an internal Iraqi Intelligence memo on the relationships between the IIS and Saudi opposition groups, records that Osama bin Laden requested Iraqi cooperation on terrorism and propaganda and that in January 1997 the Iraqi regime was eager to continue its relationship with bin Laden. The third, a September 15, 2001, report from an Iraqi Intelligence source in Afghanistan, contains speculation about the relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda and the likely U.S. response to it.

ON JUNE 6, 2001, the Iraqi ambassador to the Philippines sent an eight-page fax to Baghdad. Ambassador Salah Samarmad's dispatch to the Secondary Policy Directorate of the Iraqi Foreign Ministry concerned an Abu Sayyaf kidnapping a week earlier that had garnered international attention. Twenty civilians--including three Americans--had been taken from Dos Palmas Resort on Palawan Island in the southern Philippines. There had been fighting between the kidnappers and the Filipino military, Samarmad reported. Several hostages had escaped, and others were released.

"After the release of nine of the hostages, an announcement from the FBI appeared in newspapers announcing their desire to interview the escaped Filipinos in order to make a decision on the status of the three American hostages," the Iraqi ambassador wrote to his superiors in Baghdad. "The embassy stated what was mentioned above. The three American hostages were a missionary husband and wife who had lived in the Philippines for a while, Martin and Gracia Burnham, from Kansas City, and Guillermo Sobrero, from California. They are still in the hands of the Abu Sayyaf kidnappers from a total of 20 people who were kidnapped from (Dos Palmas) resort on Palawan Island." (Except where noted, parentheses, brackets, and ellipses appear in the documents quoted.)

The report notes that the Iraqis were now trying to be seen as helpful and keep a safe distance from Abu Sayyaf. "We have all cooperated in the field of intelligence information with some of our friends to encourage the tourists and the investors in the Philippines." But Samarmad's report seems to confirm that this is a change. "The kidnappers were formerly (from the previous year) receiving money and purchasing combat weapons. From now on we (IIS) are not giving them this opportunity and are not on speaking terms with them."

Samarmad's dispatch appears to be the final installment in a series of internal Iraqi regime memos from March through June 2001. (The U.S. government translated some of these documents in full and summarized others.) The memos contain a lengthy discussion among Iraqi officials--from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Iraqi Intelligence Service--about the wisdom of using a Libyan intelligence front as a way to channel Iraqi support for Abu Sayyaf without the risks of dealing directly with the group. (The Libyan regime had intervened in an Abu Sayyaf kidnapping in 2000, securing the release of several hostages by paying several million dollars in ransom. Some observers saw this as an effort by Muammar Qaddafi to improve his image; others saw it as an effort to provide support to Abu Sayyaf by paying the ransom demanded by the group. Both were probably right.)

One Iraqi memo, from the "Republican Presidency, Intelligence Apparatus" to someone identified only as D4/4, makes the case for supporting the work of the Qaddafi Charity Establishment to help Abu Sayyaf. The memo is dated March 18, 2001.

1. There are connections between the Qaddafi Charity Establishment and the Abu Sayyaf group in the Philippines; meanwhile, this establishment is providing material support to them.

2. This establishment is one of the Libyan Intelligence fronts.

3. The Tripoli post has indicated that there is a possibility to form what connections are available with this establishment as it can offer the premise of providing food supplies to [Ed: word missing] in the scope of the agreement statement.

Please review . . . it appears of intelligence value to proceed into connections with this establishment and its intelligence investments in the Abu Sayyaf group.

The short response, two days later:

Mr. Dept. 3:

Study this idea, the pros and the cons, the relative reactions, and any other remarks regarding this.

That exchange above was fully translated by U.S. government translators. The two pages of correspondence that follow it in the Iraqi files were not, but a summary of those pages informs readers that the Iraqi response "discourages the supporting of connections with the Abu Sayyaf group, as the group works against the Philippine government and relies on several methods for material gain, such as kidnapping foreigners, demanding ransoms, as well as being accused by the Philippine government of terrorist acts and drug smuggling."

These accusations were, of course, well founded. On June 12, 2001, six days after Samarmad's dispatch, authorities found the beheaded body of Guillermo Sobrero near the Abu Sayyaf camp. Martin Burnham was killed a year later during the rescue attempt that freed his wife.

A thorough understanding of the relationship between Iraq and Abu Sayyaf (the name, honoring Afghan jihadi Abdul Rasul Sayyaf, means "Father of the Sword") will not come from an analysis of three months' correspondence between Manila and Baghdad in 2001. While it is certainly significant to read in internal Iraqi documents that the regime was at one time funding Abu Sayyaf, we do not now have a complete picture of that relationship. Why did the Iraqis begin funding Abu Sayyaf, which had long been considered a regional terrorist group concerned mainly with making money? Why did they suspend their support in 2001? And why did the Iraqis resume this relationship and, according to the congressional testimony of one State Department regional specialist, intensify it?

ON MARCH 26, 2003, as war raged in Iraq, the State Department's Matthew Daley testified before Congress. Daley, the deputy assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, told a subcommittee of the House International Relations Committee that he was worried about Abu Sayyaf.

"We're concerned that they have what I would call operational links to Iraqi intelligence services. And they're a danger, they're an enemy of the Philippines, they're an enemy of the United States, and we want very much to help the government in Manila deal with this challenge," Daley told the panel. Responding to a question, Daley elaborated. "There is good reason to believe that a member of the Abu Sayyaf Group who has been involved in terrorist activities was in direct contact with an IIS officer in the Iraqi Embassy in Manila. This individual was subsequently expelled from the Philippines for engaging in activities that were incompatible with his diplomatic status."

This individual was Hisham Hussein, the second secretary of the Iraqi Embassy in Manila. And Daley was right to be concerned.

Eighteen months before his testimony, a young Filipino man rode his Honda motorcycle up a dusty road to a shanty strip mall just outside Camp Enrile Malagutay in Zamboanga City, Philippines. The camp was host to American troops stationed in the south of the country to train with Filipino soldiers fighting terrorists. The man parked his bike and began to examine its gas tank. Seconds later, the tank exploded, sending nails in all directions and killing the rider almost instantly.

The blast damaged six nearby stores and ripped the front off of a café that doubled as a karaoke bar. The café was popular with American soldiers. And on this day, October 2, 2002, SFC Mark Wayne Jackson was killed there and a fellow soldier was severely wounded. Eyewitnesses almost immediately identified the bomber as an Abu Sayyaf terrorist.

One week before the attack, Abu Sayyaf leaders had promised a campaign of terror directed at the "enemies of Islam"--Westerners and the non-Muslim Filipino majority. And one week after the attack, Abu Sayyaf attempted to strike again, this time with a bomb placed on the playground of the San Roque Elementary School. It did not detonate. Authorities recovered the cell phone that was to have set it off and analyzed incoming and outgoing calls.

As they might have expected, they discovered several calls to and from Abu Sayyaf leaders. But another call got their attention. Seventeen hours after the attack that took the life of SFC Jackson, the cell phone was used to place a call to the second secretary of the Iraqi embassy in Manila, Hisham Hussein. It was not Hussein's only contact with Abu Sayyaf.

"He was surveilled, and we found out he was in contact with Abu Sayyaf and also pro-Iraqi demonstrators," says a Philippine government source, who continued, "[Philippine intelligence] was able to monitor their cell phone calls. [Abu Sayyaf leaders] called him right after the bombing. They were always talking."

An analysis of Iraqi embassy phone records by Philippine authorities showed that Hussein had been in regular contact with Abu Sayyaf leaders both before and after the attack that killed SFC Jackson. Andrea Domingo, immigration commissioner for the Philippines, said Hussein ran an "established network" of terrorists in the country. Hussein had also met with members of the New People's Army, a Communist opposition group on the State Department's list of foreign terrorist groups, in his office at the embassy. According to a Philippine government official, the Philippine National Police uncovered documents in a New People's Army compound that indicate the Iraqi embassy had provided funding for the group. Hisham Hussein and two other Iraqi embassy employees were ordered out of the Philippines on February 14, 2003.

Interestingly, an Abu Sayyaf leader named Hamsiraji Sali at least twice publicly boasted that his group received funding from Iraq. For instance, on March 2, 2003, he told the Philippine Daily Inquirer that the Iraqi regime had provided the terrorist group with 1million pesos--about $20,000--each year since 2000.

ANOTHER ITEM from the Iraq-Philippines files is a "security report" prepared by the Iraqi embassy's third secretary, Ahmad Mahmud Ghalib, and sent to Baghdad by Ambassador Samarmad. The report provides a behind-the-scenes glimpse of the Iraqi Intelligence operation in the Philippines. A cover memo from the ambassador, dated April 12, 2001, gives an overview: "The report contain[s] a variety of issues including intelligence issues and how the Philippines, American and Zionist intelligence operate in the Philippines, especially the movements of the American intelligence in their efforts to fight terrorism and recruiting a variety of nationalities, particularly Arabs."

Ghalib's report is a rambling account of a phone conversation he had with an Iraqi intelligence informer named Muhammad al-Zanki, an Iraqi citizen living in the Philippines, who is referred to throughout the document as Abu Ahmad. The embassy official is looking for information on a third person, an informer named Omar Ghazal, and believes that Abu Ahmad might have some. (To review: Salah Samarmad is the Iraqi ambassador; Ahmad Mahmud Ghalib is the embassy's third secretary, most likely an Iraqi intelligence officer and author of the "security report"; Abu Ahmad is an Iraqi intelligence informer; and Omar Ghazal is another Iraqi intelligence informer.)

As the conversation begins, Abu Ahmad tells his embassy contact that he doesn't know where Omar Ghazal is and would have told the embassy if he did. He then tells the embassy contact that when he called Omar Ghazal's aunt to check on his whereabouts, she used a word in Tagalog--walana--which means "not here." But Abu Ahmad says its connotations are not good. "That word is used when you target one of the personnel who are assigned to complete everything (full mission). Then they announce that he is traveling and so on, and that's what I'm afraid of." The Iraqi embassy contact asks him to elaborate. "I have been exposed to that same phrase before, when I asked about an individual, and later on I found out that he was physically eliminated and no one knows anything about him."

The embassy official assures Abu Ahmad that Iraqi intelligence has also lost track of Ghazal, and became alarmed when he abruptly stopped attending soccer practice at a local college. Abu Ahmad fears the worst. "I'm afraid they might have killed him and I'm very worried about him," he says, according to the report. "The method that those people use is terrible and that's why I refuse to work with them."

The Iraqi embassy official interrupts Abu Ahmad. "Who are they? I would like to know who they are."

"Didn't I tell you before who they are?"

"No."

"The office group," says Abu Ahmad.

"Which office?" asks his Iraqi embassy handler.

"A long time ago the American FBI opened up an office in the Philippines, under American supervision and that there are Philippine Intelligence groups that work there. The goal of the office is to fight international terrorism (in the Philippines of course) and they have employees from various nationalities that speak of peace and international terrorism and how important it is to put an end to terrorism. The office also has other espionage affairs involving Arab citizens to work with them in order to provide them with information on the Arabs who are living in the Philippines and also for other spying purposes."

Abu Ahmad continues: "They also monitor diplomacy, and after I tried to lessen my amount of office work, I became aware that the office group was trying to get in contact with the person who is in charge of temporary work, Malik al-Athir, when he was alone."

DOJ_NMG_0019034

Abu Ahmad tells his Iraqi embassy contact, Ghalib, that "the office" was trying to recruit an Arab to monitor Arab citizens in the Philippines. The Iraqi embassy contact suggests that Abu Ahmad volunteer for the job. Abu Ahmad says he had other plans. "I am leaving after I finish selling my house and properties and will move to Peshawar [Pakistan]. There I will be supplied with materials, weapons, explosives, and get married and then move to America. Do you know that there are more than one thousand Iraqi extremists who perform heroism jobs?" The speaker presumably means martyrdom operations.

The Iraqi embassy contact asks Abu Ahmad how he knows that those people are not "Saudis, Kuwaitis, Iranians."

Abu Ahmad replies: "They are bin Laden's people and all of them are extremists and they are heroes. Do you want me to give you their names?"

"Why not? Yes, I want them," says the Iraqi embassy contact.

"I will supply you with the names very soon. I will write some for you because I am in touch with them," says Abu Ahmad.

This report raises more questions than it answers. Who is Omar Ghazal and why did he disappear? What is the "office group" and how is it connected to Americans? What happened to Abu Ahmad? Were his stated plans--moving to Peshawar to obtain weapons and explosives and then moving to the United States--just bluster to impress his Iraqi embassy handler? A way to discontinue his work for the Iraqi regime? Or was he serious? Is he here now?

A SECOND internal Iraqi file obtained by The Weekly Standard concerns relations between Iraqi Intelligence and Saudi opposition groups. The document was apparently compiled at some point after January 1997, judging by the most recent date in the text, and discusses four Saudi opposition groups: the Committee for Defense of Legitimate Rights, the Reform and Advice Committee (Osama bin Laden), People of al Jazeera Union Organization, and the Saudi Hezbollah.

The New York Times first reported on the existence of this file on June 25, 2004. "American officials described the document as an internal report by the Iraqi intelligence service detailing efforts to seek cooperation with several Saudi opposition groups, including Mr. bin Laden's organization, before al Qaeda had become a full-fledged terrorist organization." According to the Times, a Pentagon task force "concluded that the document 'appeared authentic,' and that it 'corroborates and expands on previous reporting' about contacts between Iraqi intelligence and Mr. bin Laden in Sudan, according to the task force's analysis."

The most provocative aspect of the document is the discussion of efforts to seek cooperation between Iraqi Intelligence and the Saudi opposition group run by bin Laden, known to the Iraqis as the "Reform and Advice Committee." The translation of that section appears below.

We moved towards the committee by doing the following:

A. During the visit of the Sudanese Dr. Ibrahim al-Sanusi to Iraq and his meeting with Mr. Uday Saddam Hussein, on December 13, 1994, in the presence of the respectable, Mr. Director of the Intelligence Service, he [Dr. al-Sanusi] pointed out that the opposing Osama bin Laden, residing in Sudan, is reserved and afraid to be depicted by his enemies as an agent of Iraq. We prepared to meet him in Sudan (The Honorable Presidency was informed of the results of the meeting in our letter 782 on December 17, 1994).

B. An approval to meet with opposer Osama bin Laden by the Intelligence Services was given by the Honorable Presidency in its letter 138, dated January 11, 1995 (attachment 6). He [bin Laden] was met by the previous general director of M4 in Sudan and in the presence of the Sudanese, Ibrahim al-Sanusi, on February 19, 1995. We discussed with him his organization. He requested the broadcast of the speeches of Sheikh Sulayman al-Uda (who has influence within Saudi Arabia and outside due to being a well known religious and influential personality) and to designate a program for them through the broadcast directed inside Iraq, and to perform joint operations against the foreign forces in the land of Hijaz. (The Honorable Presidency was informed of the details of the meeting in our letter 370 on March 4, 1995, attachment 7.)

C. The approval was received from the Leader, Mr. President, may God keep him, to designate a program for them through the directed broadcast. We were left to develop the relationship and the cooperation between the two sides to see what other doors of cooperation and agreement open up. The Sudanese side was informed of the Honorable Presidency's agreement above, through the representative of the Respectable Director of Intelligence Services, our Ambassador in Khartoum.

D. Due to the recent situation of Sudan and being accused of supporting and embracing of terrorism, an agreement with the opposing Saudi Osama bin Laden was reached. The agreement required him to leave Sudan to another area. He left Khartoum in July 1996. The information we have indicates that he is currently in Afghanistan. The relationship with him is ongoing through the Sudanese side. Currently we are working to invigorate this relationship through a new channel in light of his present location.

(It should be noted that the documents given to The Weekly Standard did not include the attachments, letters to and from Saddam Hussein about the status of the Iraq-al Qaeda relationship. And the last sentence differs slightly from the version provided to the New York Times. In the Weekly Standard document, Iraq is seeking to "invigorate" its relationship with al Qaeda; in the Times translation, Iraq is seeking to "continue" that relationship.)

Another passage of the Iraq-Saudi opposition memo details the relationship between the Iraqi regime and the Committee for Defense of Legitimate Rights (CDLR), founded by Dr. Muhammad Abdallah al-Massari. Once again, Dr. Ibrahim al-Sanusi, the senior Sudanese government official, was a key liaison between the two sides. Al-Massari is widely regarded as an ideological mouthpiece for al Qaeda, a designation he does little to dispute. His radio station broadcasts al Qaeda propaganda, and his website features the rantings of prominent jihadists. He has lived in London for more than a decade. The Iraqi Intelligence memo recounts two meetings involving Dr. al-Sanusi and CDLR representatives in 1994 and reports that al-Massari requested assistance from the Iraqi regime for a trip to Iraq.

In 1995, the Iraqis turned to another Saudi to facilitate their relationship with al-Massari. According to the Iraqi memo, Ahmid Khudir al-Zahrani was a diplomat at the Saudi embassy in Washington who applied for political asylum in the United States. His application was denied, and al-Zahrani contacted the Iraqi embassy in London, seeking asylum in Iraq. His timing was good. Al-Zahrani's request came just as Iraqis were stepping up efforts to establish better relations with the Saudi opposition. According to the Iraqi Intelligence memo:

A complete plan was put in place to bring the aforementioned [al-Zahrani] to Iraq in coordination with the Foreign Ministry and our [intelligence] station in Khartoum [Sudan]. He and his family were issued Iraqi passports with pseudonyms by our embassy in Khartoum. He arrived to Iraq on April 21, 1995, and multiple meetings were held with him to obtain information about the Saudi opposition.

These contacts were not, contrary to the speculation of some Middle East experts, simply an effort to keep tabs on an enemy. The memo continues, summarizing Iraqi Intelligence activities:

We are in the process of following up on the subject, to try and establish a nucleus of Saudi opposition in Iraq, and use our relationship with [al-Massari] to serve our intelligence goals.

The final document provided to The Weekly Standard is a translation of a memo from the "Republican Command, Intelligence Division," dated September 15, 2001. It is addressed to "Mr. M.A.M.5."

Our Afghani source number 11002 (his biographic information in attachment #1) has provided us information that the Afghani consul Ahmed Dahestani (his biographic information attachment #2) has talked in front of him about the following:

1. That Osama bin Laden and the Taliban group in Afghanistan are in communication with Iraq and that previously a group of Taliban and Osama bin Laden have visited Iraq.

2. That America has evidence that the Iraqi government and the group of Osama bin Laden have cooperated to attack targets inside America.

3. In the event that it has been proven that the group of Osama bin Laden and the Taliban planning such operations, it is possible that America will attack Iraq and Afghanistan.

4. That the Afghani consul heard of the relation between Iraq and the group of Osama bin Laden while he was in Iran.

5. In the light of what has been presented, we suggest to write to the committee of information.

This document is speculative in parts, and the information it contains is third-hand at best. Its value depends on the credibility of "source number 11002" and of Ahmed Dahestani and of the sources Dahestani relied on, all of which are unknown.

We are left, then, with three small pieces to add to a large and elaborate puzzle. We will never have a complete picture of the Iraqi regime's support for global terrorism, but the coming release of a flood of captured documents should get us closer.

A new and highly illuminating article in Foreign Affairs draws on hundreds of Iraqi documents to provide a look at the Iraq war from the Iraqi perspective. The picture that emerges is that of an Iraqi regime built on a foundation of paranoia and lies and eager to attack its perceived enemies, internal and external. This paragraph is notable:

The Saddam Fedayeen also took part in the regime's domestic terrorism operations and planned for attacks throughout Europe and the Middle East. In a document dated May 1999, Saddam's older son, Uday, ordered preparations for "special operations, assassinations, and bombings, for the centers and traitor symbols in London, Iran and the self-ruled areas [Kurdistan]." Preparations for "Blessed July," a regime-directed wave of "martyrdom" operations against targets in the West, were well under way at the time of the coalition invasion.

Think about that last sentence.

US Puts Iraqi Documents On The Web (BOS)

By Hiawatha Bray

The Boston Globe, March 19, 2006

Goal is to speed up translation of files

Joseph Shahda of Randolph earns his living as an engineer. But in his spare time, he's an intelligence agent, working to ferret out the truth about the regime of deposed Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0019036

When the US government on Thursday began publishing captured Iraqi government documents on the Internet, Shahda eagerly began to translate the files into English and publish them on a conservative website.

"I feel a sense of duty," said Shahda, a native of Lebanon who supports President Bush's decision to invade Iraq. "I think it's a duty for people who know Arabic to translate the documents."

US officials hope that thousands of other Arabic speakers feel the same. Goaded by Congress, Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte has begun to release millions of pages of captured files online in an unprecedented effort to harness the Internet to disseminate raw intelligence material. There, anybody with a knowledge of Arabic can download the files and translate them for the world.

It's the same "open source" principle that drove the successful development of the Internet and of powerful free software like the Linux operating system. Instead of hiring a team of brilliant professionals to analyze Iraqi documents in secret, the open source systems will use hundreds of clever amateurs, who'll publish their work for anyone to analyze and improve upon.

"Workers control the means of production, but without all that tedious communism," said Glenn Reynolds, a law professor at the University of Tennessee and author of "An Army of Davids," a book that shows how the Internet encourages public activism.

US intelligence officials say nearly all the documents released have been given at least a cursory reading by Arabic experts. Beth Marple, Negroponte's deputy press secretary, said amateur translators won't find any major surprises, such as proof Hussein hid stockpiles of chemical weapons.

Still, conservative bloggers, eager to bolster the case for going to war against Iraq, have long argued for release of the documents. They gained a powerful ally last month in Michigan Republican Pete Hoekstra, chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. In an interview with blogger Andrew Marcus, Hoekstra called for Negroponte to release the documents online. "Unleash the power of the Net," Hoekstra said. "Let the blogosphere go." Kansas Republican Pat Roberts, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, backed Hoekstra's proposal.

Within hours of the first release of documents, Shahda posted his first translation on the conservative website Free Republic. It was an Iraqi intelligence report of an interview with an Afghan informant that suggests -- but does not prove -- agents of Al Qaeda and the Taliban were active in Iraq before the Sept. 11 attacks.

According to an intelligence official who declined to be identified, Negroponte plans to release all documents that have no further intelligence value. Files that might help apprehend members of the Iraqi insurgency will remain under wraps. So will files that could violate the privacy or harm the reputations of innocent people. For instance, the Hussein regime used rape as a method of torture, and the government won't release documents containing the names of Iraqi rape victims. Nor will it release files mentioning Iraqi-Americans or other US citizens, such as journalists.

The remaining documents, the official said, will mainly provide insights into Hussein's rule. "This stuff needs to be laid bare because it helps the democratic process in Iraq, like it did in South Africa, like it did in Germany," he said.

At least one Iraqi blogger agrees. "We are currently trying to organize a network of bilingual Iraqi bloggers to translate as many of the documents as possible," said "Omar," a Baghdad dentist who publishes IraqTheModel, which is widely read in the United States. Omar will not reveal his full name because his support for the overthrow of Saddam Hussein could put him in danger of death.

While conservative US bloggers, and some Iraqis, are eager to translate and read the Iraq documents, some prominent liberal bloggers scoffed at the release. "To me, this is just more evidence that the Bush administration doesn't take national security seriously," wrote Markos Moulitsas Zúniga, founder of the popular Daily Kos website. "Why doesn't our government have enough translators to handle this job?"

Jonathan Singer, weekend editor of the liberal site MyDD.com, was equally dismissive. "The Hussein documents are not of great interest to me," said Singer, "for the simple reason that they simply reinforce the notion that the Bush administration cherry picks intelligence to suit their needs."

Demonstrations Mark Third Anniversary Of Iraq Invasion (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

About 1,000 people gathered near Times Square yesterday, in one of dozens of energetic and often unfocused rallies held in cities across the United States and around the world to protest the third anniversary of the United States invasion of Iraq.

Yesterday's protests, like those held to mark each of the two previous anniversaries of the March 2003 invasion, were vigorous and peaceful but far smaller than the large-scale marches that preceded the war, despite polls showing lower public support for the war than in years past and anemic approval ratings for President Bush, himself a focus of many of the protesters.

But the Iraq war itself — though the obvious inspiration for the march — was noticeably less central to the proceedings than in previous years. The rally in Times Square featured dozens of speakers on topics ranging from relations with Iran to the treatment of Hurricane Katrina refugees.

"No group owns the day," said Dustin Langley, a spokesman for the Troops Out Now Coalition, which helped organize protests in New York, Boston, Washington, Los Angeles, Atlanta and other cities. "Whoever you are, be out there on the streets."

Tens of thousands of people marched in Rome, while officials in London reported a crowd of 15,000. Other demonstrations occurred in Greece, Turkey, Spain, Brazil, Australia and Canada.

One of the biggest protests in the United States was held in San Francisco, for decades a hub of antiwar sentiment. The police there estimated the crowd gathered outside City Hall at 6,000. Many chanted slogans opposing Mr. Bush, and most appeared to hail from a distinctly grayer demographic than that of other protest events.

"There are not enough young people here," said Paul Perchonock, 61, a medical doctor from the Bay Area. "They don't see themselves as having a stake."

In his weekly radio address, President Bush defended the administration's record in Iraq, saying that the country's decision to depose the regime of Saddam Hussein was "a difficult decision—and it was the right decision." He pledged to "finish the mission" despite calls for withdrawal.

Today marks the third anniversary of the invasion.

In Washington, a relatively small crowd of about 300 people gathered at the United States Naval Observatory, where Vice President Dick Cheney lives.

Debbie Boch, 52, a restaurant manager from Denver, said she and two friends bought plane tickets to Washington two months ago, before the demonstration had been planned. It was the fifth protest march she attended since the war began, she said, and among the smallest.

"It's very disappointing, especially in Washington, D.C.," she said. "You think this is the place where people come to make things happen. I'm just not sure why there aren't more people hear today."

But other marchers took solace from recent opinion polls showing public opinion slowly drifting against the war.

"Three years ago, folks thought we were crazy; two years ago, people still thought we were crazy," said the Rev. Graylan Scott Hagler, a minister at Plymouth Congregational United Church of Christ in Washington. "We know now that most of the American people do not believe that we are crazy anymore."

In New York, protesters gathered on three lanes of Broadway south of 42nd Street, after the city denied the organizers permission to set up near an armed services recruitment office. Mounted police patrolled the avenue, while dozens of police officers attempted to keep traffic moving on the street and sidewalk.

The demonstrators, bundled against the cold and confined by police fences to a two-block stretch, came from as close as Chelsea and as far away as South Korea. Quakers mixed with communists and labor organizers with high school students, as antiwar entrepreneurs hawked T-shirts under the sultry gaze of a Calvin Klein model, reclining in a massive billboard advertisement overhead.

"I am just sick and grief stricken that we are continuing this war in Iraq," said Julie Finch, 63, who lives in Manhattan. "I mourn every soldier that dies. This war was based on lies."

A nearby Starbucks — a chain once disparaged by the anti-globalization protesters from which today's antiwar movement draws some inspiration — served as a warming hut and bathroom station for the protesters, even serving up a latte or two to placard-brandishing customers. Journalists conducted interviews in the heated vestibule of a Gap store on 42nd Street until a security guard asked them to move.

A recorded message from Mumia Abu-Jamal, an inmate in Pennsylvania and a left-wing cause célèbre, drifted across the speakers as garbled as the service announcements emanating from subway speakers in the station below ground.

Around 2:30 p.m., the rally turned into a march, as those gathered walked around the corner down 42nd Street, bound for the United Nations. They moved slowly, sprawling the length of two crosstown blocks, with a few Katrina refugees at the column's front. At the back, Devin Kyle, 26, and Tonia Shoumatoff, 50, carried a 20-foot banner reading, simply, "May Peace Prevail."

"Rather than fight hatred with hatred," Mr. Kyle said, "I came here to be a peaceful presence."

Anti-War Rallies Mark Iraq Anniversary (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

NEW YORK -- Thousands of anti-war protesters took to the streets around the world Saturday, marking the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq with demands that coalition troops leave immediately.

DOJ_NMG_0019038

Wael Musfar of the Arab Muslim American Federation addressed more than 1,000 people who gathered in Times Square near a military recruiting station, which was guarded by police.

"We say enough hypocrisy, enough lies, our soldiers must come home now," Musfar said from a parked flatbed truck. Participants chanted, "Stop the U.S. war machine, from Iraq to Korea to the Philippines."

Many attendees emphasized that they support the troops. "I have friends in Iraq and I just want them to know that I may not be able to support them there, but I can here," said Jose Avila, 36.

Protesters in Chicago marched down Michigan Avenue to a Saturday night rally at downtown's Daley Plaza. Police estimated that more than 7,000 people took part, but said there were no arrests.

"I'm against this war, I'm against the torture," said protester Martha Conrad, 54, of Chicago. "We're doing this for the people of Iraq."

One bystander, with a red, white and black Iraqi flag flung across his shoulders, said he came to show he backed President Bush's policies in Iraq. "I support freeing Iraqis from tyranny," said 33-year-old Ryan Stiles of Chicago.

Protests also were held in Australia, Asia and Europe, but many events were far smaller than organizers had hoped. In London, police said 15,000 people joined a march from Parliament and Big Ben to a rally in Trafalgar Square. The anniversary last year attracted 45,000 protesters in the city.

"We are against this war, both for religious reasons and on a humanitarian basis, too," said Imran Saghir, 25, a Muslim student who attended the London rally.

Britain, the United States' strongest supporter in the Iraq war, has about 8,000 troops in Iraq but plans to pull out 800 of them by May. The British military has reported 103 deaths there. More than 2,300 American troops have died in the war, which began three years ago Sunday.

In Washington, a protester wearing a Bush mask and bearing fake blood on his hands waved to passing automobiles outside Vice President Dick Cheney's residence, where about 200 people demonstrated against the war.

Rev. Graylan Scott Hagler of the Plymouth Congregational United Church of Christ said the rallies nationwide are a "tapestry of resistance."

"Most people believe we aren't crazy anymore," he said.

In Concord, N.H., nearly 300 peace activists marched about a mile from a National Guard armory to the Statehouse.

"I feel a huge sense of betrayal that I went and risked my life for a lie," said Joseph Turcott, 26, a former Marine who served in the invasion.

Other U.S. cities where protesters gathered Saturday included Boston and San Francisco.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld answered critics of the war in a guest column in Sunday's editions of The Washington Post, asserting that if Americans were to turn away from Iraq, it would be "the modern equivalent of handing postwar Germany back to the Nazis."

"It would be as great a disgrace as if we had asked the liberated nations of Eastern Europe to return to Soviet domination because it was too hard or too tough or we didn't have the patience to work with them as they built free countries," he wrote.

Rumsfeld cited rising voter participation in successive Iraqi elections, support for security forces shown by Sunni religious leaders once sympathetic to the insurgency, and rising competence of Iraqi troops as evidence of progress since the invasion three years ago.

"The terrorists seem to recognize that they are losing in Iraq," he said.

In demonstrations in several cities worldwide, protesters carried posters showing pictures of Bush, calling him the "World's No. 1 terrorist."

In Turkey, where opposition to the war cuts across all political stripes, about 3,000 protesters gathered in Istanbul, police said. "Murderer USA," read a sign in Taksim Square.

In Stockholm, Sweden, about 1,000 demonstrators gathered for a rally and march to the U.S. Embassy. One protester was dressed as the hooded figure shown in an iconic photograph from the Abu Ghraib prison.

In Copenhagen, Denmark, more than 2,000 demonstrators marched from the U.S. Embassy to the British Embassy, demanding the withdrawal of 530 Danish troops from southern Iraq.

On Sunday, up to 3,000 protesters were expected in Seoul, South Korea, which has the third-largest contingent of foreign troops in Iraq after the U.S. and Britain.

Britain's defense chief earlier urged demonstrators in London to support the Iraqi people and condemn terrorism.

"When people go on the streets of London today, I do wish just occasionally they would go out in support of the United Nations, the Iraqi people and the Iraqi democrats and condemn terrorists," Defense Secretary John Reid told British Broadcasting Corp. radio during a visit to Iraq.

Members of the Stop the War Coalition, the organizers of the London march, had little sympathy for Reed's remarks.

"Every day you hear of new deaths. Tony Blair has actually made Iraq a worse place for the Iraqi people," said Rose Gentle, whose soldier son Gordon, 19, was killed by a roadside bomb last year in Basra, southern Iraq.

Thousands Protest War's 3rd Anniversary (LAT)

By Sara Lin And Deborah Schoch, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

From Australia to Hollywood, people march to demand that troops be withdrawn.

While some brought anti-war placards and petitions to Hollywood on Saturday, a group called Veterans for Peace crafted 100 flag-draped coffins from cardboard cartons and carried them down Sunset Boulevard to mark the more than 2,300 U.S. troops killed in the Iraq war.

At MacArthur Park in Los Angeles, the American Friends Service Committee laid out 240 pairs of boots, each bearing the name of a fallen soldier from California.

And in San Francisco, protesters dressed as members of President Bush's cabinet and carried signs that read "United World Not United States" and "Stop U.S. Imperialism."

Worldwide, demonstrations started Saturday with 500 people chanting anti-war slogans in Sydney, Australia, and rolled around the world, with major protests in Pakistan, London and the United States, where more than 1,000 people gathered in New York's Times Square.

As many as 3,000 demonstrators were expected today in Seoul. South Korea has the third-largest contingent of foreign troops in Iraq, behind the U.S. and Britain. Another protest is planned outside the U.S. embassy in Kuala Lumpur, the largest city in Malaysia.

In California on Saturday, thousands of people took part in activities to show their opposition to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq that began three years ago and to call for a pullout of American troops.

As he sat in MacArthur Park next to a worn pair of black boots with a tag bearing his son's name, Fernando Suarez del Solar, 50, addressed the crowd in English and Spanish to encourage more Latinos to participate in the anti-war movement. A large image of his son was propped up behind him.

"My son died, and anything I do here will not bring him back … but I think I can save other children," he said. Suarez del Solar's son was one of the first Marines killed in the war.

Gary Russell, 61, noted that the crowd at the park was small and that not many people were heading to Hollywood to listen to speeches there.

"I agree this march is not big — not like the massive marches we had in the '60s — but in time it will happen," Russell said.

Later in the day, several thousand people marched in Hollywood to an area near the Kodak Theatre. Among them was Pablo Martin, who said he was joining an anti-war march for the first time. Martin, 32, of Los Angeles shouldered the corner of a prop coffin as he marched down Sunset Boulevard.

"I just got tired of not doing anything," he said. "I think we've all been duped, and the young, the poor, the minorities are taking the brunt of it."

Several of the protesters said they are growing discouraged at the length of the war.

"I don't see any possible way for it to end any time soon," said Flo Webster, 73, of Woodland Hills, who held up a hand-drawn sign reading "Grandmothers for Peace," decorated with photos of her four grandchildren.

Those who addressed the crowd included Paul Haggis, who received two Academy Awards at the Kodak Theatre this month for the best picture winner, "Crash." He won for original screenwriting and was one of the producers honored for the film.

"This is my first time back to the Kodak Theatre since March 5 and I couldn't be prouder to be with all of you," Haggis said.

Actor Martin Sheen, who plays U.S. President Josiah Bartlet in the television series "The West Wing," drew some of the loudest cheers with his call to end the war.

"Let my country awake," he concluded, quoting India's first Nobel laureate, the late Rabindranath Tagore.

After Sheen's speech, Vietnam War veteran Edward Smith, 56, who opposes the war in Iraq, leaned over a metal guardrail and called out to Sheen, "Why isn't anyone up there talking about the troops?"

Sheen paused to talk to Smith, pointing out the makeshift coffins carried by the protesters. "We want them home safely," Sheen said of the troops.

In San Francisco, protesters danced in the streets and beat drums.

DOJ_NMG_0019040

"It's very painful to me that our country is doing this and killing innocent people," said Joan Emerson, 70, of Mill Valley, who attended with the group Old Lesbians Organizing for Change. "I'm against all war, and I'm very concerned that I'm responsible as an American citizen for this kind of thing happening."

Persis Karim, 33, said she was concerned that the United States might launch a preemptive strike on Iran.

"They may not do it in quite the same way as Iraq," said Karim, a professor at San Jose State University. "But the agenda of the Bush administration is to secure the region, and obviously Iran is a problem to them."

Marchers Make Slow Progress (Advocate)

Delays hinder, fail to stop war protesters

Published: Mar 19, 2006

CHALMETTE — Saturday morning went badly for a couple from Poplarville, Miss., until they found an anti-war march advancing slowly toward New Orleans.

Veteran anti-war activist Joyce Zehnle, 74, and her husband, Dick Zehnle, 72, a former corporate attorney, were waiting outside the Chalmette National Military Cemetery for the march to arrive.

The Zehnles are former college professors who said they have been demonstrating against war since the late 1960s, when they encouraged their students to oppose America's role in the Vietnam War.

But, the couple said, they had driven all over eastern New Orleans without finding any sign of the "Veterans March to New Orleans," the anti-war march that left Mobile, Ala., on Monday — bound to reach New Orleans by today, the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Organizers of the five-day march said their protest was designed to point out the link between the high human and economic cost of war in the Middle East — and the failure of the U.S. government to respond to the needs of Americans at home, particularly on the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast.

But at the moment, the only alternative to waiting at the cemetery was to get in their car for the one-hour drive back to the political isolation of their beloved ranch, deep in Mississippi.

"The land is so beautiful and it's so quiet," Joyce Zehnle said. "The people there are so good to us — and honest." Her husband nodded in agreement, again. Their neighbors made sure they had plenty of drinking water after Katrina, he said. "They are, individually, good people."

But the Zehnles' corner of Mississippi also is staunchly populated by religious conservatives, they said. The former professors lamented what they see as a lack of critical thinking among the public, especially of their government officials.

So the Zehnles lingered by the military cemetery. A chilly March wind blew. The hasps of the cemetery flagpole clanged in the background.

Moments earlier, word came that that the "Veterans March to New Orleans" was behind schedule. A spokesperson for the march said the 200 activists were about a half-hour away from a highway junction in the swampy eastern tip of Orleans Parish. The 11 a.m. rally at Chalmette cemetery was postponed until today.

A press conference scheduled for earlier Saturday morning at the Bayou Sauvage National Wildlife Refuge was apparently too late to salvage. An update was relayed to the Zehnles and three other anti-war activists gathered outside the Chalmette cemetery, two women in a car and a skinny man on a bicycle. They left; the Zehnles stayed.

The Zehnles' disappointment in the progress of the march was clear. "Chicago was better organized," Joyce Zehnle sighed, apparently recalling some past protest.

Dick Zehnle said he was looking forward to the Chalmette rally, to be keynoted by Cindy Sheehan, the mother of a soldier killed in Iraq who became contemporary America's best-known anti-war activist when she camped outside of President Bush's retreat in Crawford, Texas.

Joyce Zehnle, meanwhile, had been eagerly anticipating the Bayou Sauvage press conference, particularly an Iraq war veteran's address on the health threat that the military's use of "depleted" uranium for ammunition allegedly poses to U.S. troops and Iraqi civilians alike.

The couple's fervor against war is matched perhaps only by their passion for political activism and books, especially the works of leftward intellectuals such as Noam Chomsky, Howard Zinn, and Middle East expert Robert Fisk.

Joyce Zehnle, who grew up in New Orleans, said she was politically active in her early 20s, during the Civil Rights Era. "I sat with blacks in the back of the streetcar because I was trying to be a good Christian."

DOJ_NMG_0019041

Her husband recalled that his political awakening came much later, during his 30s when he traveled through Europe and delved into Chomsky. “We are brainwashed in school,” said. “We are taught American exceptionalism. We are always moral; we are always right; and God is always on our side.’”

During the Vietnam War, both said, they were professors of religious studies who encouraged their students to oppose war.

Suddenly two women drove up, an advance team from the march. The procession had reached the highway junction in eastern New Orleans, they said. The march would resume at 1 p.m. advancing toward Bayou Sauvage.

The Zehnles got into their own car, and drove east into the wildlife refuge. Hurricane debris littered both sides of Chef Menteur Highway.

A Volkswagen bus bore a large flag with a peace sign on its rear bumper. The lead car had a sign: “Abandon Iraq — not our Gulf Coast.”

Newspaper photographers lined the opposite side of the road.

The Zehnles made a U-turn and pulled their car behind the caravan trailing the marchers. They inched forward behind a bus with California markings.

On the rear of the bus, a raft of bumper stickers denounced the war: “Bring them home now!;” “Bush brings out the worst in America;” “Zero Tolerance for Torture.”

The Zehnles waved from their car. They seemed happier. No longer politically isolated, still retired, and very, very active.

About 600 rally in Indy on 3rd anniversary of Iraq war

Jamie Gonzalez supported her son's decision to join the Army 2 1/2 years ago to defend his nation, get an education and "have an adventure."

Loud and clear: Anne Peay, her sister Susan Coleman and Sara Federle (from left) joined Saturday's protest at Monument Circle. "We want this nightmare over," peace activist Cindy Sheehan told the group by telephone call. - MATT KRYGER / The Star

On Saturday, holding his photo at a peace rally in Downtown Indianapolis, Gonzalez said she now just wants her son, Jamiell, 21, to come home.

"I am so afraid he will be sent to Iraq," said the Indianapolis woman, whose son is now stationed in Kuwait, on the Iraq border. "He is serving his country, doing something he loves, but they need to bring the troops home."

Gonzalez was among about 600 people who gathered on Monument Circle to rally for peace on the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Some carried hand-lettered signs with anti-war slogans such as, "War is not the answer," and "Choose peace." Others carried flags with peace signs.

At one point, the crowd broke into a chant, "One, two, three, four, bring our troops back to our shore." Others stood quietly, clutching flowers. At another point, they released red balloons carrying the names of Indiana soldiers who had died in Iraq.

One after another, speakers criticized the war's casualties and costs. Some said the war was a crime and called for the impeachment of President Bush.

"We should not be squandering hundreds of millions of dollars on a bloody boondoggle," said longtime U.S. Rep. Andy Jacobs, a Democrat who retired in 1997. He excoriated the president and his decision to go to war.

"The war hawk who has never been to war by definition doesn't know what he is talking about," said Jacobs, a Korean War veteran, prompting cheers from the crowd. "The only Americans in any danger from Iraq are the ones who were sent there to be slaughtered."

Saturday's gathering was more than triple the size of last year's rally, a sign that more Americans are growing tired of the war, said Heather Allen-Garde, a member of Progressive Indiana, one of several groups that organized the event.

"I think people realized this is costing us incredible amounts of money we don't have, and we are losing a lot of soldiers," Allen-Garde said.

At least 2,311 U.S. military members, including 59 people with Indiana ties, have died and more than 17,000 have been wounded since the Iraq war began. According to a recent Associated Press-Ipsos poll, only 39 percent of Americans support the way the president has handled the war. The poll also found almost four of five Americans, including 70 percent of Republicans, think Iraq is headed for civil war.

Marvin Wagner, 78, Indianapolis, a Korean War veteran, said the war is senseless.

DOJ_NMG_0019042

"There are a few of us vets against the war," said Wagner. "I was in Korea. I was drafted. I know what the horror of war is. I never did get over it, and they're creating more like me."

The rally included a telephone call from peace activist Cindy Sheehan, whose anti-war vigils outside Bush's Texas ranch last year drew worldwide attention.

"We want this nightmare over," Sheehan said.

Sheehan, who was in New Orleans for another peace rally, encouraged the crowd to continue protesting and to "work for peace."

Across the street, a small group of counterprotesters held signs in support of Bush and the war, including one that said, "Honor the dead by rooting for victory."

Even some at the rally weren't sure the troops should come home.

Bridie Trozelli, 18, who moved to Indianapolis three years ago from Sweden, said she disagreed with war, "but from what I heard, if America pulls out now, it could leave (Iraq) in worse shape."

Gonzalez, however, said continuing to fight in Iraq wouldn't bring anything but more casualties on both sides.

"I think . . . the thing they could do now to make it better is to bring the troops home and peace will come sooner."

Anti-war Activist Cindy Sheehan Joins Marchers (MR)

By Ron Colquitt

Mobile Register, March 19, 2006

Still recovering from injuries suffered during a recent protest in New York City, anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan linked up with Gulf Coast peace marchers Thursday to participate in the final leg of their 140-mile trek from Mobile to New Orleans.

More than 200 people are making the trek to protest the war in Iraq and what they believe is the federal government's mismanagement of the Hurricane Katrina recovery along the Gulf Coast.

The march, which began Tuesday in Mobile, includes people from along the Gulf Coast and across the nation. A BBC crew and other news organizations have been documenting the march.

Sheehan, whose son, Casey Sheehan, was killed in Iraq, said Friday that she finds the recent United States and Iraq offensive against insurgents northeast of Samarra to be "despicable."

"Number one, they don't have to escalate the war, and they need to start bringing our troops home," Sheehan said. "That is what Americans want, Iraq wants, the world wants and our soldiers want. It won't solve anything with the killing of more people, and it just makes things worse."

Sheehan, who gained national recognition as she camped outside President Bush's Texas ranch after her son was killed, said she will be speaking Sunday during a rally in New Orleans that will culminate the peace march.

She said she would have been part of the Gulf Coast protest march from the beginning had she not been injured during a protest outside the United Nations in New York. Her sister, Dede Miller, was among the marchers who left Mobile on Tuesday.

Sheehan, who is from Berkeley, Calif., said she suffered a mild concussion and injuries to her back and right arm when police outside the United Nations dragged her 15 feet.

"I can't get dragged by that arm anytime soon," she said with a laugh.

She said she's proud of her sister for participating in the Gulf Coast protest from the beginning. Miller, Sheehan said, works for Families for Peace, an organization Sheehan founded.

Sheehan said she and her sister are dedicated to working to end the war, which has now cost the lives of more than 2,300 American servicemen and women.

Sheehan said she planned to speak Friday night in Slidell, La., where marchers planned to camp.

Paul Robinson of Mobile, who helped organize the march, said marchers were led into Slidell early Friday afternoon by a five-piece, brass jazz band.

"Oh man, this has been great," said Robinson, president of the Mobile chapter of Veterans for Peace. "We added about 15 more marchers just today."

The group, which is traveling by car and by foot, left Long Beach, Miss., on Friday morning. Protesters walked at least 10 of the 30 miles between Long Beach and Slidell, he said.

Rally Calls For End To Iraq War (PPG)

Marchers want soldiers home now

DOJ_NMG_0019043

Several hundred people marched through the streets of East Liberty, Shadyside and Oakland yesterday to protest the war in Iraq on the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion.

The three-mile-long march, organized by the Thomas Merton Center Anti-War Committee, began with a rally at the corner of Penn and Highland avenues. Featured were several speakers and performers including Pittsburgh rock band Soma Mestizo, whose lead singer Christiane D. said, "First I'd like to say hello to all the FBI agents who've joined us today," drawing cheers and laughter from the crowd.

Last week, the Thomas Merton Center released documents its members said showed the FBI was spying on its activists.

The rally and march were peaceful, occurring without any major incidents; only one arrest was reported. Organizers reported that some 2,000 people turned out for yesterday's rally, while police offered a much lower estimate.

Friends Katee Newhaus, 13, of Dormont, and Dana Dobson, 15, of Mt. Lebanon, called the turnout "not bad," but expressed chagrin that many of their friends and classmates couldn't be bothered to show up.

"There's a lot of apathy," said Dana. "It's like, OK, would you rather have an influence on how many people are dying, or go to a party that would happen [again] next week?"

Dana wore a T-shirt on which she had written in permanent marker "2,317; How Many More?" It was covered in 2,317 dots -- one for each American killed in the war. One of Katee's cousins was among the first American soldiers to die in Iraq.

Dave Lesako drove all the way in from Spring Hill Township in Greene County. An artist and former art teacher, Mr. Lesako held up a large drawing of cowboy boots lying in a pool of blood; he made it when the war first began.

"I figured I complain about the war all the time, I should come out and march," he said.

As for his fellow Greene County residents, he said, "even the country conservatives are questioning what's going on."

The protesters marched down Negley Avenue and along Walnut Street, past the boutiques and cafes, chanting "While you're shopping, bombs are dropping!" to the expressionless bystanders, who were clutching their Banana Republic bags or holding up camera phones to record the event.

When the group marched past the fraternity houses of Carnegie Mellon University, protester Greg Olverson half-expected to be greeted by counter-protests, like the fraternity members had staged last year.

"I remember them yelling, 'We're for the war, and Iran is next,' " said Mr. Olverson, a security guard from Pittsburgh.

The march ended at the military recruiting offices in Oakland, where protesters met with barricades and lines of police outfitted in riot gear, some on horseback, some holding police dogs. The marchers disbanded peacefully after less than an hour.

"I thought we had a great rally and a peaceful march," said Jim Kleissler, director of the Thomas Merton Center. "We really just wanted to come out and say peace is something that's part of America, and we're not going to let the FBI intimidate us."

Similar anti-war protests were staged yesterday in cities across the United States and the world.

In Washington, a protester wearing a President Bush mask and bearing fake blood on his hands waved to passing automobiles outside Vice President Dick Cheney's residence, where about 200 people demonstrated against the war.

In Concord, N.H., nearly 300 peace activists marched about a mile from a National Guard Armory to the Statehouse.

"I feel a huge sense of betrayal that I went and risked my life for a lie," said Joseph Turcott, 26, a former Marine who served in the invasion.

Protests were also held in Australia, Asia and Europe, but many events were far smaller than organizers had hoped.

In London, police said 15,000 people joined a march from Parliament and Big Ben to a rally in Trafalgar Square. The anniversary last year attracted 45,000 protesters in the city.

Worldwide Protests As War Enters 4th Year (MINNST/AP)

By Associated Press

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 19, 2006

Demonstrations demanded that all troops be withdrawn.

Thousands of war protesters took to the streets around the world Saturday, marking the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq with demands that coalition troops leave immediately.

In Minneapolis, protesters took up half of Hennepin Avenue as they marched from Lagoon Avenue in Uptown to the Basilica of St. Mary at the edge of downtown, waving signs with slogans such as "Impeach Bush" and "Support Our Troops. Bring Them Home Now!" Police estimated there were 3,500 marchers; march organizers put the number at about 4,200.

The demonstration was organized by The March 18 Coalition, an umbrella group representing various peace organizations, including Women Against Military Madness and the Iraq Peace Coalition.

"What we do by coming out here is we show the face of the resistance and the depth of the resistance," said Marie Braun, one of the organizers.

DOJ_NMG_0019044

Chuck Tomlinson, who lives in the Powderhorn neighborhood of Minneapolis, said he came to the rally to be counted, heard and seen. He's been against the war since Day One. "What has changed is that the president's incompetency has exceeded my expectations, or should I say my worst fears," he said.

David Langree, a student at South High in Minneapolis, said he's upset by how secretive he believes the government has been about its true motives for the war.

In New York, Wael Musfar of the Arab Muslim American Federation addressed more than 1,000 people who gathered in Times Square. "We say enough hypocrisy, enough lies, our soldiers must come home now," Musfar said.

Protests also were held in Australia, Asia and Europe, but many events were far smaller than organizers had hoped. In London, police said 15,000 people joined a march from Parliament to a rally in Trafalgar Square. The anniversary last year attracted 45,000 protesters in the city.

At Dudley Square in Boston, a few hundred protesters waved placards that read "Impeach Bush" and "Stop the War." About 6,000 protesters in San Francisco danced in the streets, beat drums and carried signs that read "Stop U.S. Imperialism."

Polls Show Public's Dwindling Support For War (SLPD)

By Bill Lambrecht

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 18, 2006

On the third anniversary of the Iraq war this weekend, more than 500 protests are scheduled around the country - including 27 in Missouri and Illinois - at a time of growing anti-war sentiment among the American public.

Thus far, the new pessimism appears to be having little effect in Washington, where Congress had approved billions of dollars more for war and a proposal to censure President George W. Bush for ordering electronic surveillance in the war on terror is drawing little support.

But an alliance of anti-war groups on Friday unveiled a well-funded effort aimed at rejecting political candidates this year who refuse to support a swift end to American involvement in Iraq.

A series of public-opinion polls published last week showed that support for the war had reached its lowest point and that Americans' view about progress in Iraq had turned starkly negative in recent weeks.

One of the polls, published on Friday by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, showed that two of three Americans disapprove of the way Bush is handling the war. For the first time, the Pew poll found that half of Americans support an immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq.

Carroll Doherty, the Pew Center's associate director, attributed the recent erosion of support for the war to doubts that U.S. troops can quell the insurgency and prevent civil war.

"The sense you get in this poll is that people don't see a lot of good options or a lot of good strategies," he said.

Bill Ramsey, a veteran organizer who is coordinating a protest rally in Forest Park on Sunday afternoon, said that he is seeing many new people involved in the St. Louis region's anti-war effort. He said that based on e-mail confirmations, he is expecting 800 people to take part in marches that culminate in a rally at the World's Fair Pavilion.

Ramsey asserted that the White House reiteration last week of its pre-emptive strike policy "is driving more people toward us."

The St. Louis protest is among more than 500 being held in all 50 states and the District of Columbia starting Sunday to commemorate the third anniversary of the Iraq invasion, according to United for Peace and Justice, a New York-based alliance of anti-war organizations. U.S. forces began bombing Iraq on March 19, 2003.

The next "soccer mom"?

The newly announced Voters for Peace is seeking five million signatures by November on a petition that reads: "I will not vote for or support any candidate for president or Congress who does not make a speedy end to the war in Iraq, and preventing any future war of aggression, a public position in his or her campaign."

A Fox News poll last week suggested that the war will be a key voting issue this year. When voters were asked what issue would determine who they supported for Congress, Iraq ranked second, just behind the category of spending and taxes.

Nonetheless, anti-war organizers have expressed frustration at what they describe as a disconnect between public sentiments and continued support for the war in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0019045

Last week, the House approved a spending package that included nearly $68 billion for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. In the Senate, a proposal by Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., to censure the president was unpopular even among Democrats.

Allan Lichtman, a political science professor at American University and a Democratic senatorial aspirant in Maryland, attributed the war support in Congress partly to fear.

"Critics of the president are still fearful that things will turn in Iraq and that (presidential adviser) Karl Rove will chew them up in November," he asserted.

Voters for Peace soon will begin spending some of $1 million it has raised from private donors on Web advertising to support the petition effort, organizers said at a news conference on Friday.

"The peace vote is the new soccer mom," contended Voters for Peace spokeswoman Linda Schade, referring to an influential voting bloc in recent elections.

Before And After Abu Ghraib, A U.S. Unit Abused Detainees (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt And Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

As the Iraqi insurgency intensified in early 2004, an elite Special Operations forces unit converted one of Saddam Hussein's former military bases near Baghdad into a top-secret detention center. There, American soldiers made one of the former Iraqi government's torture chambers into their own interrogation cell. They named it the Black Room.

In the windowless, jet-black garage-size room, some soldiers beat prisoners with rifle butts, yelled and spit in their faces and, in a nearby area, used detainees for target practice in a game of jailer paintball. Their intention was to extract information to help hunt down Iraq's most-wanted terrorist, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, according to Defense Department personnel who served with the unit or were briefed on its operations.

The Black Room was part of a temporary detention site at Camp Nama, the secret headquarters of a shadowy military unit known as Task Force 6-26. Located at Baghdad International Airport, the camp was the first stop for many insurgents on their way to the Abu Ghraib prison a few miles away.

Placards posted by soldiers at the detention area advised, "NO BLOOD, NO FOUL." The slogan, as one Defense Department official explained, reflected an adage adopted by Task Force 6-26: "If you don't make them bleed, they can't prosecute for it." According to Pentagon specialists who worked with the unit, prisoners at Camp Nama often disappeared into a detention black hole, barred from access to lawyers or relatives, and confined for weeks without charges. "The reality is, there were no rules there," another Pentagon official said.

The story of detainee abuse in Iraq is a familiar one. But the following account of Task Force 6-26, based on documents and interviews with more than a dozen people, offers the first detailed description of how the military's most highly trained counterterrorism unit committed serious abuses.

It adds to the picture of harsh interrogation practices at American military prisons in Afghanistan and Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, as well as at secret Central Intelligence Agency detention centers around the world.

The new account reveals the extent to which the unit members mistreated prisoners months before and after the photographs of abuse from Abu Ghraib were made public in April 2004, and it helps belie the original Pentagon assertions that abuse was confined to a small number of rogue reservists at Abu Ghraib.

The abuses at Camp Nama continued despite warnings beginning in August 2003 from an Army investigator and American intelligence and law enforcement officials in Iraq. The C.I.A. was concerned enough to bar its personnel from Camp Nama that August.

It is difficult to compare the conditions at the camp with those at Abu Ghraib because so little is known about the secret compound, which was off limits even to the Red Cross. The abuses appeared to have been unsanctioned, but some of them seemed to have been well known throughout the camp.

For an elite unit with roughly 1,000 people at any given time, Task Force 6-26 seems to have had a large number of troops punished for detainee abuse. Since 2003, 34 task force members have been disciplined in some form for mistreating prisoners, and at least 11 members have been removed from the unit, according to new figures the Special Operations Command provided in response to questions from The New York Times. Five Army Rangers in the unit were convicted three months ago for kicking and punching three detainees in September 2005.

Some of the serious accusations against Task Force 6-26 have been reported over the past 16 months by news organizations including NBC, The Washington Post and The Times. Many details emerged in hundreds of pages of documents released under a Freedom of Information Act request by the American Civil Liberties Union. But taken together for the first time, the declassified documents and interviews with more than a dozen military and civilian Defense Department and other federal personnel provide the most detailed portrait yet of the secret camp and the inner workings of the clandestine unit.

The documents and interviews also reflect a culture clash between the free-wheeling military commandos and the more cautious Pentagon civilians working with them that escalated to a tense confrontation. At one point, one of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's top aides, Stephen A. Cambone, ordered a subordinate to "get to the bottom" of any misconduct.

Most of the people interviewed for this article were midlevel civilian and military Defense Department personnel who worked with Task Force 6-26 and said they witnessed abuses, or who were briefed on its operations over the past three years.

Many were initially reluctant to discuss Task Force 6-26 because its missions are classified. But when pressed repeatedly by reporters who contacted them, they agreed to speak about their experiences and observations out of what they said was anger and disgust over the unit's treatment of detainees and the failure of task force commanders to punish misconduct more aggressively. The critics said the harsh interrogations yielded little information to help capture insurgents or save American lives.

Virtually all of those who agreed to speak are career government employees, many with previous military service, and they were granted anonymity to encourage them to speak candidly without fear of retribution from the Pentagon. Many of their complaints are supported by declassified military documents and e-mail messages from F.B.I. agents who worked regularly with the task force in Iraq.

A Demand for Intelligence

Military officials say there may have been extenuating circumstances for some of the harsh treatment at Camp Nama and its field stations in other parts of Iraq. By the spring of 2004, the demand on interrogators for intelligence was growing to help combat the increasingly numerous and deadly insurgent attacks.

Some detainees may have been injured resisting capture. A spokesman for the Special Operations Command, Kenneth S. McGraw, said there was sufficient evidence to prove misconduct in only 5 of 29 abuse allegations against task force members since 2003. As a result of those five incidents, 34 people were disciplined.

"We take all those allegations seriously," Gen. Bryan D. Brown, the commander of the Special Operations Command, said in a brief hallway exchange on Capitol Hill on March 8. "Any kind of abuse is not consistent with the values of the Special Operations Command."

The secrecy surrounding the highly classified unit has helped to shield its conduct from public scrutiny. The Pentagon will not disclose the unit's precise size, the names of its commanders, its operating bases or specific missions. Even the task force's name changes regularly to confuse adversaries, and the courts-martial and other disciplinary proceedings have not identified the soldiers in public announcements as task force members.

General Brown's command declined requests for interviews with several former task force members and with Lt. Gen. Stanley McChrystal, who leads the Joint Special Operations Command, the headquarters at Fort Bragg, N.C., that supplies the unit's most elite troops.

One Special Operations officer and a senior enlisted soldier identified by Defense Department personnel as former task force members at Camp Nama declined to comment when contacted by telephone. Attempts to contact three other Special Operations soldiers who were in the unit — by phone, through relatives and former neighbors — were also unsuccessful.

Cases of detainee abuse attributed to Task Force 6-26 demonstrate both confusion over and, in some cases, disregard for approved interrogation practices and standards for detainee treatment, according to Defense Department specialists who have worked with the unit.

In early 2004, an 18-year-old man suspected of selling cars to members of the Zarqawi terrorist network was seized with his entire family at their home in Baghdad. Task force soldiers beat him repeatedly with a rifle butt and punched him in the head and kidneys, said a Defense Department specialist briefed on the incident.

Some complaints were ignored or played down in a unit where a conspiracy of silence contributed to the overall secretiveness. "It's under control," one unit commander told a Defense Department official who complained about mistreatment at Camp Nama in the spring of 2004.

For hundreds of suspected insurgents, Camp Nama was a way station on a journey that started with their capture on the battlefield or in their homes, and ended often in a cell at Abu Ghraib. Hidden in plain sight just off a dusty road fronting Baghdad International Airport, Camp Nama was an unmarked, virtually unknown compound at the edge of the taxiways.

The heart of the camp was the Battlefield Interrogation Facility, alternately known as the Temporary Detention Facility and the Temporary Holding Facility. The interrogation and detention areas occupied a corner of the larger compound, separated by a fence topped with razor wire.

Unmarked helicopters flew detainees into the camp almost daily, former task force members said. Dressed in blue jumpsuits with taped goggles covering their eyes, the shackled prisoners were led into a screening room where they were registered and examined by medics.

Just beyond the screening rooms, where Saddam Hussein was given a medical exam after his capture, detainees were kept in as many as 85 cells spread over two buildings. Some detainees were kept in what was known as Motel 6, a group of crudely built plywood shacks that reeked of urine and excrement. The shacks were cramped, forcing many prisoners to squat or crouch. Other detainees were housed inside a separate building in 6-by-8-foot cubicles in a cellblock called Hotel California.

The interrogation rooms were stark. High-value detainees were questioned in the Black Room, nearly bare but for several 18-inch hooks that jutted from the ceiling, a grisly reminder of the terrors inflicted by Mr. Hussein's inquisitors. Jailers often blared rap music or rock 'n' roll at deafening decibels over a loudspeaker to unnerve their subjects.

Another smaller room offered basic comforts like carpets and cushioned seating to put more cooperative prisoners at ease, said several Defense Department specialists who worked at Camp Nama. Detainees wore heavy, olive-drab hoods outside their cells. By June 2004, the revelations of abuse at Abu Ghraib galvanized the military to promise better treatment for prisoners. In one small concession at Camp Nama, soldiers exchanged the hoods for cloth blindfolds with drop veils that allowed detainees to breathe more freely but prevented them from peeking out.

Some former task force members said the Nama in the camp's name stood for a coarse phrase that soldiers used to describe the compound. One Defense Department specialist recalled seeing pink blotches on detainees' clothing as well as red welts on their bodies, marks he learned later were inflicted by soldiers who used detainees as targets and called themselves the High Five Paintball Club.

Mr. McGraw, the military spokesman, said he had not heard of the Black Room or the paintball club and had not seen any mention of them in the documents he had reviewed.

In a nearby operations center, task force analysts pored over intelligence collected from spies, detainees and remotely piloted Predator surveillance aircraft, to piece together clues to aid soldiers on their raids. Twice daily at noon and midnight military interrogators and their supervisors met with officials from the C.I.A., F.B.I. and allied military units to review operations and new intelligence.

Task Force 6-26 was a creation of the Pentagon's post-Sept. 11 campaign against terrorism, and it quickly became the model for how the military would gain intelligence and battle insurgents in the future. Originally known as Task Force 121, it was formed in the summer of 2003, when the military merged two existing Special Operations units, one hunting Osama bin Laden in and around Afghanistan, and the other tracking Mr. Hussein in Iraq. (Its current name is Task Force 145.)

The task force was a melting pot of military and civilian units. It drew on elite troops from the Joint Special Operations Command, whose elements include the Army unit Delta Force, Navy's Seal Team 6 and the 75th Ranger Regiment. Military reservists and Defense Intelligence Agency personnel with special skills, like interrogators, were temporarily assigned to the unit. C.I.A. officers, F.B.I. agents and special operations forces from other countries also worked closely with the task force.

Many of the American Special Operations soldiers wore civilian clothes and were allowed to grow beards and long hair, setting them apart from their uniformed colleagues. Unlike conventional soldiers and marines whose Iraq tours lasted 7 to 12 months, unit members and their commanders typically rotated every 90 days.

Task Force 6-26 had a singular focus: capture or kill Mr. Zarqawi, the Jordanian militant operating in Iraq. "Anytime there was even the smell of Zarqawi nearby, they would go out and use any means possible to get information from a detainee," one official said.

Defense Department personnel briefed on the unit's operations said the harsh treatment extended beyond Camp Nama to small field outposts in Baghdad, Falluja, Balad, Ramadi and Kirkuk. These stations were often nestled within the alleys of a city in nondescript buildings with suburban-size yards where helicopters could land to drop off or pick up detainees.

At the outposts, some detainees were stripped naked and had cold water thrown on them to cause the sensation of drowning, said Defense Department personnel who served with the unit.

In January 2004, the task force captured the son of one of Mr. Hussein's bodyguards in Tikrit. The man told Army investigators that he was forced to strip and that he was punched in the spine until he fainted, put in front of an air-conditioner while cold water was poured on him and kicked in the stomach until he vomited. Army investigators were forced to close their inquiry in June 2005 after they said task force members used battlefield pseudonyms that made it impossible to identify and locate the soldiers involved. The unit also asserted that 70 percent of its computer files had been lost.

Despite the task force's access to a wide range of intelligence, its raids were often dry holes, yielding little if any intelligence and alienating ordinary Iraqis, Defense Department personnel said. Prisoners deemed no threat to American troops were often driven deep into the Iraqi desert at night and released, sometimes given $100 or more in American money for their trouble.

Back at Camp Nama, the task force leaders established a ritual for departing personnel who did a good job, Pentagon officials said. The commanders presented them with two unusual mementos: a detainee hood and a souvenir piece of tile from the medical screening room that once held Mr. Hussein.

Early Signs of Trouble

Accusations of abuse by Task Force 6-26 came as no surprise to many other officials in Iraq. By early 2004, both the C.I.A. and the F.B.I. had expressed alarm about the military's harsh interrogation techniques.

The C.I.A.'s Baghdad station sent a cable to headquarters on Aug. 3, 2003, raising concern that Special Operations troops who served with agency officers had used techniques that had become too aggressive. Five days later, the C.I.A. issued a classified directive that prohibited its officers from participating in harsh interrogations. Separately, the C.I.A. barred its officers from working at Camp Nama but allowed them to keep providing target information and other intelligence to the task force.

The warnings still echoed nearly a year later. On June 25, 2004, nearly two months after the disclosure of the abuses at Abu Ghraib, an F.B.I. agent in Iraq sent an e-mail message to his superiors in Washington, warning that a detainee captured by Task Force 6-26 had suspicious burn marks on his body. The detainee said he had been tortured. A month earlier, another F.B.I. agent asked top bureau officials for guidance on how to deal with military interrogators across Iraq who used techniques like loud music and yelling that exceeded "the bounds of standard F.B.I. practice."

American generals were also alerted to the problem. In December 2003, Col. Stuart A. Herrington, a retired Army intelligence officer, warned in a confidential memo that medical personnel reported that prisoners seized by the unit, then known as Task Force 121, had injuries consistent with beatings. "It seems clear that TF 121 needs to be reined in with respect to its treatment of detainees," Colonel Herrington concluded.

By May 2004, just as the scandal at Abu Ghraib was breaking, tensions increased at Camp Nama between the Special Operations troops and civilian interrogators and case officers from the D.I.A.'s Defense Human Intelligence Service, who were there to support the unit in its fight against the Zarqawi network. The discord, according to documents, centered on the harsh treatment of detainees as well as restrictions the Special Operations troops placed on their civilian colleagues, like monitoring their e-mail messages and phone calls.

Maj. Gen. George E. Ennis, who until recently commanded the D.I.A.'s human intelligence division, declined to be interviewed for this article. But in written responses to questions, General Ennis said he never heard about the numerous complaints made by D.I.A. personnel until he and his boss, Vice Adm. Lowell E. Jacoby, then the agency's director, were briefed on June 24, 2004.

The next day, Admiral Jacoby wrote a two-page memo to Mr. Cambone, under secretary of defense for intelligence. In it, he described a series of complaints, including a May 2004 incident in which a D.I.A. interrogator said he witnessed task force soldiers punch a detainee hard enough to require medical help. The D.I.A. officer took photos of the injuries, but a supervisor confiscated them, the memo said.

The tensions laid bare a clash of military cultures. Combat-hardened commandos seeking a steady flow of intelligence to pinpoint insurgents grew exasperated with civilian interrogators sent from Washington, many of whom were novices at interrogating hostile prisoners fresh off the battlefield.

"These guys wanted results, and our debriefers were used to a civil environment," said one Defense Department official who was briefed on the task force operations.

Within days after Admiral Jacoby sent his memo, the D.I.A. took the extraordinary step of temporarily withdrawing its personnel from Camp Nama.

Admiral Jacoby's memo also provoked an angry reaction from Mr. Cambone. "Get to the bottom of this immediately. This is not acceptable," Mr. Cambone said in a handwritten note on June 26, 2004, to his top deputy, Lt. Gen. William G. Boykin. "In particular, I want to know if this is part of a pattern of behavior by TF 6-26."

General Boykin said through a spokesman on March 17 that at the time he told Mr. Cambone he had found no pattern of misconduct with the task force.

A Shroud of Secrecy

Military and legal experts say the full breadth of abuses committed by Task Force 6-26 may never be known because of the secrecy surrounding the unit, and the likelihood that some allegations went unreported.

In the summer of 2004, Camp Nama closed and the unit moved to a new headquarters in Balad, 45 miles north of Baghdad. The unit's operations are now shrouded in even tighter secrecy.

Soon after their rank-and-file clashed in 2004, D.I.A. officials in Washington and military commanders at Fort Bragg agreed to improve how the task force integrated specialists into its ranks. The D.I.A. is now sending small teams of interrogators, debriefers and case officers, called "deployable Humint teams," to work with Special Operations forces in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Senior military commanders insist that the elite warriors, who will be relied on more than ever in the campaign against terrorism, are now treating detainees more humanely and can police themselves. The C.I.A. has resumed conducting debriefings with the task force, but does not permit harsh questioning, a C.I.A. official said.

General McChrystal, the leader of the Joint Special Operations Command, received his third star in a promotion ceremony at Fort Bragg on March 13.

DOJ_NMG_0019049

On Dec. 8, 2004, the Pentagon's spokesman, Lawrence Di Rita, said that four Special Operations soldiers from the task force were punished for "excessive use of force" and administering electric shocks to detainees with stun guns. Two of the soldiers were removed from the unit. To that point, Mr. Di Rita said, 10 task force members had been disciplined. Since then, according to the new figures provided to The Times, the number of those disciplined for detainee abuse has more than tripled. Nine of the 34 troops disciplined received written or oral counseling. Others were reprimanded for slapping detainees and other offenses.

The five Army Rangers who were court-martialed in December received punishments including jail time of 30 days to six months and reduction in rank. Two of them will receive bad-conduct discharges upon completion of their sentences.

Human rights advocates and leading members of Congress say the Pentagon must still do more to hold senior-level commanders and civilian officials accountable for the misconduct.

The Justice Department inspector general is investigating complaints of detainee abuse by Task Force 6-26, a senior law enforcement official said. The only wide-ranging military inquiry into prisoner abuse by Special Operations forces was completed nearly a year ago by Brig. Gen. Richard P. Formica, and was sent to Congress.

But the United States Central Command has refused repeated requests from The Times over the past several months to provide an unclassified copy of General Formica's findings despite Mr. Rumsfeld's instructions that such a version of all 12 major reports into detainee abuse be made public.

Iraq Leaves Vet In Personal Fog Of War (WP)

By Russ Bynum

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

RICHMOND HILL, Ga. -- His 3-year-old son Nicholas' first steps, the first time Liam, his newborn, smiled _ Staff Sgt. Douglas Piper lived to see them. Then his scarred memory erased even those precious moments.

"I can't remember what they did yesterday," Piper says. "Sometimes, I can't remember what I did yesterday. The days are broken."

Iraq left the 30-year-old Piper in his own personal fog of war, one in which remembering the moments and days since April 2003 can be as confusing a puzzle as predicting his civilian future.

Three years ago, in the war's first month, Piper became one of the now more than 17,000 U.S. troops wounded in action. A grenade blast in Baghdad mangled his right eye, collapsed his right eardrum and slammed his brain against the inside of his skull.

In a conflict where explosions account for roughly two-thirds of Army combat wounds, and improved body armor and field medicine increase chances of survival, brain injuries such as Piper's are common.

At home in southeast Georgia, he drives his pickup truck, and even took a recent ski trip, despite having no depth perception after losing his eye. In public, he pops his prosthetic eye in and out of its socket without self-consciousness. He hears fine with the help of a hearing aid.

Yet his doctors tell him at least 80 percent of his short-term memory has been destroyed.

Watching "CSI" or "Law and Order" on TV with his wife, Sherry, he often has trouble following the plot. He has problems recalling the birthdates of their three boys _ Matthew, 4, Nicholas, 3, and 13-week-old Liam. He knows the route to his desk job at Hunter Army Airfield in nearby Savannah, but needs help keeping track of appointments.

Sometimes he'll walk into a room and forget what he's doing there. Other times, he'll stop talking in mid-sentence and grasp for the word.

"I'll try to point at something like, `What is that?' he says. "The names of things, the words, sometimes they're just gone."

Routine and his wife's guidance help compensate. He keeps his keys, wallet, cell phone, medications and spare prosthetic eyes in a basket on the kitchen counter so he won't lose them. Sherry Piper enters his doctor visits and other appointments into her Palm Pilot.

Still, Piper puts his injuries in perspective. Among the other wounded soldiers he met at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, there was always someone whose injuries seemed worse _ a Bradley armored-vehicle driver blinded in both eyes by a rocket-propelled grenade, a sniper who had been shot through the eye with a bullet that passed through his brain.

"I'd just think to myself, it could have been worse," Piper said, "so don't even think about complaining."

Walter Reed, home to one of eight brain injury facilities run jointly by the departments of Defense and Veterans Affairs, has treated more than 600 troops with traumatic brain injuries from Iraq and Afghanistan since 2003.

Brain injuries were diagnosed in 28 percent of wounded service members sent to Walter Reed from January 2003 to November 2005. Common effects include headaches, sleep disorders, trouble concentrating and memory loss.

DOJ_NMG_0019050

After six surgeries between April 2003 and August 2005, Piper expects to be cleared for a medical discharge by the Army in the next two months.

"A part of him, I think, does yearn to stay in the military," said Kim Mayes, his medical case manager at Hunter. "He'll walk in, if he saw something on the news, and say, `Man, I wish I could go back over there.'"

Piper signed with an Army recruiter at 17, entering the service a year later in October 1994. As a teenager in Bridgewater, N.H., he saw the Army as a chance to escape the doldrums of a small town where most young men went to work manufacturing rubber gaskets at a local factory.

He passed the rigorous training required to join the elite Army Ranger regiment, and served eight years in its Hunter-based battalion. He planned on a full 20-year military career.

Then came the war _ the last thing he remembers with clarity.

He wanted to deploy to Iraq so badly that he left the Rangers because, having just joined a new company, he expected to be sidelined. As war loomed in early 2003, he transferred to the Pathfinder Company of the 6th Battalion, 101st Aviation Regiment at Fort Campbell, Ky. Eight days after he arrived, Piper left for Kuwait.

On April 13, 2003, less than month after U.S. troops crossed the Iraqi border, Piper was leading his six-man team in a hunt for weapons and munitions in southern Baghdad.

The sun was setting outside a library building where the soldiers had discovered a stockpile of small arms and mortar rounds. Piper stood outside, deciding which building to clear next.

A car passed on the street. Someone leaned out the window and lobbed a grenade, announcing an ambush with an explosion a few feet from Piper's back. The blast flung him five feet, sprawled facedown behind a Humvee.

"I didn't feel any pain or anything like that, but I saw this huge halo of blood in front of me," Piper recalled.

He reached to feel his right eye, but his hand slid straight to his ear. It felt like the side of his face had been flattened, the bones of his eye socket pulverized.

Amid the fighting, two soldiers grabbed Piper to rush him to a medivac helicopter. He insisted on giving them his ammunition and grenades first. En route to the nearest field hospital, he blacked out.

Landstuhl Regional Medical Center, an Army hospital in Germany, was Piper's first stop out of Iraq. On his third day there, he insisted doctors wheel him to a bathroom mirror so he could see his face.

"When they told me the extent of the injury, I was thinking to myself, `I'm going to have a big hole in my head,'" Piper said. "My main concern was with the boys. What would they think?"

Beneath the bandages, his skin was scabbed and bruised and his right eye had turned completely black. But his face was intact. The crushed bones of his eye socket could be repaired.

On April 21, 2003, doctors at Walter Reed removed Piper's eye and reconstructed shattered bones scattered in tiny fragments from his brow into his nasal cavity. Five months later, he was fitted for a prosthetic eye, hand-painted to match the hazel hue of his remaining eye.

Piper focused on getting used to navigating with one eye. He was often bumping into walls and objects on his right side. Once, he tripped over a bush during a stroll outside the Army hospital.

"He never once said, `Oh, great, now I'm never going to be able to do this,'" Sherry Piper said. "The day he got back from Walter Reed, we came to the airport and got in the car. I was going to drive and he said, `No, I'm going to drive.'"

The Pipers say it was several months before they started to notice symptoms of his memory loss. At first, Sherry Piper attributed it to her husband's hearing loss.

"I would just be talking to him and he wasn't paying attention. I'd say, `Did you hear what I just said?' and he'd say, `No,'" she recalled. "That's how we kind of realized he was having a problem remembering."

Neurologists confirmed Piper had frontal-lobe damage to his brain, affecting his short-term memory. Periodic testing over the past year has shown little improvement, said Mayes, his medical case manager.

Piper carried a notebook for a while, jotting lists of errands and appointments, but kept losing it. For now, he relies on his wife to keep his schedule, and phones her when he feels he's forgotten something.

Grappling with short-term memory loss hasn't stopped Piper from looking to the long-term. Several months ago, he began working in his off-duty hours as an onsite supervisor for a construction company.

He isn't sure whether he'll stick with construction, but it seemed a logical first step. He's a woodworking hobbyist, and has made bookshelves, a cedar chest and end tables for his home. He likes working outdoors, especially as a break from Army desk work.

"I've been a trigger-puller for 11 years," Piper said. "I had to figure out what I was interested in other than blowing things up."

DOJ_NMG_0019051

He treats his injuries with similar humor _ deadpan matter-of-factness mixed with shock-and-awe. And the family is getting in on the act.

During a recent trip to the mall, 4-year-old Matthew asked if Piper could show his false eye to another boy who refused to believe his father had one.

"So I pop it out and clean it off and hand it to him, and he walks over there and opens his hand and goes, `See!,'" Piper said, laughing. "That boy about freaked out."

Poppy Crop Threatens Nascent Democracy (SLPD)

By Philip Dine

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 18, 2006

For now, the cabbage-green rows of small poppies in the furrowed squares of land resemble any variety of legitimate crops. In a few months, these plants will stand out as a tall sea of crimson.

Viewed from the window of a low-flying helicopter, new poppy fields come into view every few seconds, spread around a desolate landscape virtually unchanged for centuries in this remote part of Afghanistan. The houses are small, isolated and fashioned from mud, some with mud walls around them. There is no sign of mosques or schools, hospitals or stores.

This is the epicenter of poppy cultivation in Afghanistan. The nation's crop provides 87 percent of the world's opium, from which heroin is produced, according to the United Nations. Early indications are that Helmand, a province deep in southern Afghanistan bordering Pakistan, will produce half the world's supply of opium this year.

The poppies are invaluable cash crops to farmers seeking to sustain their families, but dangerous to a young Afghan democracy. An unholy alliance is emerging among farmers, drug lords, Taliban remnants and al-Qaida fighters. Intelligence sources and Afghan officials cite mounting evidence that insurgents are using drugs to wreak havoc on Afghan society - including the corrupting of public officials - while also extracting funds from drug profits for their anti-government violence.

The resulting tension was in evidence on a recent tour of the area by two U.S. gunships. The helicopters landed in a poppy field to give State Department officials and a reporter a chance to look around - for two minutes - encircled by guards with automatic weapons. The guards worry about violence, either from farmers who think their crop is threatened, or from insurgents protecting the poppy fields.

"You can get on the ground, but that's when you're the most vulnerable," warned Ed Morris, lead pilot in the U.S. military detachment providing protective cover for joint Afghanistan-American drug-eradication efforts in this area.

Drugs are already the nation's sole export of any magnitude, and threaten to turn it into a "narco-state," a country whose policies and politics are dominated by drug lords.

"The concern is that this government will fail and fall and the country will be a breeding ground for terrorists again," says Doug Wankel, director of the Counter Narcotics Task Force at the U.S. Embassy in Afghanistan. Former chief of operations for the Drug Enforcement Administration, he is a native of Bowling Green, Mo.

Poisoning "infidels"

There is also a little-noted bonus for al-Qaida in the burgeoning heroin production. Afghan sources say the terrorist group has acknowledged in private sessions its satisfaction that expanding heroin use is poisoning "infidels" in other countries. One example is a skyrocketing rate of AIDS, sparked by dirty needles, in Russia and former Soviet republics.

Kahir Ismailee of Kabul has worked for years with international groups on health, education and human rights issues in rural areas where anti-Western sentiment is strong.

He says that in the terrorists' "jihad against all Westerners, one of their tactics to ruin a society was to make them addicts, so they export heroin to the Western countries."

Ismailee says an influential Taliban cleric told him: "Drugs are illegal in Islam, but we want infidels to die."

Mohammad Nabi Hussaini directs the poppy eradication program in the Afghan Ministry of Counter Narcotics. It's dangerous work; when traveling around the country, he wears a turban to disguise himself.

"They say this, if you go to their gatherings, their religious gatherings: 'Western countries, they are sending us alcohol, they are sending us rockets - this is our rocket, poppy. This is how we can fight them,' " Hussaini says. "But they are also fighting their own people, because it brings the moral degradation of our society. It is against Islam."

And, he noted, more Afghans are becoming addicted to heroin or opium.

"It's not true that it's not our problem. It's becoming our problem," he says. "The rate of addiction will increase, I think, very badly. I believe it is something that is destroying our nation. My village has 120 families. When I was a kid, there was only one person who was taking raw opium, who was an addict. Right now in my village there are more than 12 very hard addicts."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has put it bluntly: "If we don't destroy the poppy, it will destroy us."

DOJ_NMG_0019052

The last two years have been the biggest in history for opium production in Afghanistan, each topping 4,000 tons of opium, and this year looms as a third banner year. Hoping to avert another flooding of the heroin market, Afghan forces and their allies, particularly the United States, are responding strongly - if belatedly - to the threat.

Eradication is one element in a multipronged response to the mounting drug problem, an effort that also includes a range of educational, economic and legal approaches. The point man for the U.S. State Department is St. Louis native Tom Schweich, a top official for international narcotics and law enforcement who seeks to coordinate actions among Americans, Afghans and their international partners.

"The reason we went into Afghanistan was to eliminate the people who were responsible for 9/11," Schweich says. "There's now a nascent democracy here. The threats that are posed to this democracy are narcotics and terrorism. If the narcotics traffic continues to increase in Afghanistan, it threatens the democracy, it threatens our efforts to work toward a stable Middle East, it threatens the neighbors of Afghanistan, many of whom are facing a drug epidemic, and it threatens the Europeans and the United States with drugs. It really does have implications across the entire world."

The Taliban and the poppy

In some ways, the proliferation of poppy is an unintended consequence of the U.S. overthrow of the Taliban in 2001.

In earlier years, the Taliban had been content to allow the production of opium, even urging farmers to continue in defiance of the desire of the West that poppy cultivation cease - and often profiting from drug trafficking.

"The Taliban told people this was a fight against Muslims, that you should grow poppy. Even if you have no land, you should use your roof," says Asadullah Khalid, governor of Kandahar province.

But the Taliban abruptly switched gears at the start of this decade, as it faced growing international pressure to moderate its rule. Hoping to win diplomatic recognition from the West, the Taliban knew it had to make some concessions, and yielding on narcotics was the most palatable choice, Ismailee says.

In its last years in power, the Taliban clamped down on the drug trade in an effective but brutal way.

"There were executions without any transparent trials, hands were cut off, legs were severed," Ismailee says. By 2001, the extremist government had reduced the opium production to virtually nothing.

The U.S.-led removal of the Taliban removed the fear ordinary Afghans felt, spurring many to get back into poppy farming.

In addition, American and Afghan policies initially contributed to the growth of the narcotics problem. U.S. forces enlisted the support of warlords in the fight against the Taliban, turning a blind eye to their drug trafficking. After he assumed office, Karzai - hoping to solidify his hold on the country - brought some compromised provincial figures into his government.

Now, insurgents trying to weaken the U.S.-backed government find it advantageous to forge alliances with drug traffickers and encourage farmers to grow poppy - telling them "whenever the government tries to eradicate, the Taliban will be there to protect you," Ismailee says.

Insurgents also have issued warnings that those who stop growing poppy will be seen as "siding" with the government. It is no coincidence, officials say, that the areas where anti-government rebels are strongest are the same places where poppy production is at its highest.

Corruption, poverty, porous borders

Other factors have helped worsen the drug problem in Afghanistan.

Corruption, bribery and the quick release from jail of suspected drug traffickers.

Widespread poverty, which forces farmers to seek any possible means to support their families. Other crops pay a fraction of what poppies yield. And many traditional Afghanistan crops, such as fruits and nuts, were uprooted when Soviet troops destroyed trees to prevent guerrillas from hiding.

The return of Afghan refugees who had fled to Pakistan to escape Taliban rule. Some went into poppy farming on their own; others were compelled by landowners who made it a condition of their getting a parcel of land as tenant farmers.

Abysmal roads. Farmers often can't get legitimate crops to market, whereas poppy is so valuable that traffickers will come to the farmers.

The trend toward the processing of opium into heroin in Afghanistan, turning Afghans from opium exporters into heroin producers. Afghans have seen the profits to be made and, in recent years, provided necessary precursor chemicals by foreigners, began setting up their own labs to make the end product.

Porous borders that let drugs move freely into Iran, Pakistan or former Soviet republics to the north, often eventually going to Europe - which gets 90 percent of its heroin from Afghanistan.

The hardiness of the crop. Poppies require little care and little water, critical in a country suffering from massive environmental degradation and long arid periods and whose mountainside irrigation systems were largely destroyed over decades of armed conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0019053

"The narcotics problem in our province is very, very complicated," said Engineer Daud, governor of Helmand, as he stood at an airfield flanked by Afghan and U.S. troops.

"Our land is productive land for narcotics, and we have more than 100 miles of border with Pakistan, with deserts and mountains," he says. "Because of the low capacity of our national police, it is difficult to control that part of the problem. Drug dealers and terrorists are carrying drugs across the border, and terrorists are getting money from narcotics."

"Both forces are mobilizing"

In the northern part of his province, people are so desperate for water that farmers trying to make a legitimate living on their tiny plots, with virtually no money for their own families, are forced to buy water to keep their chickens alive.

Daud understands why they "have the reason to cultivate cash crop like poppy," and he prefers to go after the larger and wealthy drug dealers rather than the simple growers, but the traffickers are more evasive, more powerful - and more threatening.

In many ways, Afghan officials and their international allies, preoccupied with overthrowing the Taliban and then keeping it and al-Qaida at bay, were caught off guard by the insidious drug trade and didn't get serious until relatively recently.

"The problem was . . . unique, because of its scope and because there are so many moving parts," said Craig Chretien, formerly a senior official at the Drug Enforcement Administration, where he spent 26 years in several South American countries. He is now deputy director of the counternarcotics task force at the American Embassy in Afghanistan, which is helping the Afghans tackle the problem.

"It's challenging, but is it impossible? No," Chretien says.

After a rather tepid Afghan response last year, and some faltering steps by the United States, both countries are launching a broader, better coordinated and more aggressive campaign.

The next few months will begin to signal how successful the effort is likely to be.

"We've got an increased ability to fight the drugs, and they've got an increased ability to grow the drug," Schweich says. "So both forces are mobilizing."

Editorial: Wanted: One Federal Attorney For Tri-Cities (TRICITYH)

Columbia (WA) Tri-City Herald, March 19, 2006

It is time for the U.S. Justice Department to start bearing its share of the load in the Tri-Cities.

And we don't mean by asking local prosecutors to do even more of the federal government's job than they already do.

We have had a federal judge in the Tri-Cities for the past six years, but no federal prosecutors.

It was four years ago that U.S. Attorney James McDevitt, in Spokane, promised to look into the question of assigning some federal prosecutors here instead of keeping them all based in Spokane or Yakima.

Local law enforcement and prosecutors have said for years many cases that should be tried in federal court instead are pushed down to local courts.

The result: Overload on local courts and prosecutors, more costs for local taxpayers and a cheap way out for the feds.

One program allows local prosecutors to be named special deputy U.S. attorneys so they can prosecute some cases.

That answer is too little and way, way late.

Ten local police and prosecutors have written to McDevitt to try to get something going on this besides talk.

McDevitt says Congress would have to authorize the money for the assignments.

That's even though McDevitt added several attorneys to his Spokane staff recently under the Justice Department's focus on anti-terrorism. Three of the major potential targets for terrorism are near the Tri-Cities -- Hanford, the Umatilla Chemical Depot and the dams.

Consensus on getting a federal prosecutor assigned to the Tri-Cities is persuasive. Unanimity should make it a certainty.

"We've got a federal courthouse, we've got a federal judge and we've got the criminal activity," said Kennewick Police Chief Ken Hohenberg, speaking for himself and nine other chiefs, sheriffs and prosecutors in the Tri-Cities. "We need a federal prosecutor."

In a letter to McDevitt, the 10 officials pointed out that 174 Yakima-based cases were filed in federal court in 2004, compared with only 26 Benton and Franklin County cases.

It's not that fewer federal offenses are committed in the Tri-Cities -- far from it.

Inertia is the problem. Federal attorneys prosecute crimes that occur down the street, not down the valley.

It's time for the federal government to get moving on this issue.

We do not doubt McDevitt's sincerity nor do we accuse him of being the problem.

Nor is it right to fault Congress for not authorizing money to have a prosecutor and other accouterments and officers of the federal government stationed here.

But between the two lies the only solution to a judicial and cost inequity.

McDevitt should press the case for a prosecutor in the Tri-Cities, and Congress should give him the money to make it happen.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

For Defense Attorneys, It's All About The 'cross' (HC)

By TOM FOWLER

Houston Chronicle, March 19, 2006

If you stop by the Enron trial in downtown Houston expecting to witness a Perry Mason moment, don't hold your breath.

Those instances of "gotcha," — when an attorney catches an opposing witness in a lie or draws out a weeping confession during cross-examination — aren't as common as TV legal dramas might have you believe.

In reality, cross-examination is often a dry, protracted process by which attorneys try to undermine a witness or dig for nuggets of information that support their case. It's not at all unusual for "cross," as attorneys call it, to seem random and meandering to a casual observer.

Lawyers watching the current trial said so far the cross-examination by the defense teams for Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling has had a little bit of everything: entertainment and tedium, humor and anger, precision and confusion.

The defense will get its chance to put its best arguments before the jury when the government rests its case, but any points it can score with jurors now on cross are crucial.

"Whoever goes first in making their case gets to shape the initial impression a jury gets," said David Berg, a Houston trial lawyer. "That's why you can't wait. You have to begin your case during cross."

Jurors' decision

Cross-examination is the process by which attorneys get to question a witness the opposing side puts on the stand. It's the opportunity to knock down an opponent's case as it is built.

Some studies have shown that jury verdicts in criminal cases often match the conclusions reached by the time the prosecution finishes its case. That's why defense attorneys often spend just as much time preparing an effective cross as they do preparing to put on their own arguments.

Houston attorney Dick DeGuerin said he likes to use leading questions to tell a story with cross, even though it's his opponent who is trying to tell his story.

"I think the jury is there to be entertained, in part, and to listen to something they can make sense of," DeGuerin said.

There generally are limits to what can be discussed on cross, but they differ depending on the judge overseeing the case, Berg said.

In the Enron case, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake requires attorneys to ask questions on cross that relate only to what was asked under direct questioning. That means the government largely has been able to set the agenda.

Cross may seem unfocused, with attorneys belaboring minutiae for reasons that aren't entirely clear. But Dan Hedges, a former prosecutor now in private practice in Houston, said that's not unusual in criminal cases, and actually may be necessary.

Unlike civil trials, in which attorneys usually have interviewed witnesses at great length before trial in depositions, attorneys in criminal cases face more unknowns, Hedges said.

"There's the danger of asking a question and getting a bad answer, but there's also the danger of not asking and missing out on very important information that could help your case," Hedges said.

Presenting own case

Cross has been used with varying degrees of effectiveness in the Enron trial, observers said.

In the first weeks of the trial, the defense teams were able to use it to essentially begin introducing an important part of their own case: that Enron was not the crooked and crippled enterprise the government described.

The government wanted to play excerpts of videotaped analyst and employee meetings at which Lay and Skilling allegedly made false statements, but the defense successfully argued the tapes should be played in their entirety during cross. Though it made for many boring hours in the courtroom, it allowed the defendants to show jurors what they argued was a more complete picture of a vibrant and healthy Enron.

DOJ_NMG_0019055

The defense hasn't maintained that strategy of using the government's witnesses to illustrate the good points of Enron as much as it could have, however, said Joel Androphy, an attorney who has followed the trial closely. Rather, much of the cross has focused on attacks against the witnesses.

"They had a great opportunity to ask (former Chief Financial Officer Andrew) Fastow and others about Enron viability issues, about good things at the company, but I don't feel like I heard that very much," Androphy said. "I just heard and saw attack after attack. At this point, all the jurors must know about the company is that a lot of people were lying."

The attacks during cross serve a purpose, however, in that they can discredit witnesses by getting them to waver on statements made during direct questioning. That was certainly the intent in the harsh questioning of Fastow.

Fastow was grilled with blunt, argumentative and sometimes loud questions, such as, "Did you have any conscience?" He was walked back and forth through his confessed crimes. And his recollections were poked and prodded repeatedly.

The confrontational questions appeared to grab the attention of jurors early on, but later many seemed to tune out. To some observers, the shouting seemed like overdone theatrics, but Androphy said the attorneys were more sincere than they appeared.

He notes that defense attorneys such as Mike Ramsey and Daniel Petrocelli become genuinely passionate about their clients' defense, so the emotions are close to the surface during cross.

"I do that all the time, and it's not just something I'm making up," Androphy said.

The anger and outrage against Fastow was clearly designed to draw out Fastow's own anger, said Michael Wynne, a former prosecutor who has followed the trial closely. Although jurors likely have little doubt that Fastow lied regularly, the cross didn't get him to lose his composure.

"I think it was overplayed, and the defense spent too much time on it," Wynne said.

Observers said Lay attorney Chip Lewis worked a good vein of questions on his cross of former Enron executive Sherron Watkins, namely the legality of stock sales she made soon after writing her famous memo to Lay. But some noted he failed to control Watkins on the stand, letting her rattle off lengthy answers.

Skilling attorney Ron Woods did a better job of keeping Watkins in check by quickly and firmly cutting short her responses. He also kept short and direct his questions about how guilty verdicts would be beneficial for Watkins' public speaking business, observers said.

At least twice, the Skilling defense team has broken a cardinal rule of cross by asking a question apparently without knowing the answer.

It challenged the accounting knowledge of witnesses, only to stumble upon what appeared to be the revelation that the witnesses had accounting degrees.

In one instance, however, Petrocelli used that to initiate a brief discussion of accounting rules. It's a topic the government avoided during direct questioning for fear of confusing jurors. But Petrocelli may have shown that the rules are not nearly as cut-and-dried as the government would like jurors to believe.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial May Be Embarrassment For Bush (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, March 19, 2006

Lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's former top aide are signaling they may delve deeply at his criminal trial into infighting among the White House, the CIA and the State Department over pre-Iraq war intelligence failures.

In a prelude to a possible defense, the lawyers for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby also are suggesting that the State Department — not Libby — may be to blame for leaking the identity of covert CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media.

Court papers filed late Friday raise the possibility a trial could become politically embarrassing for the Bush administration by focusing on the debate about whether the White House manipulated intelligence to justify the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

The defense team stated that in June and July 2003, Plame's CIA status was at most a peripheral issue to "the finger-pointing that went on within the executive branch about who was to blame" for the failure to find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

"If the jury learns this background information" about finger-pointing "and also understands Mr. Libby's additional focus on urgent national security matters, the jury will more easily appreciate how Mr. Libby may have forgotten or misremembered ... snippets of conversation" about Plame's CIA status, the lawyers said.

Cheney's former chief of staff was indicted Oct. 28 on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about how he learned of Plame's CIA employment and what he told reporters about her.

Libby's lawyers are asking U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton for access to government documents about a 2002 trip that Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, made to the African nation of Niger at the CIA's behest and about "his wife's involvement" with that mission.

The documents relate to what prospective witnesses — including then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage and deputy White House chief of staff Karl Rove — probably would say at Libby's trial.

Noting press reports last week, the court papers say there has been speculation that Armitage told The Washington Post's Bob Woodward that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA, and speculation that Woodward's source and the primary source for conservative columnist Robert Novak are the same person.

Novak disclosed Plame's identity on July 14, 2003, eight days after Wilson contended in a New York Times op-ed column that the administration twisted prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat from a nuclear weapons program.

"If the facts ultimately show that Mr. Armitage or someone else from the State Department was also Mr. Novak's primary source, then the State Department and certainly not Mr. Libby bears responsibility for the 'leak' that led to the public disclosure" of Plame's CIA identity, Libby's lawyers said.

The court filing also focused on Marc Grossman, a former undersecretary of state for political affairs who allegedly told Libby a month before Plame's identity was disclosed that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

"If Mr. Armitage or another State Department official was in fact the primary source for Mr. Novak's article, Mr. Grossman's testimony may be colored by either his personal relationship with Mr. Armitage or his concern for the institutional concerns of the state Department," Libby's lawyers wrote.

Rove — a source for Novak and Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper — is under investigation by Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald in the probe of the leak of Plame's CIA identity.

Libby's lawyers say that "either the government or the defense may call Mr. Rove as a witness at trial" and note that "the grand jury's investigation may be continuing with respect to Mr. Rove or other witnesses."

The defense says the documents it seeks will help demonstrate that the White House did not launch a concerted effort to punish Wilson by leaking his wife's identity, as administration critics have alleged.

Libby also is asking for notes from a September 2003 meeting in the White House Situation Room where Colin Powell, who was secretary of state, is reported to have said that everyone knows Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and that it was Wilson's wife who suggested the CIA sent her husband to Niger.

"The media conflagration ignited by the failure to find WMD in Iraq and in part by Mr. Wilson's criticism of the administration, led officials within the White House, the State Department and the CIA to blame each other, publicly and in private, for faulty prewar intelligence about Iraq's WMD capabilities," the court papers state.

"The government's version of events blows out of proportion the minor role Ms. Wilson actually played and in doing so creates an impression that is highly prejudicial to Mr. Libby," they say.

Wilson's accusations stemmed from President Bush's assertion in his State of the Union address on Jan. 28, 2003, that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein had recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa.

Based on his 2002 trip, Wilson said he had found it highly doubtful the nation of Niger had agreed to sell uranium yellowcake to Iraq, as alleged in intelligence provided to the CIA.

Libby's Defense To Lay Blame For Leak On State Department (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Lawyers for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the indicted former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, want access to many Bush administration documents they say will demonstrate that an undercover CIA officer played a "peripheral role" in the government's debate over prewar intelligence and that Libby had no motive to lie about her, according to new court filings.

In documents filed late Friday, Libby's attorneys cast a wide net for information that they said would help demonstrate that Libby did not discuss the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame as part of a supposed administration effort to besmirch her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV.

They wrote that they anticipated the trial would showcase testimony by a Who's Who of senior administration officials involved in the Iraq policymaking at the heart of the CIA leak investigation, including three top officials at the State Department who the lawyers asserted played key roles in the unraveling of Plame's covert CIA position. Those officials include then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his deputy secretary, Richard Armitage, and undersecretary for political affairs, Marc Grossman.

DOJ_NMG_0019057

The lawyers argued that if press reports are correct that some reporters first learned of Plame's CIA connections from Armitage, then "the State Department (and certainly not Mr. Libby) bears responsibility for the 'leak' that led to the public disclosure" of Plame's CIA identity.

Libby was indicted Oct. 28 on criminal charges of perjury, obstruction of justice and lying to the FBI about how he learned of Plame's employment and what he told reporters about her. He was not, however, charged with leaking the information to the reporter who first published it, columnist Robert D. Novak.

Libby's lawyers have asserted that inaccurate statements made by him are the result of mistakes or forgetfulness caused by the long hours he put in every day dealing with the nation's most critical national security issues.

The charges against Libby resulted from an investigation -- still underway -- by Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald into whether administration officials knowingly leaked Plame's identity to Novak and other reporters after Wilson publicly contended that the administration had twisted intelligence when it asserted that Iraq had attempted to buy nuclear weapons material from Niger. Wilson's report was embarrassing because senior administration officials -- including President Bush -- had cited the alleged attempted purchase as one of the justifications for an invasion of Iraq.

In Friday's filing, Libby's lawyers, using Plame's married name of Wilson, said they "expect documents from the White House, the State Department and the CIA will corroborate Mr. Libby's account that Ms. Wilson's affiliation with the CIA was regarded throughout the government as a minor issue prior to Mr. Novak's article." They also said the papers will help them show that "Mr. Libby had no intent to lie because he did not believe that Ms. Wilson's employment status was classified."

Fitzgerald reiterated in his own filing that he believes Libby's team already has all the documents in hand that are relevant to Libby's defense, except a few that may be produced under seal.

Blowing The CIA's Cover (WT)

By Martin Schram

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

A powerful, even patriotic scoop in last Sunday's Chicago Tribune set a time machine whirring, emitting a sound somewhere between Walter Mitty's ta-pocketa-pocketa-pocketa and Yogi Berra's deja-vu-vu-vu (all over again).

This time it was the Tribune's savvy senior correspondent John Crewdson who had come to the rescue of the Central Intelligence Agency (though some of the dimmer minds in the agency might not quite see it that way) by revealing a dangerous intelligence gap.

In a March 12 investigative report, Mr. Crewdson revealed how America's enemies, armed only with a computer hooked to the Internet, could do what he did: Break the cover of 2,653 CIA employees around the world, many of them secret agents. Headline: "Internet blows CIA cover."

Three decades ago, a Newsday Washington bureau chief did a similar thing, albeit on the far more primitive, low-tech scale that was, in its way, state-of-the-art spookology for that Cold War era. In a June 6, 1974, semi-investigative (semi-luck) report, the Newsday journalist (who would come in from the cold some 32 years later to write this column) revealed how America's enemy rogues and spies, armed only with no-tech eyes, ears and shoes, could do what he did: Break the cover of a secret CIA school for spies operating in a well-appointed downtown Washington apartment building. Headline: "CIA spy school blows its cover."

Ta-pocketa-pocketa-pocketa. Deja-vu-vu-vu. Slowly, a pattern emerges. In fact, a pattern within a pattern. In both cases, the journalist revealed to the CIA an intelligence gap within its midst that stunned and embarrassed the agency -- but provided the CIA with info it needed to try to recover its secrets, post haste. And in both cases, the Chicago Tribune and Newsday journalists opted not to publish the identities or other distinguishing characteristics of the CIA operatives whose covers had been blown.

The work of the Tribune's Mr. Crewdson was truly impressive. He explained how he was able to use basic search engines and commercial online data services to discover the identities of CIA operatives, front companies and so on.

He reported CIA Director Porter Goss was said to be "horrified" at the discovery and that the agency was moving swiftly (also belatedly) to plug its intelligence gap.

The Newsday scoop three decades earlier began, frankly, with a bit of luck. A friend who lived in an apartment building near K Street told the journalist he had noticed strange comings and goings concerning an apartment on his floor. Men in business suits would come in the morning, stay a few hours and leave. No one was there at night.

It turned out that if you stood in the nearby laundry room, where walls were thin and laced with audio-friendly water pipes, you could her with bare ears what was said inside the apartment: "... KGB... " "... microdot... ." Lectures about code word greetings.

One day, you could hear the teacher or trainer explain how the others can avoid being followed. Then the day's class ended; as the 1974 Newsday article reported: "It is easy to follow the spies in training as they leave. They walk several blocks and enter another apartment building where they apparently feel very much at home. They emerge a short time later on a corner balcony several stories above the street and proceed to take in the afternoon sun. It is also easy to follow the trainer. He takes the elevator down to the basement garage and drives out in a blue sedan. The car has Virginia license plates and an Arlington, Va., inspection sticker. A check of the sticker registration reveals the trainer's true identity."

At first the CIA's spokesman gave the standard we-never-comment. But the reporter explained that wouldn't do because he had all the names and numbers adding, "If they are not ours, they are probably theirs." The CIA fessed up: "They are our guys.... It's a training exercise.... This is all rather embarrassing."

Then the CIA man asked the Newsday man for help. The operatives will want to know how they screwed up and the agency has no answer. The reporter explained all about the comings and goings, the walls and water pipes.

That Cold War mini-scoop was small time tweakery. But the Tribune gave the CIA a lifesaving gift: Disclosure of an Internet age intelligence gap that was both dangerous and discoverable.

Ta-pocketa-pocketa-pocketa. Deja-vu-vu-vu. Sadly, the pattern is frighteningly clear. The most dangerous intelligence gap of all is the one between the ears of the CIA officials whose job requires them to think it all through and prevent gaffes that could cost agents' lives or compromise the safety of us all.

Year After Shootings, Calls To Increase Judges' Security (NYT)

By John Files

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 18 — About a year after the killings of the husband and mother of a Chicago federal judge and a shooting rampage in an Atlanta courthouse that left three people dead, the safety of judges and court employees remains a serious concern for the judiciary.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said this week that three-quarters of the more than 2,000 federal judges had sought home security systems paid by the government.

The Judicial Conference of the United States, which sets policy for the federal courts, met this week for the first time under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and approved security measures.

The conference authorized security equipment and workers for federal probation and pretrial services offices, urged added training for judges' security guards and called for the Bureau of Prisons to screen all outgoing mail to judges and courts from federal prison inmates.

A spokesman for the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, David A. Sellers, said that after the killings of the family members of the Chicago judge, Joan H. Lefkow, the security focus shifted from courthouses to judges and other court employees outside court buildings.

Last May, Congress appropriated $12 million for the Marshals Service to coordinate such security, including paying for home detection systems for any federal judge who wants one. This month, the House passed an authorization for $20 million to hire additional marshals for court security and investigating threats.

"Threats and attacks against judges strike at the core of our system of justice," Judge David B. Sentelle of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said in a statement.

Judge Sentelle is also chairman of the Judicial Conference Committee on Court Security.

"Judges must be free to make judicial decisions without the fear of physical harm to themselves or to members of their families," he said.

Judge Lefkow testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee last May on increasing security for court employees.

The chairman of the committee, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, and Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat, introduced a measure in November mandating better coordination among marshals to protect judges.

Mr. Specter said the Marshals Service had been slow in adopting changes after the Lefkow shootings and had in some cases failed to cooperate fully with the federal judiciary on security.

The bill urges new criminal sanctions on people who seek to harass or intimidate judges by filing false or malicious liens against them or by knowingly posting personal information about them on the Internet with an intent to harm the judges. The bill calls for 10 years in prison for such liens and five years for posting personal information on Web sites.

The bill would also extend the authority of the Judicial Conference to redact sensitive personal information from judges' financial disclosure forms to prevent that information from being used for harassment or intimidation.

"This is a very serious problem," Mr. Specter said in an interview Friday. "There is no doubt that judges are targets, particularly for people who have been in their courtrooms who are unhappy with how they had their cases handled."

The Marshals Service did not return telephone calls on Friday.

The National Center for State Courts, which works with state and federal officials, had said some state and local courthouses had not followed standard safety measures. The group has urged courthouse personnel to do a better job of assessing threats, updating equipment and planning for emergencies.

"The federal courts are the gold standard," the president of the center, Mary McQueen, said. "Security is a very complex problem for the states because of jurisdictional differences. They don't have an integrated marshals service dedicated for security."

Ms. McQueen said the states had made "major strides forward in the last year," in developing security plans and sharing information on procedures and training.

Judge Offers Glimpse Of Potential Witnesses (LVRJ)

By ADRIENNE PACKER, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 19, 2006

Reid, Goodman on list in corruption case

During pretrial motions in the political corruption case of former Clark County Commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey and Dario Herrera, a U.S. District judge offered a glimpse of the witnesses who might be called to testify.

Judge Larry Hicks rattled off potential witnesses to prospective jurors Tuesday to determine whether any of them had relationship with those who could be called to the stand during the trial, which is expected to last three months.

Among the names were Terry Lamuraglia, a former lobbyist who now works in the county's Parks and Recreation Department; attorneys Jay Brown and Joe Brown; and Peter S. Christiansen, former strip club owner Michael Galardi's longtime lawyer.

The list also includes FBI agent Joe Dickey.

During opening statements on Thursday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Schiess touched on those witnesses' roles in the government's case.

A federal indictment issued in May 2003 accuses Herrera, Kincaid-Chauncey, Galardi and former Commissioners Erin Kenny and Lance Malone of bribery. The commissioners allegedly accepted cash bribes from Galardi that were delivered by Malone, in exchange for votes that furthered the success of Galardi's strip clubs, according to the indictment.

Galardi and Kenny cut deals with the government and have provided information to prosecutors.

Schiess indicated that Christiansen "knew Galardi was corruptly taking care of commissioners."

Prosecutors said Lamuraglia, another potential witness, told the government that he often accompanied Herrera to Cheetahs. According to Schiess, Lamuraglia said Herrera once returned from a private room inside the club and bragged about receiving oral sex. The government contends that Herrera not only accepted cash bribes from Galardi, but sexual favors arranged by the strip club owner.

FBI agent Dickey is expected to testify that he was in his office listening to a telephone conversation between Malone and Herrera on Sept. 21, 2001, when Herrera asked for a meeting with Malone. Malone told him to swing by the parking lot of Landry's seafood restaurant, where Malone was having lunch with Galardi.

Dickey raced down to Landry's and saw Malone exit Herrera's vehicle. Schiess said Malone had earlier pulled a velvet bag containing $30,000 cash out of Galardi's trunk and stepped inside Herrera's vehicle.

"When Malone got out of the car, he didn't get out with that bag," Schiess said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Johnson also appears on the witness list. Galardi told federal investigators that Johnson had received free lap dances and drinks at his clubs. Johnson denied the allegations, and an internal investigation conducted by the Justice Department found no evidence to back Galardi's claims.

Clark County Chief Deputy District Attorney Craig Hendricks and former Chief Deputy District Attorney Gary Guymon, who prosecutors claim received complimentary lap dances and drinks at Galardi's clubs, could also be called to the stand.

Nicole Compton, a woman Herrera dated while he was married, is also listed as a potential witness. The federal government said in 2001 that Herrera treated Compton to an expensive weekend at the Four Seasons Hotel in Newport Beach, Calif. Herrera also paid $4,000 cash for a diamond necklace he purchased for Compton.

Other witnesses on the list include Clark County Commissioners Yvonne Atkinson Gates, Bruce Woodbury, Myrna Williams and Chip Maxfield. The board members were in office during the time Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera served on the commission.

Other county witnesses include: Clark County Manager Thom Reilly; Administrative Services Director Don Burnette; former Business License Director Ardel Jorgensen; former Assistant Manager of Business Licensing Derek Dubasik; Registrar of Voters Larry Lomax; and Deputy District Attorneys Mary Anne Miller and Robert Warhola.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Las Vegas Mayor Oscar Goodman also were named at possible witnesses.

At least one dancer and a bartender at Cheetahs are on the list. Rich Buonantony, once a general manager at Jaguars, and Michael Beezley, who served as a manager at Jaguars, also might be called upon to testify.

Defense attorneys said county witnesses likely will be the first called to the stand when the trial resumes at 8:30 a.m. Monday. Burnette, the county administrative services director, is expected to be one of the first witnesses to take the stand. Burnette likely will address how the county operates in relation to zoning, commission and liquor and gaming meetings.

Data Show More Variety In Sentencing (DMR)

Des Moines Register, March 19, 2006

Some judges use too much discretion, are too lenient, critics say

In the first 13 months since federal judges were handed more freedom in sentencing, punishment disparities have developed among courthouses nationwide, new data show.

Federal prosecutors and judges in Iowa downplay the meaning of the statistics, but defense attorneys say the numbers reinforce what they have always believed: Varying judicial temperaments, combined with harsher prosecution in Iowa's northern half, can create widely different sentences for similar crimes.

"There are some judges who are far less likely to" depart from federal sentencing guidelines, said Alfredo Parrish, a defense attorney who has represented alleged criminals in both of Iowa's federal districts. "Everybody knows it."

The data, from the U.S. Sentencing Commission, indicate a new attitude among judges since a January 2005 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that gave them much more leeway in how they dole out punishment.

Nationally, judges have been 10 percentage points more likely since the change to deviate from what were mandatory sentencing rules before then. Almost always, they deviated with less-harsh sentences.

The guidelines, created in the mid-1980s because Congress wanted more uniformity in punishments, gave judges scant wiggle room. After only 13 months with "advisory" rules, Justice Department officials have urged Congress to take away judges' freedom.

William Mercer, U.S. attorney for the District of Montana, last week urged a congressional subcommittee to write new rules that would create more mandatory minimum sentences.

"There has been an undeniable erosion in the rate of compliance with the guidelines and an appreciable and troubling increase in sentencing disparities across the nation," Mercer said. "In short, both consistency and accountability are eroding."

In Iowa, that's meant a sentencing gap between two federal court districts. Previously, judges in the Northern and Southern districts followed the suggested sentences about 74 percent of the time.

Since the change, judges in Iowa's Northern District have continued to issue guideline-approved sentences in nearly 69 percent of cases. But in the Southern District, which includes Des Moines, the percentage fell to 49 percent.

Federal court authorities in Iowa argue that the numbers don't adequately reflect all the factors that go into a sentencing decision. But Steve Swift, head of a loose affiliation of northern Iowa defense lawyers, said the trend could raise the question of fairness.

"The danger, from my perspective, is that we start to get back to a world of variances in sentences, and then the question becomes, 'Is that a fair system?' " he said.

"We have these guidelines, and we tell ourselves that we're going to be handing out equal sentences, and maybe we're not."

Exact comparisons between Iowa's two districts are difficult because of differences in caseloads and in the circumstances of the crimes.

For instance, the two judges of the Northern District sentenced two defendants the first week of March. Meanwhile, three judges in the Southern District handed down 20 sentences.

None of the cases matched exactly in terms of the defendant's background, age or criminal history. But a spot comparison shows that William Edward Winn and Jodie Elaine McAtee, sentenced in separate districts on meth-making charges, drew sentences that were only slightly different: Southern District Judge Robert Pratt sentenced Winn to 16 1/2 years; northern Judge Linda Reade gave McAtee 13 years.

The issue gets more complicated when one factors in what lawyers say is a key difference between the districts - the frequency with which prosecutors ask for sentences to be reduced.

DOJ_NMG_0019061

Southern District Judge Ronald Longstaff on March 3 sentenced David S. Brady to two years and nine months for marijuana trafficking. On the same day, northern Judge Mark Bennett pondered whether admitted pot distributor Kim Darby Saenz deserved the 3 1/2-year sentence that prosecutors had requested. Bennett had overshot a previous request for leniency when he sentenced Saenz to one year and eight months, which was overturned on appeal.

The federal sentencing report does not include detailed information needed to compare each judge's willingness to follow the guidelines. Federal law in most cases bans major departures unless prosecutors ask a judge to do so. The requests for special treatment usually are reserved for informants who help with other cases.

In 2004, under the old sentencing rules, Northern District prosecutors filed for leniency in 23 percent of their cases, compared with 20 percent in the Southern District.

Between Jan. 12, 2005, and Feb. 1, 2005, northern prosecutors sought lower sentences in only 14 percent of their cases, compared with 21 percent in the Southern District.

Bennett, who has criticized the stinginess of northern prosecutors on many occasions, has not yet ruled on the Saenz case and declined to be interviewed for this article.

Rich Murphy, a prosecutor for Northern District U.S. Attorney Charles Larson Sr., said the sentencing statistics are "troubling" at first glance, but he disputes any implication that his district treats anyone unfairly.

"My sense is that we're not doing anything dramatically different" this year, Murphy said. "I think it's something that ought to be studied, but I don't think you can necessarily immediately draw the conclusion that there is an increased likelihood of incarceration between one district and the other."

Murphy and Southern District U.S. Attorney Matt Whitaker questioned the value of the statistics, which are based on sometimes-incomplete case information reported to the sentencing commission. Prosecutors estimated that the numbers reflect only 60 percent to 85 percent of the work that took place.

"There are so many moving variables here," Whitaker said. "I don't think you can draw any analysis of what this says."

Reade, known among defense attorneys in the Northern District for her stiff sentences, concedes that she is "not much of a departer" from the sentencing guidelines.

Southern District judges voiced a willingness to be more lenient than the guidelines, but "even when I vary from the guidelines, I usually don't vary very far," Longstaff said.

"I think I'm still letting the guidelines be a very important factor in the sentence. I'm just not letting them be the only factor."

Frank Bowman, a law professor at the University of Missouri-Columbia who has studied the statistics, said the Iowa numbers show that "plainly, something different is happening here."

A broader point, however, is the fact that so many federal judges have proven so willing to use their new-found sentencing discretion, Bowman said.

"I don't think you can really deny the obvious, which is you have an advisory system where judges are equally free to go up and down . . . and they're going down at a rate of 22 to 1," Bowman said. "No matter how you slice it, it seems to me that you've got a judgment being expressed here that the sentences mandated by the guidelines are far too high more often than they're too low."

Odds Favor Internet Gambling (WT)

By Tim Lemke

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

In thousands of houses across the United States at this very moment thousands of people are wagering thousands of dollars on NCAA tournament basketball games without leaving their bedrooms.

Overseas, thousands of operators of thousands of Web sites are collecting a portion of each bet and adding it to the millions of dollars they have pulled in just since breakfast.

This is the phenomenon of Internet gambling, a $15 billion industry driven by the popularity of sports and the growing interest in poker. The industry is the subject of tense debate between companies looking to cash in on the American marketplace and lawmakers looking to ban online gambling.

Analysts predict online betting soon could make up as much as 10 percent of gambling worldwide.

In fact, the total value of some online-gambling companies operating overseas is comparable to that of the major traditional American casino companies -- Partypoker.com is worth about $2.4 billion more than Harrah's -- and revenues are expected to top $25 billion by the end of the decade, according to Christiansen Capital Advisors, which tracks gambling data.

Gamblers are expected to bet $4.7 billion on sports online this year. Revenue from online poker, less than $400 million worldwide in 2003, is expected to hit $4 billion. Other casino games, such as craps and roulette, are growing in popularity, as companies expand their offerings. Even bingo soon could become a $500 million game, Christiansen said.

The business of online gambling has made many people very rich. Calvin Ayre, the chief executive officer of Bodog Entertainment, an online gambling and music company based in Costa Rica, recently was featured on Forbes magazine's list of billionaires.

"It's been quite a ride," Mr. Ayre, a Canadian citizen, said last week after the taping of a televised poker tournament at his $3.5 million estate in Santiago.

That ride largely has been funded by bettors in the United States: Nearly two-thirds of all online wagers are placed by people in this country, even though most forms of Internet gambling are illegal, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Conservative lawmakers, often at the urging of religious groups, have been trying to stop online gambling since it first surfaced in the mid-1990s. Their efforts largely have been focused on updating the Wire Act of 1961, the pre-Internet-era statute that currently serves as the law governing online-gambling issues.

Their arguments mostly are the same ones they cite in opposing gambling in general: Opponents point to studies that suggest gambling increases personal debt and is responsible for higher rates of divorce, drug use and depression. However, they also argue that the Internet creates additional dangers, allowing minors to place bets and criminals to use stolen credit cards.

"We feel this type of gambling is particularly pernicious," said Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte, Virginia Republican, perhaps the most outspoken opponent of gambling on Capitol Hill.

However, advocates argue governments would reap big financial gains by making online gambling legal, regulating it and taxing it heavily.

"I could pump $1 billion into the U.S. economy right away," said Peter Carruthers, chief executive officer of BetonSports.com, which also operates out of Costa Rica and earns most of its revenue from U.S. bettors.

Furthermore, companies say, regulation would protect against many of the problems gambling opponents fear would occur if online betting is legalized in the United States.

In the United Kingdom, for instance, online gambling is legal and heavily regulated. Companies are required to use special age-verification software. All bets are recorded, and there are strict caps on the amount one person can bet at once. The operations of all Internet gambling companies are routinely audited for fraud or money laundering.

Similar regulations have been put in place in more than 80 other countries worldwide.

"[The U.S.] should regulate this, and enforce the use of software that works," said Nigel Payne, chief executive officer of London-based Sportingbet PLC, which spends time in Washington lobbying for regulation. "Do we honestly think that Americans are not going to gamble? If they honestly think they can stop people, it's an extraordinarily naive position."

The legal landscape

The Department of Justice says that online gambling is illegal and has collected millions of dollars in settlements from online payment firms, including PayPal, that have helped process bets placed on the Internet.

But shutting down gambling operations or stopping people from betting has proven tricky. U.S. laws can't stop operators working outside the country, and building a case against individual gamblers is time-consuming and not a priority.

As a result, much of the department's efforts center on pressuring credit card companies to refuse online-gambling transactions.

Legal scholars, gambling advocates and even some lawmakers said that because current laws were crafted before the Internet age and most operators are based overseas, the law is only helpful to a point.

"You've got 2,000 offshore sites," said Joseph Kelly, a professor of business law at the State University of New York in Buffalo and a specialist on gambling laws. "You have to be able to crack down on offshore operations. In my opinion, it's an exercise in futility."

Indeed, Mr. Ayre operates on the same principle: His company has no physical presence in the United States.

"We are running an Internet business, and we follow all the laws of the countries we operate in," he said. "In all these jurisdictions, what we're doing is legal. We feel we are a legal organization."

The debate over Internet gambling and U.S. law centers largely on the 45-year-old Wire Act, which was designed to crack down on sports betting by organized crime and explicitly outlaws betting on "sports or other contests" using a phone line from state to state.

However, the law says nothing about the playing of poker, blackjack or other casino-type games and was written long before the Internet was conceived.

"We're satisfied that what we're doing in the U.S. is not illegal," said John Sheperd, a spokesman for Gibraltar-based PartyGaming PLC, which pulled in $977 million in revenue last year from its Partypoker.com and Partycasino.com Web sites. "We recognize that the law was not written with the Internet in mind."

DOJ_NMG_0019063

Federal legislation introduced last month by Mr. Goodlatte seeks to clarify the law to ensure that online bets are banned and to include poker and other common gambling practices.

"There needs to be a clear statement by the Congress that this is what the law is and this is what should be enforced," said Mr. Goodlatte, who claims to have more than 100 co-sponsors for his Internet Gambling Prohibition Act.

Some proposed laws target credit card companies and banks in the United States, but companies already say they can work around these measures by using foreign banks and direct-payment services, such as FirePay.

In addition, operators of online-gambling companies said Mr. Goodlatte and other lawmakers are sending mixed messages, because their legislation outlaws some activities but not others.

Mr. Goodlatte's bill, for instance, allows for online betting on horse racing and fantasy sports, exemptions that baffle online-gambling companies.

"Mr. Average is being told this is bad, Mr. Average is being told you can't do this, but Mr. Average is being told that if you bet on a horse race, it's fine," Mr. Payne said. "If you do it on a fantasy league, it's fine. If you do it on a lotto, that's fine. These are the exemptions the politician needs in order to push the bill through."

Supporters of online gambling said the new efforts from Congress are a reaction to critics who say measures against Internet gambling were killed as a result of illegal lobbying efforts.

Mr. Goodlatte blamed Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist who recently pleaded guilty to fraud and conspiracy, for working to block his Internet anti-gambling legislation in 2000. Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, nearly inserted a similar bill into lobbying-reform legislation earlier this month, and Mr. Goodlatte makes a point of referring to Mr. Abramoff when discussing his bill.

"Internet gambling has quadrupled since Jack Abramoff blocked the legislation back in 2000," Mr. Goodlatte said. "As several members of Congress were misled by him, we felt it was a great time to bring [the legislation] back."

The future

Online-gambling companies said they expect a 25 percent drop in revenues if the Goodlatte bill is passed. That figure, they said, represents the number of Americans who gamble online because they believe it is legal. The remaining gamblers will continue on, they said.

"You can't ban something Americans like doing and don't think is wrong," Mr. Ayre said.

Nevertheless, companies are expanding their company offerings to include less controversial games, such as bingo, backgammon and checkers.

Either way, it appears companies have no plans to stop collecting from U.S. bettors, regardless of what happens.

"These guys boast publicly at conferences about online sports wagers coming from the United States," Mr. Kelly, the business professor, said with a laugh. "And nobody bothers them."

Some Fear Popularity Is Weakening Amber Alerts (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WAITE HILL, Ohio, March 18 — To illustrate what has happened to the Amber Alert program, Arnold Stanko, police chief in this town of about 450 people, slowly pulls his hands apart as if stretching a piece of taffy.

Ten years after the alerts began being used in the Dallas-Fort Worth area, the system has been adopted in all 50 states. And in some, it is being used for reasons beyond its original purpose of helping find children abducted by strangers.

In Ohio, Texas and other states the program can be used when a child is taken away by a parent or family member who does not have custody, if the child is believed to be in immediate danger of injury or death.

Some law enforcement officials say they are concerned that the alerts will be overused and become less effective. They say that in some cases, it is more difficult for the authorities to decide when an alert should be issued because they have to weed out cases like those in which a parent is not a threat or cases where a child has run away.

"You don't want to be in a position where you get Amber fatigue where people say, 'It never ends, another Amber Alert,' and they tune out," said Tela Mange, spokeswoman for the Texas Department of Public Safety.

The system was created in 1996 after Amber Hagerman, 9, was kidnapped while riding her bicycle near her home in Arlington, Tex., and killed. The alerts are broadcast on radio and television and appear on cellphones at the owners' request and on highway signs.

The criteria for issuing an alert vary slightly from state to state, but the Department of Justice recommends the following minimum standards: an abduction is confirmed, the child is at risk of serious injury or death, there is enough descriptive information about the child, captor or captor's vehicle, and the child is 17 or younger.

"When it started out it was for stranger abductions," said Chief Stanko, who oversees the Northeast Ohio Amber Alert Plan from this Cleveland suburb. "Over time we learned that parents abduct their own children and kill them."

Of 17 alerts issued in northeast Ohio since 2002 through January, 9 involved children abducted by parents, family members or a live-in boyfriend, according to police records reviewed by The Associated Press.

More than 240 children have been recovered nationwide because of Amber Alert programs, and about 95 percent of children reported missing through the system are recovered, according to the National Center for Missing the Exploited Children, a private, nonprofit organization. Of 252 children who were subjects of Amber Alerts in 2004, all were found alive except five who were never located and six who were dead, the center said.

Chief Stanko emphasizes in training classes for police that officers must verify a parent's accusations about another parent before issuing an alert. But persuading 200 police departments to do that is a challenge, he said.

Law enforcement officers err on the side of caution to protect people in their work, he said, but that cannot be done with Amber Alert.

"If you erred on the side of caution, this thing would be going off all the time," Chief Stanko said.

No Amber Alert was issued the day Gina DeJesus, 14, of Cleveland failed to return home from school in April 2004, because no one witnessed her abduction.

Gina is still missing. The lack of an alert angers her father, Felix DeJesus, who believes the public will listen even if the alerts become routine.

"The Amber Alert should work for any missing child," Mr. DeJesus said. "It doesn't have to be an abduction. Whether it's an abduction or a runaway, a child needs to be found. We need to change this law."

Statistics show the first three hours are the most critical to recovering the child alive, according to the missing children center. But law enforcement officials cannot automatically issue an alert without an investigation, said Robert Hoever, deputy director of special operations at the center.

"It's a very, very difficult balancing act that these Amber coordinators face," Mr. Hoever said. "Typically, across the country these Amber coordinators are put in a position where they're damned if they do and they're damned if they don't."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Penalties Often Go Unpaid (WT/AP)

By Martha Mendoza And Christopher Sullivan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

When a gasoline spill and explosion killed three young persons in Washington state, officials announced a record penalty against a gas-pipeline company: $3 million to send the message that such tragedies "must never happen again."

When nuclear labs across the country were found exposing workers to radiation and breaking other safety rules, assessments totaling $2.5 million were quickly ordered.

What happened next with these no-nonsense enforcement measures? Not much. The pipeline tab eventually was reduced by 92 percent, and the labs' assessments were waived as soon as they were issued.

The amount of unpaid federal fines has risen sharply in the past decade. Individuals and corporations regularly avoid large penalties for wrongdoing -- sometimes through negotiations, sometimes because companies go bankrupt, sometimes because of officials' failure to keep close track of who owes what.

These are conclusions of an Associated Press examination of federal financial-penalty enforcement across the nation, which also found:

· The government currently is owed more than $35 billion in fines and other payments from criminals and in civil cases, according to Justice Department figures. This is almost five times the amount uncollected 10 years ago -- and enough to cover the annual budget of the Department of Homeland Security. A decade ago, Congress mandated that fines be imposed regardless of defendants' ability to pay, which has added tremendously to outstanding debt.

· In 2004, federal authorities ordered $7.8 billion in 98,985 fines, penalties and restitution demands in criminal and civil cases, but collected less than half of that.

· White-collar crime cases account for the largest amount of uncollected debt. In a study, Government Accountability Office (GAO) investigators found that just 7 percent of restitution in such cases is paid.

"Fines and orders to pay restitution are an important part of how we punish convicted criminals. When so little effort is made to collect that money, we allow convicted criminals to avoid punishment for their crimes, weaken our criminal justice system and ultimately deny justice to the victims of crimes," said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat, who has pressed for closer scrutiny for years.

DOJ_NMG_0019065

The AP filed Freedom of Information Act requests with a dozen federal agencies, seeking records on why and how they issue and collect administrative penalties and other assessments.

Although the government does collect billions each year in fines, penalties and restitution, success rates vary from agency to agency, region to region, case to case.

In many high-profile cases, fines are touted by authorities as proof that they are cracking down. Yet frequently those orders are quietly negotiated to just a fraction of their original amounts.

Documents provided to the AP by the Labor Department's Employment Benefits Security Administration, whose job is to protect pension and welfare benefits, showed that $2,000 was the maximum amount paid on nearly a dozen penalties ranging from $86,500 to $180,000.

Why the reductions? Officials explained that compliance is the agency's goal, and that the law allows penalties to be reduced when companies make amends. Violators who don't comply risk being referred to the Treasury Department, which can collect by seizing federal benefits.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration's written policy explains to inspectors that they can reduce penalties by as much as 95 percent, "depending upon the employer's 'good faith,' (25 percent) 'size of business,' (60 percent) and 'history of previous violations.' (10 percent)"

Federal law exempts the national nuclear laboratories from most financial liability, but the Energy Department has issued about $2.5 million in fines against Los Alamos, Livermore and Argonne national laboratories since 2000.

"This is kind of an exercise in absurdity," said Greg Mello, who heads the Los Alamos Study Group, a nuclear-disarmament activist organization in Albuquerque, N.M.

Even so, the Energy Department includes the fines in its annual reports to Congress and often announces them in press releases.

Last year, Congress tightened the rules so that as nuclear-laboratory contracts are renewed, the fine waivers are eliminated. Eventually, DOE spokesman Jeff Sherwood said, nuclear labs will have to pay imposed fines.

The reason DOE issued fines it could not collect was to show what the problems were and how bad, he said: "A $1 million fine says something different than a $10,000 fine."

When agencies can't get debtors to pay, the Justice Department may get the task of collecting a penalty. But the process is decentralized. The collection legwork falls to the 93 U.S. Attorney's Offices across the country.

Reviewing the adequacy of staffing was one of 14 recommendations made by GAO in 2001 to improve collection. A follow-up report two years ago still found "fragmented processes and lack of coordination."

The Justice Department office overseeing U.S. attorneys said it has made strides toward better coordination.

The 1996 Victims Mandatory Restitution Act requires judges to order payments regardless of a defendant's ability to pay. It's no coincidence, says Natalie Collins of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Las Vegas, that the uncollected debts have steeply increased since the law was passed.

Many people leave prison with a large debt they can't pay, she said. "We can't squeeze blood out of a turnip."

Abortion Ban Prompts Calls For Boycott (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

PIERRE, S.D., March 18 — South Dakota politicians and state agencies have been bombarded in the past few weeks with thousands of calls, letters and e-mail messages, for and against the state's recently enacted ban on nearly all abortions.

A few groups who oppose the ban have called for a tourism boycott of South Dakota, urging people to avoid attractions like Mount Rushmore; the Badlands; the annual motorcycle rally in Sturgis; and the Corn Palace, an arena in Mitchell whose walls are covered with colorful ears of corn.

The furor was prompted by the passage of the strictest abortion law in America — a ban on all abortions except to save a woman's life.

Tourism is South Dakota's second-largest industry, behind agriculture, with visitors to the state spending $809 million last year, according to the Tourism Department.

Among those calling for a boycott is the Women's Medical Fund, an abortion rights organization based in Madison, Wis. "Our message is that if they are going to treat women in this inhumane way, they can expect to pay a price," said Anne Nicol Gaylor, administrator of the group.

DOJ_NMG_0019066

Billie Jo Waara, the South Dakota state tourism director, said her office had been getting a dozen or so calls a day from people on both sides of the issue. Some say they will not vacation in South Dakota, but very few had canceled previously made travel plans, she said.

Abortion Ban Likely To Go To Voters In South Dakota (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 19, 2006

Leader of opposition says he doesn't foresee much difficulty in getting 16,728 signatures on a petition.

Chuck Haga, Star Tribune It appears likely that South Dakota's recently adopted ban on abortions will be referred to the state's voters.

Jim Robinson, secretary of the nonprofit organization Focus South Dakota, said he expects "a large variety of groups that disagree with this extremist ban" to participate in a petition drive to keep the law from taking effect July 1 and go on the November general election ballot.

"I wouldn't anticipate too much difficulty" in obtaining the necessary 16,728 signatures, he said. "We want to make it a unified effort."

That includes discouraging out-of-state groups from taking too high a profile, Robinson said. Last week, Focus South Dakota persuaded a small abortion-rights group in Wisconsin to scuttle its plans for a petition drive to refer the law.

"It's not surprising to me at all that people around the country want to help," he said. "But we want this to be done by South Dakotans."

Kate Looby of Planned Parenthood -- whose clinic in Sioux Falls is the only facility in the state to offer abortion services -- said the organization will decide this week whether to join a referral effort or seek an injunction and challenge the law in court.

Robinson said a recent poll by Focus South Dakota showed that 57 percent of registered South Dakota voters said they would overturn the ban. But abortion opponent Leslee Unruh called those results "deceptive" and said her Abstinence Clearinghouse found in December that 64 percent of state households consider themselves anti-abortion.

Unruh said she looks forward to a statewide campaign focused on abortion.

Challenge welcomed

The abortion ban, which would allow exceptions to save the life of the mother but not for rape or incest or to preserve the mother's health, was signed on March 6 by Gov. Mike Rounds.

Supporters have said they expect and welcome a challenge, with the South Dakota statute reaching the U.S. Supreme Court and affording the justices an opportunity to overturn the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision, which established a woman's right to an abortion.

Unruh acknowledged that some abortion opponents would prefer a law that allows exceptions in cases involving rape or incest, but she expects that those people still would vote to uphold the ban, especially if they understand that women who seek help immediately after such attacks may use the so-called "morning after" pill.

"I'm not afraid to stand up for those children [conceived as a result of rape], as well," she said. "But if you go immediately to your doctor, [the alternative] is there."

Sen. Stanford Adelstein, R-Rapid City, said he's "certain" the ban will be referred to voters. He voted against the bill after proponents turned aside all amendments, including exceptions for rape and incest. "People are so angry ... I can't imagine we couldn't get enough signatures," he said from Jerusalem, where he's attending a professional meeting.

The state's tourism department reports receiving e-mails from people saying they won't visit the state because of the abortion ban. Mark Johnston, press secretary for Rounds, added, "We're hearing from people on both sides, from all over the world."

Unwed Fathers Fight For Babies Placed For Adoption By Mothers (NYT)

By Tamar Lewin

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

Jeremiah Clayton Jones discovered that his former fiancée was pregnant just three weeks before the baby was due, when an adoption-agency lawyer called and asked if he would consent to have his baby adopted.

"I said absolutely not," said Mr. Jones, a 23-year-old Arizona man who met his ex-fiancée at Pensacola Christian College in Florida. "It was an awkward moment, hearing for the first time that I would be a father, and then right away being told, 'We want to take your kid away.' But I knew that if I was having a baby, I wanted that baby."

Mr. Jones has never seen his son, now 18 months old. Instead, he lost his parental rights because of his failure to file with a state registry for unwed fathers — something he learned of only after it was too late.

DOJ_NMG_0019067

Under Florida law, and that of other states, an unmarried father has no right to withhold consent for adoption unless he has registered with the state putative father registry before an adoption petition is filed. Mr. Jones missed the deadline.

Although one in every three American babies has unwed parents, birth fathers' rights remain an unsettled area, a delicate balancing act between the importance of biological ties and the undisrupted placement of babies whose mothers relinquish them for adoption.

While women have the right to get an abortion, or to have and raise a child, without informing the father, courts have increasingly found that when birth mothers choose adoption, fathers who have shown a desire for involvement have rights, too.

But to claim those rights most states require a father to put his name on a registry. While about 30 states now have registries, they vary widely. In some, fathers must actually claim paternity; in others, just the possibility of paternity. The deadlines may be 5 days after birth or 30, or any time before an adoption petition is filed.

And registries are a double-edged sword: It remains an open question whether they serve more to protect fathers' rights or to protect adoptive parents, and the babies they have bonded with, from biological fathers' claims.

"My specialty is contested adoptions, and the most common contest is where the mom wants to place the baby and the dad objects," said Martin Bauer, president of the American Academy of Adoption Attorneys. "Registries can protect men against birth mothers who won't disclose the father's name or actively lie about his identity."

Adam Pertman, executive director of the Evan B. Donaldson Adoption Institute, a nonprofit research and education group, sees it differently. "It's all smoke and mirrors," Mr. Pertman said. "How can registries work if no one's heard of them? And it's just not reasonable to expect that men will register every time they have sex."

In the early 1990's, the two-year fight over Baby Jessica and the four-year battle over Baby Richard highlighted the wrenching dramas of birth parents winning custody of babies placed with adoptive parents years earlier. The spectacle of those children being taken from the arms of the only parents they had known raised an outcry about the need for speedy, permanent placement.

While some states have long had putative father registries — New York's registry was upheld by the United States Supreme Court in 1983 — most were started in the last decade to head off late parental claims.

In many states, fewer than 100 men register each year — not surprising, adoption experts say, because most young men have never heard of the registries. One exception is Indiana, where men are notified of the registry when a birth mother names them as the father, and 50 men register a week.

Adoption lawyers say some birth mothers refuse to identify the father to forestall interference. There are no statistics on how many unmarried fathers seek to raise babies the birth mother has relinquished.

Mary Beck, a professor at the University of Missouri School of Law, said the burden of registering should be the father's.

"There are men who complain, 'What, I have to file for every woman I've had sex with?' " Professor Beck said. "But men are on notice of possible pregnancy by virtue of having had sex, and the alternative is leaving it up to the women to chase them down."

Even for registered men, the system is flawed. Because the registries are state by state, a registration means nothing if the father or mother has moved — or if the baby was surrendered for adoption in a different state specifically to avoid a challenge.

In one case, Frank Osborne of North Carolina challenged his 5-month-old son's adoption in Utah. The Utah Supreme Court rejected Mr. Osborne's claim, but a dissenting judge found it unfair that Mr. Osborne lost a child he had lived with and supported until the mother "unilaterally and clandestinely" took the boy to Utah.

Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, will address that problem in the Proud Father Act, which would create a national registry and is to be introduced in Congress later this year.

"In a perfect world, everything would be linked so that everyone could find out if a man had registered or filed for paternity," said Jim Outman, a lawyer in Atlanta who consulted on the legislation. "But in the real world, the left hand doesn't always know what the right hand is doing.

"If there's nothing in the records in their county, their state, how is an adoption agency supposed to know there's a father who's going to come forward in two years? There has to be some security for the adoptive parents and the child."

One self-made expert on the registries is Erik L. Smith, an Ohio paralegal who fathered a son in Texas and fought for paternal rights after the baby's placement with an adoptive family. In an unusual resolution, the boy, now 13, lives with the adoptive family, while Mr. Smith, a noncustodial father, has visiting rights. Mr. Smith was naturally intrigued when he heard of the Ohio registry in a class where the professor explained that babies born to unwed parents could be adopted without the father's consent unless he registered within 30 days after the birth.

"I asked if that meant that, to protect his rights, a man should register every time he has sex with a new partner, and he said yes," Mr. Smith said.

DOJ_NMG_0019068

So he tried. "I called information and asked how I could contact the Ohio putative father registry, but there was no listing," Mr. Smith said. "I searched the Internet but couldn't find any address."

While Ohio's system has improved, he said, "as long as registries aren't publicized, I think they just work as a way to get rid of fathers like me."

Glenn Spraggs, a 22-year-old Cincinnati man, was recently caught short by ignorance of the Ohio registry. His girlfriend, Sharicka Watson, had a baby boy, Thomas, on Dec. 2, and Mr. Spraggs, who also has a daughter with Ms. Watson, was with her when he was born. Ms. Watson has told reporters that she discussed adoption with Mr. Spraggs, but he said he had no warning that less than two weeks after the birth, Ms. Watson would surrender Thomas for adoption.

"No one told me anything," Mr. Spraggs said. "When I found out he was gone, I called the police to see if they could help get him back, or file kidnapping charges or something, but they said there was nothing they could do because it was an adoption. By the time I heard about the registry, it was too late."

Although the Ohio registry gives men 30 days to file, a judge terminated Mr. Spraggs's parental rights when Thomas was 19 days old. After Mr. Spraggs hired a lawyer, the adoption agency returned Thomas to Ms. Watson, who now wants to raise him. A custody hearing in the case is scheduled for tomorrow.

Carol Sanger, a professor at Columbia Law School, said registries reflected a deep societal belief that unmarried fathers are irresponsible.

"If we want registries to mean anything," Professor Sanger said, "we'd have to teach them in every sex education curriculum in every school, and publicize them everywhere."

In Florida, the 2003 law creating the registry requires the State Department of Health "within existing resources" to distribute pamphlets on the registry at every office of the Health Department, the Department of Children and Families and the Bureau of Vital Statistics.

But when Barbara Busharis, a professor at Florida State University, sent students to find the brochures, they had no luck. "They couldn't find anyone who knew anything about the putative father registry," Professor Busharis said.

Mr. Jones's case illustrates the dangers of ignorance. The identity of his former fiancée is confidential, but Mr. Jones's court filings detail his struggle to prevent the adoption.

He tried to contact his ex-fiancée, who disappeared from his life when her parents took her from school and to another county. He called her friends, her brother, her pastor. He hired a Florida lawyer and filed a paternity petition the day before the baby was born, in the county where she previously lived. But that lawyer, now dead, apparently knew nothing of the putative father registry, and never mentioned registering.

Mr. Jones is appealing the termination of his rights. "I don't think there's any greater right that you could trespass on than a parent's right to his child," he said.

In her brief, Allison Perry, Mr. Jones's lawyer, called the Florida registry "a well-kept secret," with just 47 registrants for the 89,436 out-of-wedlock births in 2004. Mr. Jones, living in Arizona, had no reason to know of it. The adoption agency that alerted him to the pregnancy never mentioned it, and when the agency later sent him a letter, it enclosed information on a Florida registry for birth parents interested in a reunion when the children grew up, but nothing on the putative father registry.

Jeanne Tate, a lawyer for the adoption agency, said that because it represented the birth mother's interests, it could not advise Mr. Jones of his rights. Even the call to Mr. Jones went beyond the agency's legal obligations, she said.

"What's good about the law is that it provides clear guidance on whether a baby is or isn't free for adoption," she said, "so you don't get into those heart-wrenching situations where a baby who's been placed has to be removed."

Generally, fathers who have missed registry deadlines have lost their court cases. But Ms. Perry argues that the Florida law, applied as mechanically as in the Jones case, is an unconstitutional intrusion on men's fundamental rights.

"Jeremiah Jones did everything he could reasonably do to establish a relationship with his child," she said. "It's just inconceivable that the government can take away his child because he missed a filing deadline."

Morial Adds His Voice To Election Protests (NOTP)

By Karen Turni Bazile, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 19, 2006

Outcome likely to be contested, he says

Echoing concerns of other civil rights leaders about the fairness of New Orleans' upcoming elections, National Urban League president and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial announced a plan Saturday for out-of-town mayoral forums and outreach programs to help the city's displaced voters.

The National Coalition for Black Civic Participation plans to file a letter of objection to the U.S. Justice Department's approval Thursday of the plans for the April 22 and May 20 elections, said Morial, who was in New Orleans to attend a funeral.

DOJ_NMG_0019069

The department gave advance clearance to the plans under the terms of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which requires the Justice Department to review proposed changes in voting procedures in Louisiana and other Southern states to ensure the changes don't discriminate against black voters.

The department's action drew immediate fire from several civil rights groups, which have contended for weeks that too little is being done to ensure that tens of thousands of black voters displaced by Hurricane Katrina will be able to participate in one of the most crucial elections in the city's history.

"What New Orleans and Louisiana do not need right now is another black eye because of a marred election process," Morial said. "With 30 days to go, there's ample opportunity for the plan to be corrected."

Under the current plan, Morial said, there is a strong probability there will be challenges to the April 22 primary or May 20 runoff because absentee ballots are seen as difficult for displaced voters to obtain and fill out.

Morial said the Coalition for Black Civic Participation's objections will focus on the lack of an adequate public relations effort to educate such voters.

He said his group thinks the best way to ensure a fair election is to establish out-of-state voting places, noting that similar arrangements were made for Iraqis in the United States during last year's elections for Iraq's new government.

At a special session this year, the Legislature rejected a proposal to set up satellite sites in cities such as Houston, Atlanta and Jackson, Miss., where tens of thousands of displaced voters have relocated. A federal judge also refused to order use of such sites.

Besides filing an objection to the election plans, Morial said the coalition is planning "Katrina survivor empowerment weekends" in several cities before the election.

As part of each weekend, the group will sponsor a mayoral forum and a meet-and-greet session for all candidates in all races, and it will offer information about absentee balloting and other post-Katrina issues.

The forums are scheduled for March 25 in Houston, March 31 in New Orleans, April 8 in Atlanta and April 15 in Baton Rouge. Exact locations and times have not been announced.

Under plans developed by Secretary of State Al Ater, the state's chief elections official, and the Legislature, satellite voting places will be established in 10 other Louisiana parishes, where displaced New Orleans voters will be able to cast absentee ballots in person on April 10-13 and 15 for the primary.

In addition, information packets are being sent to displaced voters nationwide explaining how to vote absentee by mail, and the state has bought newspaper ads in many cities to tell displaced voters about the election. Many mayoral and other candidates are expected to campaign in cities where New Orleanians are concentrated.

But Morial said those plans are not sufficient. In at least one case, he said, a displaced voter's packet was sent to his flooded local home, not his post-Katrina address.

Besides avoiding problems in the New Orleans elections, Morial said, having out-of-state satellite polling places would avert problems in fall elections that will affect displaced voters from St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes and other areas devastated by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Pick For Interior Said To Show More Charm Than Substance (LAT)

By Tomas Alex Tizon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Gov. Dirk Kempthorne of Idaho is well-liked as a down-to-earth guy. But some doubt his ability to get the job done, citing a list of unfinished plans.

BOISE, Idaho — He rides motorcycles, battles a bad back, does a killer impersonation of fellow Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, and sometimes forgets to balance his checkbook.

Even those who don't like his politics call him "Dirk," the way he prefers to be addressed. And they speak of him like he's the guy next door who just happens to be governor.

But the ready smile and neighborly style of Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne don't always get the job done, some supporters and critics say. They contend that the man President Bush has picked to succeed Gale A. Norton as secretary of the Interior often exhibits more charm than substance.

DOJ_NMG_0019070

Fellow Republicans and business leaders say Kempthorne, 54, knows how to create consensus but is too politically cautious. Local Democrats and environmentalists say that he is gifted at making people feel heard but that, at the end of the day, his loyalties lie squarely with development and corporate interests.

If confirmed, what kind of Interior secretary will Kempthorne be?

In the Idaho state capital, where he has been a major political player for two decades, many predict his performance will mirror that of his years as Boise mayor, U.S. senator and two-term governor — a record of mixed success with a list of unfinished projects and a whole lot of people who refer to him as a good guy.

"His charisma carries him a long way. Even when we were at odds, he was very quick to approach our group with a smile and a handshake," said Roger Singer, the executive director of the local chapter of the Sierra Club from 1995 to 2004.

"He's very good at giving the appearance that he's listening closely to what you're saying," Singer said. "In the end, his votes have fallen along the conservative party line."

Singer cites two examples:

In the mid- to late 1990s, Kempthorne successfully brokered a deal — protested by environmentalists — allowing the military to expand a training ground into the Owyhee Canyonlands in southwestern Idaho. Kempthorne also succeeded in weakening federal protection of gray wolves, shifting control to the state.

Singer fears Kempthorne would continue his long campaign to water down the federal Endangered Species Act and would support oil-drilling in the Arctic and the sale of public lands to special-interest groups. Kempthorne, Singer said, has worked to overturn President Clinton's ban on building roads in wilderness areas.

"I'd like to give him the benefit of the doubt in his new job," Singer said, "but my fear is he'll be closely aligned with Bush administration policies that have been detrimental to the environment."

National environmental groups are harsher in their assessment. The League of Conservation Voters gave him a rating of 6 on a zero-to-100 scale.

Local political watchers view Kempthorne as a "middle of the road" Republican in an overwhelmingly conservative state. Among his critics are Republicans who say he isn't conservative enough. But many Idaho Republicans are pleased that one of their own has been tapped to be part of the president's Cabinet.

Former state Sen. Laird Noh, who led the Senate Resources and Environment Committee from the early 1980s to 2004, called Kempthorne "a good steward, a balanced steward" of the environment.

"He used considerable political skill to protect resources while also allowing for reasonable use of those resources," the former senator said.

Noh, a Republican, credited Kempthorne with engineering an agreement with the Nez Perce Tribe over its claims to the waters of the Snake River, ending a decade of sometimes acrimonious debate. The compromise resolved the tribe's water claims, preserved the state's water rights and set protections for salmon and steelhead.

The agreement is seen as one of Kempthorne's biggest accomplishments.

But Kempthorne's most loyal supporters hail from his days as Boise mayor, between 1986 and 1993. He is largely credited for revitalizing a moribund downtown.

Don Brennan, a city councilman when Kempthorne was mayor, tells how Kempthorne took the initiative. It's a story that Kempthorne likes to tell himself.

One day in 1986, the mayor assembled all the key players, including the City Council, in one room and told the group to finally make a decision on building the Boise Centre on the Grove, an open-air commercial plaza in the city's core.

Kempthorne said the media were outside and anyone who wanted to admit failure could leave. An agreement was reached shortly after.

"The people in that room didn't think they could get out," said Brennan, a Democrat. Brennan said Kempthorne was most effective in his city role. Kempthorne's successes as U.S. senator from 1993 to 1999, and as governor from 1999 to the present, have been fewer and harder-fought, Brennan said.

Kempthorne was born in San Diego and has lived in Idaho for 35 years. He earned a political science degree from the University of Idaho, where he was student body president as a junior. He and his wife, Patricia, have two grown children.

Before running for mayor, he worked as a public affairs manager for FMC Corp., a Philadelphia chemical company, and was executive vice president of the Idaho Home Builders Assn.

His election and reelection as governor came handily: He won the 1998 election by 68%, and four years later by 56%.

Kempthorne, who got to know Bush when both were governors, was considered a leading candidate to be the new administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency in 2003. The job eventually went to a career administrator, Stephen L. Johnson, but Kempthorne remained on Bush's radar. When the president visited Idaho last summer, the two went bike riding in the mountains.

Kempthorne's popularity took some hits after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks when he barricaded the Statehouse and closed off several city blocks for nearly a year. A number of downtown businesses in this city of 185,000 suffered as a result of the closures. "It was a huge overreaction," said Boise Mayor David H. Bieter, who held a town hall meeting on the issue.

In May of last year, Kempthorne bounced a couple of checks totaling $111 to his hairstylist. The governor, who earns a salary and housing allowance of more than $150,000, told the media that he and his wife had been very busy and that their finances had been drained by surgeries for his chronically bad back.

The mishap made the governor appear more down-to-earth to many Idahoans, just as his avid interest in Harley-Davidson motorcycles had.

Even his harshest critics — including Spokane, Wash., Democrat and former Idahoan Tom Keefe, who calls Kempthorne "a pleasant man in a somewhat empty suit" — often end their critiques with statements like "That doesn't mean I don't like the man."

Keefe said it wouldn't surprise him if, after Kempthorne served as Interior secretary, the former governor became "a head lobbyist for the mining industry." Mining and ranching interests have strongly endorsed Kempthorne.

Overriding disagreements with Kempthorne on economic and social matters is the sense among Idahoans that "one of our own is ready for the big leagues," said political science professor Steve Shaw of Northwest Nazarene University in Nampa, Idaho.

There's great pride that another Idaho governor could follow former Gov. Cecil D. Andrus, Interior secretary under President Carter.

Shaw said some Idaho residents saw Kempthorne as "a photogenic man who isn't much into doing the heavy, hard lifting of getting policies pushed through."

Examples include Kempthorne's unfinished campaign, which began when he was U.S. senator, to overhaul the Endangered Species Act; and his child welfare program, Generation of the Child, which critics say has fizzled.

Idaho legislators fear that Kempthorne's $34-million plan to improve Idaho parks and his $1.6-billion highway project may fall by the wayside if the governor becomes too distracted by the Cabinet appointment process.

But what will probably carry the day for Kempthorne politically is his knack for connecting with people.

Last year, Northwest Nazarene University awarded Kempthorne an honorary degree. After the reception, with the media and everybody gone, Shaw watched as Kempthorne knelt on the floor and chatted face-to-face at length with several small children.

Shaw said: "There's something very human about the man."

Senator Could Play A Smarter Hand On Energy (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Jeff Bingaman is a personable, hard-working and very smart senator. But the New Mexico Democrat doesn't appear to be much of a poker player.

Bingaman is now helping Senate Republicans and the energy industry advance one of their top goals: a bill to expand drilling for oil and gas in the Gulf of Mexico off the Florida coast. He's doing so even though Republicans are blocking the energy priorities of Bingaman and most other Democrats: more focus on conservation and renewable energy.

By helping Republicans pursue their agenda while the GOP suppresses Democratic preferences, Bingaman isn't only making a bad bargain — he's making it more difficult for the nation to craft a comprehensive plan to reduce our excessive dependence on foreign oil.

The key to greater energy independence isn't so much a scientific breakthrough as a political accommodation between the forces supporting more domestic production and those focused on greater conservation. And that won't come without the kind of hardball bargaining so far missing from the legislative maneuvering over the Florida drilling plan.

The debate on this issue is important partly because it could set the model for what are likely to be a series of confrontations over offshore drilling.

Much of the outer continental shelf has been off-limits for decades. In 1981, James G. Watt, President Reagan's chain saw of an Interior secretary, proposed to sprout oil rigs across 1 billion acres offshore; Congress, fearing oil spills and other environmental damage, blocked him by banning leasing off most of the nation's coastline.

Congress has renewed that moratorium every year since, and Presidents George H.W. Bush and Clinton reinforced it with anti-drilling directives that extend through 2012. Call it Watt's bequest to the environmental movement.

But those shields are cracking. With energy prices high and concern about energy independence higher, proposals are proliferating in Congress to reopen the outer continental shelf to drilling for natural gas or to allow states to opt out of the moratorium. Last month, the Bush administration released a draft five-year plan that envisioned substantial offshore development in the Gulf Coast, the Mid-Atlantic and off Alaska.

The next skirmish in this escalating battle is the legislation on Florida drilling, sponsored by Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.), chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, with support from Bingaman.

The bill would open a large swath of the gulf south of Pensacola and west of Tampa. Although the area isn't covered by the congressional moratorium, environmentalists and Florida's tourism industry have long opposed drilling there. Both of the state's U.S. senators, Republican Mel Martinez and Democrat Bill Nelson, are also resisting.

The administration's new plan envisions leasing about 2 million acres in the area over the next five years. But Domenici's bill would require the Interior Department within the next year to lease as much as 3.6 million acres, including areas within 100 miles of the Florida coastline.

Martinez and Nelson want to limit the gulf drilling to no more than 1.3 million acres and bar it within 150 miles of the coastline, while extending the moratorium for the rest of the outer continental shelf through 2020. But Domenici's approach recently roared through his Energy Committee on a 16-5 vote.

Even opponents concede Domenici's bill probably has majority support in the Senate. But it's uncertain that he could muster the 60 votes needed to break a filibuster by Nelson, who has threatened one. And that should provide critics leverage to negotiate.

Environmentalists want to preserve the moratorium on almost all offshore development. That's understandable: It's their job to be purists. But given the concern about foreign oil, the Republican push for greater domestic production, and the substantial resources potentially available offshore, more drilling seems inevitable.

Rather than trying to block all offshore leasing, opponents should insist that more drilling occur only as part of a comprehensive energy plan. One element of such a plan would be tight environmental protections and careful limits on the areas opened for lease. Equally important would be commitments from drilling advocates to couple any new production with serious measures to reduce demand.

That's where Bingaman has played such a questionable hand. Last year, White House officials and congressional Republicans agreed to strip from the final version of an energy bill a measure that Bingaman had steered through the Senate requiring utilities to generate 10% of their electricity from renewable energy by 2020. Last week, the Senate, on a nearly party line vote, rejected a Bingaman proposal to pump $5.3 billion more into federal spending on conservation and renewable energy. Domenici and every Energy Committee Republican voted against Bingaman.

And yet, on the Florida bill, Bingaman is providing critical bipartisan cover for the same GOP legislators who derailed his ideas.

When asked why he and other Democrats should accept more Florida drilling while their own proposals languish, Bingaman seemed surprised.

"I think you make progress where you can in this process," he said. "I have no problem supporting this as a free-standing provision."

The problem is that this Congress isn't likely to pass any "free-standing provision" promoting conservation, efficiency or alternative energy. Those priorities, essential to any long-term energy strategy, can advance only if Republicans see them as the price of increasing domestic energy production.

Greater offshore drilling would make sense in a grand bargain on energy that includes tougher fuel economy standards for vehicles and much greater support for renewable energy. But that bargain will never come if Democrats such as Bingaman give Republicans and the energy industry what they want without demanding anything in return.

Going Cold Turkey (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

SOMETIME BETWEEN now and the end of the month, the Bush administration is due to issue a revised set of fuel economy standards for "light trucks," a category of passenger cars that includes most sport utility vehicles, smaller pickup trucks and minivans. In other words, the White House is at last able to start making good on its promise to end America's "oil addiction," in a concrete way.

DOJ_NMG_0019073

Unfortunately, there isn't yet any certainty that the necessary willpower exists. At the moment, the Transportation Department's tentative proposal to update the current rules requires manufacturers to raise the fuel economy standards for light trucks by only 1.8 miles per gallon over four years. That's a slower rate of improvement than is mandated at the moment. The technology exists to raise the standards much higher, much faster and not at much greater cost. Raising the standard for light trucks from the current 21 mpg to 25 mpg in 2010 and 26 mpg in 2011 would, according to a calculation by Environmental Defense, save almost as much oil annually

by 2025 as we currently import from Saudi Arabia.

More important, the administration should start including heavier pickup trucks and SUVs, which, thanks to a regulatory quirk, aren't covered by minimum mileage rules at all. Again, requiring manufacturers to use available technology and to make minimal improvements could make a huge difference over time, both in saving fuel and in reducing emissions of the carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases that cause global warming.

There is no reason not to make these changes -- except cowardice. But these days, not even that is an excuse. Some 93 percent of Americans, according to one poll, support making cars and trucks more fuel-efficient. Nowadays, saving fuel is not only good for the economy, good for foreign policy and good for the environment, it's politically popular, too.

A Breath Of Fresh Air (NYT)

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

Clean air advocates who have had little to cheer about for the last five years finally won a big victory on Friday. In a unanimous decision, a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit struck down as illegal an attempt by the Bush administration to allow power plants and other industrial polluters to evade the Clean Air Act.

At issue was a provision of the act known as New Source Review. It requires older power plants to install modern pollution controls when they undergo physical or operational changes that increase harmful emissions. The rule was largely unused until the mid-1990's, when the Clinton administration and Northeastern states led by New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, decided to start suing companies that had upgraded their plants without installing the necessary controls. The companies complained to Vice President Dick Cheney about the costs and Mr. Cheney ordered the Environmental Protection Agency to find a way around the law.

The agency's answer was an amazing piece of regulatory casuistry that would have allowed utilities to make investments in a plant equal to one-fifth of the total cost of replacing it before the rule was applied; anything less than that was to be regarded as "routine maintenance."

This extraordinarily generous threshold would have allowed hundreds of plants responsible for thousands of illnesses to continue with business as usual. As the court noted, it would also have had the perverse effect of allowing plants that are now in compliance with the law to break it. This is not, the court added, what Congress had in mind. Ruling in favor of a coalition of states and environmental advocacy groups, the court declared that the "plain language" of the act required a much stricter approach, as the Clinton administration had devised, and that only "a Humpty Dumpty" interpretation, as the court called the E.P.A.'s position, could construe the law otherwise.

We should not expect the current E.P.A. administrators to rush the battlements with new enforcement cases. Indeed, such is Mr. Cheney's continued reach in these matters, the agency even now is seeking other, subtler ways to undermine the law. But it is nice to hear someone say that you cannot rewrite an act of Congress just because you do not like it.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Audit Critical Of FBI, Contractors (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

GAO Questions Millions in Expenses on Computer Upgrade

The FBI and its contractors spent more than $17 million on first-class airfare, inflated labor rates, missing equipment and other questionable payments during the botched attempt to upgrade the bureau's outdated computer system, according to a new audit from congressional investigators.

The findings by the Government Accountability Office expand the controversy surrounding the FBI's Trilogy program, which cost more than $535 million but failed to produce a usable case-management system for agents because of cost overruns and technical problems.

DOJ_NMG_0019074

The FBI announced this week that it would spend an additional $425 million in an attempt to finish the job. Two of the contractors singled out in the audit for inflated spending, Computer Sciences Corp. and CACI International Inc., have been chosen as subcontractors for the new system, named Sentinel.

Officials with the FBI and the project's main contractor, Lockheed Martin Corp., have vowed to implement stricter controls to avoid cost overruns and other problems in the new initiative.

The 82-page GAO report, obtained by The Washington Post, outlines a long series of questionable expenditures by contractors assigned to the Trilogy project. For example, more than 100 airplane flights costing more than $120,000 were booked at first-class or full-fare rates by CSC and others, despite government rules requiring lower-priced tickets, the report said.

Contractors also did not provide adequate documentation for millions of dollars in costs billed to the FBI, the report said. In one invoice cited by the GAO, $1.907 million out of $1.951 million was listed only as "other direct costs" by CACI.

The review also showed that CACI bought 30,000 pens and 30,000 highlighters for training sessions that were custom-made for Trilogy. Total costs: $19,705 for the pens and $32,314 for the markers.

The audit blasts the FBI and the General Services Administration for poor oversight of these and other expenditures. The report also notes that the FBI -- which has had a history of difficulty keeping track of items including guns and laptop computers -- was unable to locate more than 1,200 items purchased with Trilogy funds, including personal computers, servers and printers, valued at $7.6 million.

The FBI's struggle to modernize its computer system has been a recurring headache for Director Robert S. Mueller III and has earned it considerable criticism from lawmakers. The Sept. 11 commission said outdated computers may have contributed to missteps before the 2001 attacks and continue to hamper the FBI in combating terrorism and other crimes.

The hardware upgrade overseen by CSC was largely successful, yielding thousands of new PCs for agents. But a separate $170 million software upgrade foundered and was abandoned last year because it was over budget and did not work.

The auditors said the problems with Trilogy may well be much worse than their report shows because the review was based on only a portion of the FBI's payments to contractors. "If these weaknesses go uncorrected, future contracts, including those related to the FBI's new electronic management system initiative, referred to as Sentinel, will be highly exposed to improper payments," the auditors wrote.

That assessment echoes a warning issued earlier this week by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine, who said in a report that the FBI is at risk of repeating its Trilogy mistakes with Sentinel because of management turnover and weak financial controls.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), a frequent FBI critic and one of the senators who requested the audit, said, "It's time for the FBI to explain what assurances it has that the taxpayers will be able to recover any funds these companies owe to the government before we start paying them millions more for work on Sentinel."

The FBI said in a statement that it has tracked down more than 1,000 of the missing items and has put in place numerous checks to avoid the problems that plagued Trilogy. "We have strengthened our internal controls to avoid repeat of the issues cited by auditors, from any vendor," spokesman Michael Kortan said.

Tim Sheahan, president of the CSC division that handled the contract, said many of the airline expenses were due to short-notice trips by employees who frequently had to crisscross the country to troubleshoot problems or deliver equipment for the FBI's massive hardware upgrade. He also said expenditures were well documented.

"Think about a rolling wave of humans and stuff rolling across the United States and being deployed," Sheahan said. "I believe that the things we bought were well documented and if there was a question about something, we had the backup."

In its own letter responding to the allegations, the GSA said it accepted the GAO's recommendations for reform but disagreed with some of its conclusions regarding travel and other costs. A CACI representative did not return a telephone message yesterday.

Lockheed Martin will be paid $305 million as the main contractor for the Sentinel project. It will be required to meet benchmarks in order to be paid as the six-year project proceeds, FBI and company officials said this week. Officials hope to provide FBI agents with Internet access to some FBI databases within a year, and the entire Web-based Sentinel system is scheduled to be operating by late 2009.

FBI Questioned On $17M Computer Spending (UPI)

United Press International, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 19 (UPI) -- The U.S. federal spending watchdog has challenged the FBI over $17 million in computer expenditures and other spending on equipment that can't be located.

The audit was done by the Government Accountability Office on the FBI's Virtual Case File program, which was launched after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

In an 87-page report obtained by CNN, auditors said another $7.5 million was spent on 1,200 pieces of equipment that can't be accounted for.

However, an FBI spokesman told CNN the agency's own audit had accounted for most of the equipment.

The FBI's new Sentinel computer system will cost about $400 million, and the GAO warned in its report that unless accounting procedures are tightened, millions more could be wasted on the new project.

Many 'Concerns' Cited In Audit Of New FBI Program (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

The FBI has improved its ability to plan and manage a new information-technology project but still faces major problems in implementing the program, designed to replace a failed $170 million system, an audit says.

Known as Sentinel, the program was introduced last year as a replacement for the failed Virtual Case File system and is scheduled to be fully operational by 2009 at an expected cost of $425 million. It is part of an FBI effort to close internal communication gaps and improve information sharing with other law-enforcement and intelligence agencies.

The system will be built by Lockheed Martin Corp., the winning bidder last week on a $305 million contract. The FBI also expects to spend about $120 million evaluating the system.

The audit by the Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General said that although the FBI has developed new technology-planning processes that can help the agency complete a new case- and information-management system, "several continuing concerns" remain regarding the FBI's management of the new project.

Those concerns include incomplete staffing of the Sentinel program management office, the FBI's ability to redirect funds to complete the second phase of the project without jeopardizing its mission-critical operations, and Sentinel's ability to share information with external agencies and provide a framework for other agencies' case-management systems.

The audit also raised questions about the FBI's ability to control Sentinel's costs and a lack of documentation required by the bureau's information-technology investment management processes.

In a response to the audit, the FBI said steps were being taken to ensure the system's security, design and costs.

The Virtual Case File system ended last year after the Office of the Inspector General said the project had poorly defined design requirements, lacked mature information-technology investment management and suffered from poor management and oversight.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said the FBI plans to fund the first two phases of Sentinel by seeking congressional approval to redirect funds, with the third and fourth phases funded by new appropriations. He said more than $14 million of the initial redirection will come from the bureau's counterterrorism budget, $13 million from intelligence-related activities and $2 million from its cyber division.

Previously, "the FBI lacked an effective, reliable system to track and validate the project's costs. Although the FBI stated that it is evaluating a tool to track Sentinel project costs, we view the potential weaknesses in cost control as a project risk," Mr. Fine said.

In addition, he said, the bureau has not adequately examined Sentinel's ability to connect with external systems in other Justice Department areas, the Department of Homeland Security and other intelligence agencies. He said that if "such connectivity" is not built into Sentinel's design, other agencies could be forced into costly and time-consuming modifications.

Md. First Lady's TV Talk Show Won't Be Seen In Classrooms (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Maryland first lady Kendel Ehrlich pitched the state schools superintendent a plan to air her television talk show about drug and alcohol prevention in public school classrooms, but the department eventually turned her down.

The State Education Department declined her offer after an expert on drug and alcohol prevention reviewed it and determined that it was not suitable for children. One episode, filmed on the beach and at a nightclub in Ocean City, includes sexually explicit language and brief nudity as it explores the pitfalls of drinking.

The department instead offered to distribute the videos to parents and PTAs.

Comcast Cable Communications Inc. paid Ehrlich $55,000 to host 16 episodes of "Live Right: Straight Talk on Substance Abuse," which to date has been available only in the cable provider's on-demand library.

Democrats in Annapolis said they considered the proposal the latest attempt by the Republican governor and first lady to use their clout to gain widespread television exposure and statewide name recognition.

DOJ_NMG_0019076

In response to a series of taxpayer-financed tourism commercials and public service announcements that featured the governor and first lady, the legislature has included language in the budget this year that would ban the practice during the upcoming campaign season.

A spokesman for the first lady said she would not comment. State Superintendent Nancy S. Grasmick said she believes Kendel Ehrlich's goals in seeing the show distributed were in no way political but instead aimed at spreading the word about teenage drug and alcohol abuse, an issue the first lady has championed for years.

"I don't think it's politicizing the classroom," Grasmick said. "Each first lady, even Laura Bush, Hillary Clinton, they all have a piece they carve out that is a personal interest. . . . For this first lady, this is a real issue."

Grasmick said she never viewed the show and was not aware that one episode include scenes inappropriate for schoolchildren.

Most episodes feature Kendel Ehrlich interviewing authors and scientists who study alcohol abuse, and "straight talk" discussions with recovering addicts. But in one episode, a camera crew follows a group of teenagers to the beach and films them as they become drunk. They smoke cigarettes, curse and talk about such topics as pot, herpes and lesbians. A teenage girl jiggles her hips, and the camera pans to her lower torso.

The first lady appears as the host of every episode and is introduced in each show as the governor's wife. The two are shown in a photograph, hands clasped over their heads, celebrating his inauguration.

House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) raised concerns not about the show's content but about the politics of disseminating it through the schools.

"All of us like to go into classrooms and read to kids," Busch said. "What you don't do is infringe your will on the state school system. You don't try to make yourself part of the mandated curriculum."

Grasmick said the first lady raised the prospect of distributing the show in schools at the conclusion of a November PTA conference. She said "Live Right's" producer, Kris Morrissey, had subsequent talks with education department officials about broadcasting the program.

Morrissey heads a company called Chesapeake Productions and is married to a law school classmate of the first lady's. During the 2002 gubernatorial campaign, Morrissey produced a documentary filming the two major candidates in candid moments as they moved around the state.

In November, the governor appointed her husband, John Morrissey, then a Bowie lawyer, to the Prince George's District Court. Kris Morrissey declined to comment.

Her proposal never broached the subject of compensation, said JoAnne Carter, assistant state superintendent for student and school services.

Grasmick said the idea started to fall apart earlier this year when the department sent episodes out to an expert on drug and alcohol issues for his evaluation. That expert was Michael Gimbel, director of substance abuse education for the Sheppard Pratt Health System in Baltimore.

Gimbel hosts his own show on the topic, "Straight Talk," which has been airing for 17 years in Baltimore on a Fox affiliate. He did not want to give a lengthy review of the first lady's effort and did not wish to discuss the most racy episode.

"I gave them my opinion," he said. "The bottom line is, they're not going to hurt anybody. But when you do shows that are just interview shows, they can become pretty boring for people watching."

Gimbel also said he was surprised Ehrlich had been paid to produce and host the show, and not just because he had been doing the same work for free for 17 years.

"I thought this was part of her role as first lady because she had taken on the issue of drug abuse," he said, adding, "I immediately called my Fox 45 friends, and I asked for a raise."

The Next Crack Cocaine? (WP)

As Meth Use Grows, Officials Fear Region Is Unprepared to Deal With It

Jimmy Garza was freaking out. As officers handcuffed him inside his posh Fairfax County home on charges relating to a crystal meth addiction, the America Online administrator realized he was about to lose his $60,000-a-year job, his two cars and his freedom.

The arresting officers seemed baffled by his drug of choice. "You know, we don't have a meth problem in this area," Garza remembers one of the officers telling him that night in 2004.

"Are you kidding?" Garza, now 40, snapped back. "Wake up and look around you."

DOJ_NMG_0019077

The number of methamphetamine labs and addicts in the Washington area has jumped in recent years, but law enforcement and public health officials say the region is still woefully unprepared to deal with a problem that remains under the radar.

Meth, a dangerously addictive synthetic drug that stimulates the nervous system, has infiltrated suburbs in Virginia and, to a lesser degree, Maryland; Anne Arundel County found three labs in six months last year. In the District, the drug has been used mainly by gay white men but has recently spread into the black and Latino communities and to straight teenagers as young as 15, health officials said.

For years, officials thought the Washington region might be immune to methamphetamine, which has ravaged West Coast and midwest communities for more than a decade. Some wondered if meth was just a localized problem.

But the number of seized meth labs in Maryland, Virginia and the District has increased from close to zero in 2000 to more than 80 last year. In Washington, health officials say 75 percent of patients in some clinics have abused the drug, a big increase from a few years ago.

"The jurisdictions in this area just have not picked up on the exigency regarding crystal meth," said Sgt. Brett A. Parson, commanding officer of the D.C. police gay and lesbian liaison unit.

Sounding the alarm that the meth crisis could become the next crack epidemic, some law enforcement and public health officials are pushing for a stronger response. The Drug Enforcement Adminis tration trained more Maryland officers to dismantle meth labs last month than it did in all of 2005; a District-funded public service announcement was released last week to be aired in local clubs and on television stations.

Still, some experts said those nascent efforts are not enough to combat the spread of meth.

They call for training rank-and-file police officers to detect meth labs, the passage of legislation that would restrict the sale of ingredients used to produce the drug and prevention education in schools to teach children about its dangers.

"We really need to stop sitting around and just hoping that meth won't become the next crack cocaine," said Kevin Shipman, a manager with the District's Addiction Prevention and Recovery Administration. "We need to have a strong regional response before it's too late."

When meth, which, nationally, has been a largely rural epidemic, swept east across the nation, it hit the Shenandoah Valley hard, becoming one of the most-seized drugs in that part of the region. Labs have more recently popped up in semi-rural areas of Southern Maryland and Anne Arundel, where addicts are called "methnecks."

The labs require only simple equipment, such as bottles and tubing, which is easy to hide in almost any kind of building. The ingredients for the drug include medications containing ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, red phosphorous and hydrochloric acid.

The epicenter of meth use in the region is the District's gay community, where the drug showed up about five years ago and has been spreading quickly ever since, health officials said. Known as Tina in most gay circles, the drug has become the primary drug of choice, topping even alcohol among patients admitted to the Whitman-Walker Clinic, which primarily serves gay clients in the District.

"It's everywhere," Parson said. "I would defy you to find anybody in the metropolitan area who is white and gay and doesn't know one person who is using meth."

The drug is particularly troubling to medical workers in the gay community because meth is associated with risky sexual behavior. Some gay meth addicts use the Internet to find partners to use the drug and have sex -- known as party 'n' play -- encounters that sometimes turn into multiple-day sex parties.

Shipman said meth addicts are three times as likely to contract HIV as non-users because they tend to have unprotected sex and multiple partners.

Health experts say the addiction is particularly hard to treat. The National Institute on Drug Abuse says there is currently no "safe and tested" medication to treat meth addiction. Programs rely on counseling and behavioral modification.

Experts said one of the biggest problems in bringing attention to the meth problem in the area is the lack of reliable statistics on the number of users. Richard Rawson, a professor at UCLA who has been studying the drug for two decades, said public health indicators that should indicate the meth problem -- such as emergency room visits and patients in treatment -- lag five to seven years behind the emergence of the drug.

"In some places, the public health people are saying, 'Well, we're not seeing it; it's not that big a problem here,' " he said. "But that's not what the data means."

The best predictors of an emerging meth epidemic, Rawson said, are the presence of meth use in the gay community and the discovery of even small numbers of meth labs.

DOJ_NMG_0019078

At the DEA's meth lab training facility in Quantico, officials have identified the growing problem in the Washington area and are admitting increasing numbers of local police officers. In a recent class for 41 state and local officers held last month, seven were from the Washington area, including Annapolis and Montgomery, Prince George's, Calvert and Fauquier counties.

"We know the growth in Maryland and Virginia is exponential," said John Michael Donnelly, chief of the training unit.

But some of the officers are concerned that most rank-and-file officers won't get this training, which is expensive and in high demand. In Prince George's alone, 10 officers are on the long waiting list.

"We've got to get more guys that are actually on the street certified in this," said a Calvert narcotics detective at the training in Quantico, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he works undercover. "I think a lot of guys are probably seeing meth but don't know what it is."

Sgt. Shawn A. Urbas, a spokesman for the Anne Arundel police, said it would be easy for officers to miss a disassembled meth lab -- which might be just a box of tubing and some beakers -- if they had never seen one before. He said that's why the department is focusing on training.

Health officials are also pushing for legislation that would restrict the sale of cold medications that contain pseudoephedrine, one of the ingredients used to manufacture meth. Virginia, like many states across the country, limits such sales, but Maryland and the District do not. Some drugstores are voluntarily restricting sales.

Some former addicts, though, said the best way to stop meth is to educate the public about its dangers. Garza said he was adamantly against drugs -- "I was totally Nancy Reagan about it" -- until a friend offered him meth and he began using it at gay clubs.

Soon he was hooked on the drug -- which causes users to stay up for days at a time -- and at one point partied for seven straight days without sleeping. "I had no idea that that first little bit would alter my life forever," he said.

But it did. After his arrest, Garza lost his job, was evicted from his home and declared bankruptcy. He was able to get treatment, though, and now works as a limo driver. His primary mission is to tell his story so that people realize the dangers of meth.

"Even though it's so obviously here, it's still very hidden. It's very hush-hush," Garza said. "But we're trying very hard to bust the secrecy off of it."

IMMIGRATION:

Rift On Immigration Widens For Conservatives And Cardinals (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON

THE fierce battle over the future of America's immigration system is spilling from Capitol Hill onto the airwaves, as conservatives accuse Democrats, human rights groups and even some labor unions of trying to stymie Republican efforts to stem the tide of illegal immigration.

But in recent weeks, some commentators and prominent Republicans have turned their swords against another formidable foe in their battle to tighten the borders: the Roman Catholic Church.

Immigration has long caused friction between the church, with its advocacy for migrants, and conservatives, who want to slow illegal crossings over the Mexican border. But as Congress wrestles with the fate of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants, that tension has escalated into a sharp war of words, highlighting the divide among some Republicans and Catholics who have fought side by side on other issues like abortion and same-sex marriage.

In December, after the Republican-controlled House of Representatives passed a tough border security bill that, among other things, would make it a crime to assist illegal immigrants, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops assailed it as extremely punitive and called on its flock to oppose it. Church officials have sent lobbyists to Congress and this month parishes sent members to rallies in Chicago and Washington to push for legislation that would legalize undocumented immigrants and put them on the path to citizenship.

Some Republicans are firing back.

In February, Representative Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who opposes illegal immigration, took issue with Catholic bishops, among other religious leaders, "for invoking God when arguing for a blanket amnesty" for illegal immigrants. This month, two powerful Republican representatives, Peter King of New York and F. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, the co-sponsors of the border security bill, criticized the church leadership on "The O'Reilly Factor" on Fox News Channel, particularly Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles, who has said he would instruct his priests and parishioners to defy the legislation if it ever became law.

Meanwhile, cable news commentators Tucker Carlson and Lou Dobbs have questioned whether the church should maintain its tax-exempt status, given its political activism on immigration. And in an interview, Mr. King accused church leaders of "committing the sin of hypocrisy" in their campaign to sway Congress and Catholic voters.

"This is the left wing of the Catholic Church — these are the frustrated social workers," said Mr. King, who described himself as a practicing Catholic. "They're giving an incentive for more illegals to come here. I don't think it's right."

In fact, the Catholic leadership is united on this issue, and includes several bishops who strongly suggested in 2004 that Catholics should vote for President Bush because of his opposition to abortion. Both sides say they will continue to work together on those campaigns. But the pointed attacks by some Republicans are notable, given that the party has worked hard to woo Catholic voters in recent years. Some analysts warn that such criticism of the church and of immigrants may alienate a critical voting bloc of largely immigrant origins. But others point out that, unlike their clergy, most white, non-Hispanic Catholics remain deeply divided over immigration, and a battle seems to be emerging for their hearts and minds.

There are political implications. In preparation for the 2004 presidential election, the Bush administration cultivated church leaders, organized more than 50,000 volunteers and hired staff members to reach out to Catholic voters. The goal was to break the traditional allegiance to the Democratic Party, an affiliation that began to crumble with Ronald Reagan.

The campaign bore fruit: In 2004, a majority of Catholics voted for a Republican presidential candidate for the first time in 16 years.

But some analysts warn that Republicans need to tread carefully when they criticize the church and illegal immigrants. "The danger of this situation politically is that you'll have an entire season in which Republican politicians are saying critical things about the Catholic hierarchy," said Deal Hudson, the Republican architect of the effort to court Catholic voters in 2004. "That's not going to be helpful in terms of keeping the coalition together."

But the Rev. Richard John Neuhaus, editor of First Things, a conservative journal about religion and public life, said he doubted that the disagreement would have much impact on Catholics. He said the sexual abuse scandals had already weakened the credibility of the church leadership in the minds of some Catholics.

Republicans and the Catholic clergy have differed before on other issues — like the war in Iraq and the death penalty — without deeply affecting parishioners. And Mr. Neuhaus noted that while Catholics often connect deeply with their immigrant history, some make clear distinctions between their parents and grandparents and the more recent arrivals from Latin America.

"My hunch is that if you remove from the bracket the approximately one-third of the Catholic population that is Hispanic, that probably most other Catholics would divide on this questions pretty much as the general population does," Father Neuhaus said.

The Catholic leaders are keenly aware of the divisions among the faithful on this issue. Seventy of the 197 Catholic dioceses have formally committed to the immigration campaign, and officials are working hard to recruit the others.

Leo Anchondo, who directs the immigrant campaign on behalf of the Catholic Conference of Bishops, said the cardinals and bishops were not surprised there was a backlash against such efforts.

"Immigration has unfortunately become a very controversial topic," he said.

But Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington said he and other leaders decided they could not stay silent after witnessing the hardships endured by illegal immigrants, particularly as the wave from Latin America has surged. "This is a justice issue," he said. "We feel you have to take care of people."

Mr. Sensenbrenner, the Republican chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said Republicans had an obligation to clamp down on the border. To do otherwise, he said, would likely transform illegal immigrants into a permanent underclass in the United States.

That, he pointed out on "The O'Reilly Factor," was an undesirable option. "And I don't think it's Christian either," he said.

For Gates, A Visa Charge (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

When the Senate comes back to work next week, it is scheduled to take up the issue of immigration. And that is what brought Bill Gates to Washington for a rare visit last week.

The Microsoft billionaire does not love this capital, but he decided to add his personal voice to his Washington office's lobbying effort to expand the number of foreign-born computer scientists allowed to work in this country under a special program known as H-1B visas.

DOJ_NMG_0019080

In an interview sandwiched between his meetings on Capitol Hill, Gates told me the "high-skills immigration issue is by far the number one thing" on the Washington agenda for Microsoft and for the electronics industry generally. "This is gigantic for us."

Since autumn 2003 Congress has limited the number of people admitted annually on H-1B visas to 65,000. To qualify for such a visa, an applicant must have at least a bachelor's degree, specialized knowledge and a job offer from a U.S. employer. The visa is generally good for six years, with the possibility of applying for extensions.

So great is the demand for such skills in the burgeoning high-tech world that in August 2005 the last of the visas available for fiscal 2006 were issued. That means a 14-month shutdown of the program, until October of this year. "It's kind of ironic," Gates told me, "to have somebody graduate from Stanford Computer Science Department and there's not enough H-1B visas, so they have to go back to India. . . . And I have people who have been hired who are just sitting on the border waiting."

The draft bill that Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter has been preparing for floor consideration would expand the annual H-1B limit from 65,000 to 115,000. By excluding dependents (who now are counted against the cap) from the total, it might mean the entry of as many as 300,000 people a year -- one-tenth of 1 percent of the U.S. population.

As Gates said, these are highly paid, highly qualified individuals. Salaries for these jobs at Microsoft start at about $100,000 a year. Their counterparts can be hired more cheaply in China or India, he said, but Microsoft does 85 percent of its research and development work in the United States because it wants its computer scientists interacting directly with its program managers and its marketing people on its own campus.

Gates said he has a hard time understanding the logic of those who decry the outsourcing of American jobs yet are reluctant to facilitate bringing the high-skill people who are catalysts for economic growth to this country. "People just shake their heads at what kind of a central planning system would say having 65,000 smart people come in, that's okay, but 70,000 smart people, no."

President Bush and his administration support the expansion of H-1B visas. And Gates, in turn, is enthusiastic about the White House and bipartisan congressional efforts to boost the teaching of math and science in American high schools with the long-term goal of expanding the supply of qualified Americans for these jobs.

He is backing that effort both with gifts of technology from the company and grants of $300 million a year from his foundation for innovation in high schools. "But the benefit of things like that has got a fair time lag," he said, "and the next four or five years, it really hangs in the balance: how many of these talented people we want to hire, and who want to come here, can we hire?"

The answer is by no means certain. Opposition to the H-1B program grew during the dot-com bust, when groups representing domestic electrical engineers and computer technicians argued that foreigners were taking away their jobs. In 2003 they succeeded in cutting the quota by two-thirds, from 195,000 to 65,000, and they continue to oppose its expansion.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reports that unemployment among computer and mathematical operators is less than 3 percent. Gates said, "If you're graduating from a reasonable university in this country, with a degree in computer science, you have many job offers."

Still, there is reluctance -- especially in the House of Representatives -- to lift the ceiling on H-1B visas in an election year.

The House has responded to public pressure to close the borders to illegal immigration and seems incapable of distinguishing that problem from the value of encouraging high-skill workers to bring their talents to the United States.

That's why Bill Gates comes to Washington.

TAX:

Nonprofit Hospitals Face Scrutiny Over Practices (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 18 — Congressional leaders, concerned that many nonprofit hospitals are not providing enough charity care to justify their tax-exempt status, say they will set standards for the industry if it does not do so itself.

The chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, who had already been examining nonprofit groups like United Way and the American Red Cross, is broadening his focus to include nonprofit hospitals, with an eye to legislation that would clarify standards for their tax exemptions. Representative Bill Thomas, Republican of California, the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, began investigating the financial practices of nonprofit hospitals last year.

DOJ_NMG_0019081

The commissioner of internal revenue, Mark W. Everson, said tax officials often found little difference between nonprofit and for-profit hospitals "in their operations, their attention to the benefit of the community or their levels of charity care."

Huge changes have reshaped the health care industry in recent years, Mr. Everson said, but the basic standard for granting tax exemptions to hospitals has changed little since 1969.

Since 1969, Mr. Thomas said, "less and less has been required for hospitals to maintain tax-exempt status."

Before 1969, the Internal Revenue Service required hospitals to provide charity care to qualify for tax-exempt status. Since then, the agency has not specifically required such care, as long as hospitals provide benefits to the community in other ways — for example, by offering health fairs, screening for cancer and cholesterol, providing emergency care, training doctors and conducting medical research.

Health insurance companies typically negotiate with hospitals to secure large discounts off hospitals' posted prices. Uninsured people, with no one to negotiate on their behalf, are often charged much more than the insured, and some hospitals have been aggressive in trying to collect payment from the uninsured.

In a letter to the American Hospital Association this week, Mr. Grassley said he had "serious concern" about their billing and debt collection practices. He also expressed concern about the high salaries of some hospital executives, their joint ventures with commercial profit-making organizations and their use of profit-making subsidiaries.

While Congress is taking the initiative, administration officials have expressed similar concerns. President Bush has strongly encouraged hospitals to disclose detailed information about their prices, and tax officials say they intend to do more audits of nonprofit hospitals.

In the last few years, low-income people around the country have filed dozens of lawsuits arguing that private nonprofit hospitals are required to provide free or reduced-price services to the uninsured. Judges have generally rejected these arguments.

In a typical ruling last year, Judge Loretta A. Preska of the Federal District Court in Manhattan wrote: "Plaintiffs here have lost their way. They need to consult a map or a compass or a Constitution because plaintiffs have come to the judicial branch for relief that may only be granted by the legislative branch."

Federal tax law does not give patients an enforceable right to affordable medical care, Judge Preska said.

Sister Carol Keehan, president of the Catholic Health Association of the United States, said that nonprofit hospitals, like for-profit institutions, tried to earn a surplus, but used more of it to "take care of unmet health needs in the community."

In the last few years, Sister Carol said, a small number of Catholic hospitals have been accused of overly aggressive collection practices. These practices, she said, "resulted more from inattention than from a deliberate decision to hound poor people."

State officials have shown a keen interest in the issue. The attorney general of Kansas, Phill Kline, said he had opened an investigation of the billing and collection practices of nonprofit hospitals after receiving complaints from consumers. Some nonprofit hospitals have hired debt collection agencies that "harass the poor," Mr. Kline said.

In Illinois, Attorney General Lisa Madigan recently proposed legislation that would require hospitals to provide a minimum amount of charity care, equivalent to 8 percent of hospital operating costs. The Illinois Hospital Association opposes the legislation, saying it would "threaten the survival of many hospitals" by imposing new financial burdens.

In Minnesota, the state attorney general, Mike Hatch, said that stronger government regulation was needed because self-regulation was not enough.

Some nonprofit hospitals and health systems in Minnesota have provided "lavish gifts" and "grossly excessive" compensation to top executives while providing "paltry levels" of charity care, Mr. Hatch said.

When members of Congress raise questions about executive pay, they sometimes point to the compensation paid by teaching hospitals in New York. Tax-exempt organizations generally have to file annual returns with the Internal Revenue Service.

These forms, which are open to public inspection, show that the president of NewYork-Presbyterian Hospital, Dr. Herbert Pardes, received more than $4.3 million in compensation in 2004, plus $1.2 million in contributions to his employee benefit plan. About half of his pay was a reward for performance in prior years, the hospital said.

Dr. Spencer Foreman, president of Montefiore Medical Center in the Bronx, received $1.1 million in compensation and $712,000 in benefits.

In an interview, Dr. Foreman said, "Congressional interest in this area is quite appropriate, and we as an industry have to come forward with a comprehensive response." But in defining the proper level of charity care, he said, it is "totally unrealistic" to apply the same mathematical formula to nonprofit hospitals in destitute urban neighborhoods and affluent suburbs.

"If a hospital provides a benefit proportional to the community's needs and the institution's resources, it meets the community benefit test," Dr. Foreman said.

Turning A Kid Into A 'Child' (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Here's a tax question: When is your child not your child?

And here's a tax answer: When he's the child of his sibling.

To speakers of the English language, this sounds like gibberish. But to speakers of the arcane language of tax, it sounds like opportunity.

So if you're a well-to-do family about to file your 2005 federal income tax, it might be worth your while to wait until you read this. It may take expert help, and not everyone will benefit, but Congress appears to have laid a nice Easter egg for some of you.

A new provision of the tax law, which was meant to make the law simpler and fairer, is turning out to have done neither. The provision involves the definition of "child" in claiming various tax breaks, and it allows some alert taxpayers to claim benefits never intended for them.

It also deprives others of benefits they have gotten in the past.

A few years back, there was a hubbub around the "discovery" that federal tax law contained five different definitions of "child." This quickly became the, um, poster child for the absurd complexity that besets taxpayers as they try to figure out what they have to pay.

So in 2004, Congress, eager to look helpful, wrote into the law a single definition, to be used by taxpayers in claiming all the various tax benefits that go with having a child. That definition became applicable on 2005 returns.

The consequences have been turning up in recent months as taxpayers and accountants apply the new rules. Many of the quirks have been reported here, in the Wall Street Journal and other publications in recent weeks. But now John Buckley, chief tax counsel for the Democrats on the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, has put together a list and analysis of the winners and losers generated by the 2004 law, which he says "promises to be a large and embarrassing fiasco."

Buckley's paper is to be published in this week's issue of Tax Notes, an Arlington-based journal for lawyers and others interested in tax matters. The paper is accessible at the publication's Web site, http://www.taxnotes.org/ .

Among the more startling of Buckley's listings:

Children of well-to-do families may be able to use their siblings to claim the earned-income tax credit, which is meant for low-income working families. They may also be able to claim the $1,000 child credit, meant for middle-income parents. Or, they may more easily than in the past claim one of the tax credits aimed at moderate-income college students and their families.

In fact, such children may be able to claim benefits at no cost to their parents, who are ineligible because their income is too high or because they are subject to the alternative minimum tax, which among other things disallows personal exemptions.

To benefit, families need to have kids the right age, and at least one of the kids needs to owe tax, so across the country the impact is likely to be modest. But in high-income areas such as Washington, potential beneficiaries are likely to be more numerous.

The new rules consolidate the five definitions of child into one creature called a "qualifying child." Instead of being simply a "child" -- a concept most of us can grasp -- and getting more than half of his or her support from the taxpayer, a qualifying child, as Buckley notes, "covers a far broader range of relationships."

A qualifying child can be not only a son or daughter, he or she can be a grandchild, brother or sister, niece or nephew, foster child, stepchild or adopted child.

The qualifying child must have the same principal place of abode as the taxpayer for more than half the year. The rules indicate that temporary absences, such as for school or military service, don't count, Buckley says, adding that intent to return (or not to, if that is more advantageous) is all that is needed.

The qualifying child must also be younger than 19, or 24 if a full-time student, and must not have provided more than half of his or her own support. Note that it used to be the other way around: The taxpayer had to provide more than half the child's support. Thus, while a qualifying child can't be supporting himself, there is no longer a requirement that the taxpayer who claims him be supporting him.

Under this definition, someone can be the qualifying child of more than one taxpayer, and, while there are rules for breaking ties, the rules also allow the taxpayers to decide among themselves who gets the child-related benefits.

Now, with that in mind, consider this scenario: A well-to-do couple has a 22-year-old daughter who just finished college and has gone to work but is living at home. They also have a 16-year-old son in high school. The parents earn $200,000 a year and thus are well over the limits from the earned-income tax credit and the child credit and the Lifetime Learning credit, and are being hit by the alternative minimum tax, which means that their personal exemptions are also wiped out.

So the daughter claims her brother as her qualifying child. She can take a personal exemption for him, and if her income is within the limits (no more than $31,030 of adjusted gross income and including no more than $2,700 in investment income) she can claim the earned-income tax credit. That credit is "refundable," meaning that if it exceeds her tax liability, any remaining credit is refunded to her in cash.

And when her brother goes off to college in a couple of years, she might consider paying some of his tuition and claiming the Hope education credit.

Alternatively, if the sister is still in college and is self-supporting, she cannot be the qualifying child of her parents. But under the temporary absence rule she is regarded as still residing with her parents, so she can use her brother to claim the EITC as long as she meets the income requirements.

If none of that works -- for example, if the daughter is still a full-time student and not self-supporting, or has too much investment income for the EITC -- she could still qualify for the $1,000 child credit, assuming her brother was younger that 17 at the end of 2005. That credit phases out beginning at an income of $110,000 a year, so her parents couldn't use it.

Families with two children and parents over that limit should take a hard look at this one if one of their kids has enough income to owe taxes and the other is young enough to qualify.

In fact, "for reasons that are unfathomable," Buckley says, the law allows younger children, even infants, to use older siblings to claim the child credit, as long as the older sibling is younger than 17.

The Bush administration, in its budget proposals for next year, is asking Congress to amend the law to specify that a taxpayer cannot be the qualifying child of a younger individual. It is also asking that the law require that if a parent lived with his or her child more than half the year, only the parent could claim the child as a qualifying child, though in some cases the parent would be able to waive the tax benefit to another family member with higher income.

These fixes would save the government $2.6 billion over 10 years, the Treasury Department figures.

But, as Buckley points out, the consequences of the new definition of a qualifying child are not all windfalls for taxpayers.

The new rules have knocked many single taxpayers whose adult children live with them out of head-of-household filing status, a benefit they had been able to claim in the past.

The rules also mean that a sibling who really is caring for another sibling is disqualified from the EITC if the care-provider is younger than 19 (or 24 if a full-time student).

There also can be problems in claiming personal exemptions for some taxpayers and in qualifying for the higher education benefits.

Buckley also cautions parents that employer-sponsored medical insurance is tax-free only to employees, spouses and their dependents, so treating a child as independent could, at least theoretically, trigger higher taxable income to the parents.

Given all this, Buckley says, the logical course for Congress would be to repeal the new rules and start over.

Hurricane Katrina notwithstanding , only about half of homeowners living in some of the most flood-prone areas of the country buy federal flood insurance, a Rand Corp. study found. And most of the homeowners who do buy it do so only because it is required by mortgage lenders or others. Just 20 percent of homeowners in the most flood-prone areas buy the coverage when it isn't required, the study found.

Electronic filing of tax returns continues to rise, the Internal Revenue Service said last week. Of the 60.7 million returns filed so far this year, 71.5 percent were e-filed, compared with 69.7 percent for the same period last year. While this percentage is expected to decline as the April deadline approaches, the IRS still figures more than half of all returns will be e-filed this year. The average refund so far this year is $2,423, up $99 from last year.

A Revealing Plan (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

WHAT WOULD IT take to get the federal budget in balance -- honest, no-gimmick, no-fooling balance -- without raising taxes? This is a question the Bush administration would prefer not to discuss, and for good reason: It would require cuts so deep and wide as to be unimaginable as a matter of politics and unwise as a matter of policy.

How can we be sure? Well, the Republican Study Committee, a group of conservative House members, has produced an alternative budget that treads where Bush will not. And it is a helpful document, not in the sense of being realistic but for exposing the airiness of administration claims of fiscal prudence. Balance could be achieved by 2011, it shows, but only if Americans are willing to sacrifice a good chunk of their health care, education, energy, transportation and foreign aid -- in fact, pretty much all of the federal budget outside defense and veterans.

What would go? Extra unemployment benefits and training to workers who lose their jobs as a result of foreign competition, heating assistance for low-income families, family planning funds, subsidized loans for graduate students and, after 2009, funding for the federal highway program. Also, Amtrak, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, the National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Agency for International Development and President Bush's Millennium Challenge Account. Substantially reduced would be funding for low-income schools, United Nations peacekeeping forces, the National Institutes of Health and block grants to states to pay for preventive health care for mothers and children. Head Start would be frozen at 2005 levels.

Average enrollment growth in Medicaid, which provides health care to poor people, was more than 7 percent annually between 2000 and 2004, and medical inflation itself is about 5 percent. Yet this budget would limit the growth in federal spending on Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP), which provides health care to uninsured children just above the poverty line, to 4 percent per year. The result? More poor people, and more poor children in particular, would go without care.

Some of the proposed cuts, such as eliminating farm subsidies or killing NASA's moon/Mars exploration program, are sensible. But they also are highly unlikely; just think how much trouble Congress had recently agreeing to a mere $40 billion in entitlement cuts.

Altogether, the alternative budget would cut almost $700 billion over five years -- $332 billion in non-defense discretionary spending and $358 billion in entitlements -- while allowing for $299 billion in new spending on defense and veterans and $630 billion in tax cuts (extending the previous Bush tax cuts plus adjusting the alternative minimum tax). And, for discretionary spending, these cuts are from 2006 levels -- they don't even take into account how inflation over the next five years (projected to be a cumulative 11.4 percent) would further strain federal dollars.

Outside of defense, the amount spent on discretionary programs would be nearly a third less in 2011 than current spending, adjusted for inflation; it would amount to the smallest share of the economy (2.2 percent in 2011) at any time since 1962, when that number was first measured. And even that understates the magnitude of cuts required; the budget doesn't make room for war funding after the next fiscal year.

These budget cuts would be shortsighted and mean-spirited; they would transform the role of the federal government. We find much of this unthinkable, and we believe most Americans would, too. That's why Mr. Bush doesn't talk about the real-life consequences of his tax cuts, and the real-life people who will suffer from them after he leaves office. So we thank the Republican Study Committee for producing this document. If this is what you want government to look like, go ahead and support the extension of the president's tax cuts and oppose any tax increases.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush's Agenda Loses Focus (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

The White House staff has failed to formulate a clear domestic policy, some in the GOP say, and the administration is suffering because of it.

WASHINGTON — A growing Republican chorus is calling for a staff overhaul inside President Bush's beleaguered White House, but some conservatives say such a change would stop far short of fixing what they view as a serious flaw: an unfocused domestic agenda.

The war in Iraq is dominating the attention of Bush and his top aides, these critics say, while the recent departure of the president's top domestic policy advisor after just one year has left the White House without an obvious conductor to direct the sometimes disparate policy-making machine.

"You mean they have a domestic policy?" quipped Michael Tanner, director of health and welfare studies at the libertarian Cato Institute.

Tanner, an author of the failed Social Security plan that was Bush's No. 1 domestic priority last year, lamented the lack of a "policy czar" setting clear goals. He described the administration as "exhausted" and "rudderless" on the domestic front.

"There doesn't seem to be an endpoint for what they're doing," he said. "They need to decide what they're going to do for the next three years…. Staff changes are necessary but not sufficient. If they're just rearranging chairs and office plaques, that's not going to do anything."

Although Bush first campaigned on a largely domestic agenda, experts either said he had achieved much of what he had set out to accomplish or said he had put aside priorities at home to devote time, energy and government resources to the war on terrorism.

His once-sweeping ideas of giving every young worker a private retirement account as part of Social Security and completely rewriting the tax code have been sharply scaled back. On healthcare, with prices rising and tens of millions of uninsured, Bush's major ideas are creating tax-advantaged health savings accounts and computerizing medical records, hardly the broad overhaul sought by many advocates.

Michael Petrilli, who left the Department of Education in 2005 after four years working on school choice issues, said the administration never settled on an education agenda after Bush's No Child Left Behind Act passed in his first term.

One idea buried in Bush's proposed budget would spend $100 million on a national school voucher program. The proposal might appeal to conservatives still angry over some big-spending elements of the No Child Left Behind plan, but experts said it stood little chance of winning support this year in Congress.

Moreover, the proposed American Competitiveness Initiative laid out in Bush's State of the Union address, aimed at boosting math and science education, has not yet gained traction.

"There doesn't seem to be much of an education agenda right now coming out of this administration," said Petrilli, who is now vice president of the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, which advocates for school choice programs.

"It's hard to tell what the agenda's going to be for the next couple of years."

The competitiveness initiative was perhaps the most far-reaching new domestic idea in the State of the Union speech, encouraging innovation by putting renewed emphasis on teaching math and science. But, critics say, the push has come from a few lawmakers — not from the White House.

"Somebody really needs to steer it if it's going to happen, but the sense at this moment is that nobody's really steering it," said one GOP lobbyist who works closely with the administration on education issues but spoke on condition of anonymity out of fear of retribution from the White House.

Such frustration among domestic policy advocates underscores the range of problems facing Bush. Sixteen months after reelection, his second term has so far been dominated by a drumbeat of controversy and crises involving a range of issues, including ongoing violence in Iraq, the administration's domestic wiretapping program and an Arab firm's bid to manage operations at several U.S. ports.

Bush is facing the lowest approval ratings of his presidency, in the low to mid-30s.

In one independent survey, conducted by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, a plurality of respondents used the word "incompetent" when asked to describe Bush. In previous polls, the most common word had been "honest."

The ports controversy exposed festering tensions between the White House and once-pliant GOP lawmakers, who rebelled against Bush's push for the Arab firm to manage port operations. Many of those lawmakers are feeling increasingly free to express frustration about the administration's tendency to keep Congress in the dark on important issues.

Many conservatives have openly criticized key Bush initiatives in recent weeks, including a Medicare prescription drug program launched this year has proved complicated, costly and confusing to many seniors.

Last week, several longtime White House allies in the Senate joined with moderate Republicans and Democrats to support allowing the government to lengthen the sign-up period for the drug benefit and to negotiate cut-rate prices with drug companies.

Both votes bucked the White House, signaling concern among Republican lawmakers that the program and other Bush initiatives could spell trouble for the GOP in this year's midterm elections.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) set off fireworks when he said last week that he had "concerns about the team that's around the president." He told the Associated Press: "All of a sudden we're hearing the phrase 'tin ear.' That's a phrase you shouldn't hear. The fact that you're hearing it says that the kind of political sensitivity, the ear to the ground that you need in the White House, isn't there at the level that it needs to be."

Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. has held his job since Jan. 20, 2001. He rises before the sun, arriving at the West Wing ahead of the president. He even sweats with him: Card's weekend routine often includes riding mountain bikes with Bush at a Secret Service training facility or nearby wildlife sanctuary.

No other chief of staff has shown Card's stamina for the job except Sherman Adams, who served President Eisenhower for five years and eight months and established the modern model for the post. On Sept. 22, 2006, Card is to break Adams' record.

Card "is on call all the time," said a Republican senator with close ties to the White House, who spoke on condition of anonymity in order to speak freely about others in his own party. "I don't know how he's done it as long as he has. Is he fatigued? I'd have to say yes."

DOJ_NMG_0019086

He added: "The collective group of people who came in have been there a long time, and it's inevitable you become insular…. You don't talk to normal people. You don't go to a Little League game.

"What I would love is some new faces to come in at senior levels," the senator said. "Some fresh thinking would be helpful."

One recent staff change was not planned: the abrupt resignation in February of Claude A. Allen, who for the last year had been Bush's chief domestic policy advisor.

Allen's resignation was a mystery to his colleagues until Maryland authorities charged him two weeks ago with theft of at least $5,000 in goods from Target and other stores in the Washington area. Before then, Allen had begun taking on a more public role, sitting in the first lady's box during this year's State of the Union address and, days before his resignation, briefing reporters on the president's budget plan.

Another lingering distraction in the West Wing is the ongoing investigation into who leaked the identify of CIA operative Valerie Plame to the media. A grand jury continues to investigate Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, Bush's closest political advisor and the architect of linking GOP political goals to domestic policy. The inquiry has resulted in the resignation of Vice President Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who was charged with misleading federal investigators.

Strategists close to the Bush White House say Rove is unlikely to leave unless he is forced to by an indictment.

Likewise, Bush, known for his emphasis on loyalty, would be unlikely to ask either Rove or Card to leave.

"I can see them working to make a change," said one GOP consultant with close ties to the White House, who spoke on condition of anonymity due to the sensitivity of discussing internal staff deliberations. "But either Karl or Andy has to stay. The trouble is, we don't know what Karl's future is."

Some White House officials and allies wave off the concerns.

Anti-tax activist Grover Norquist said he sees no evidence that Rove is distracted or tired. "Karl's on top of stuff," Norquist said. "You get your e-mail responses right back."

Moreover, some administration advocates say that work is proceeding quietly on some domestic initiatives.

Officials on the White House's National Economic Council, for instance, convened a meeting last week of conservative think-tank scholars to discuss strategies for expanding the use of health savings accounts, the tax-advantaged savings plans that eligible consumers can use to pay for medical expenses. Advocates view HSAs as a freemarket approach to healthcare, though critics charge that they benefit the wealthiest and least-sick Americans without helping the uninsured.

The White House meeting lasted an hour and a half. "Everyone in the room was energized," said John Goodman, president of the nonpartisan National Center for Policy Analysis.

Jennifer Marshall, director of domestic policy studies at the conservative Heritage Foundation, pointed to the $100-million school voucher idea as evidence that the White House was laying some groundwork for future initiatives. The plan, which would create a pilot voucher program in several cities for schools deemed to be failing, would most likely be adopted as part of a new education package next year, she said.

The idea, found in the president's budget proposal, has received little public notice.

"Everyone knows there's very little oxygen in the legislative room this year," she said. "So there's a second tier of what needs to be put out there as a marker, and education is probably happening on that lower tier, which doesn't require headline attention and presidential stumping."

Burnout On The Bush Team? (HC)

By JULIE MASON

HC – WH Burnout, March 19, 2006

Washington talk has members of president's inner circle resigning

WASHINGTON - An emerging question around the White House is whether staff exhaustion and isolation are causing political missteps such as the scuttled deal to have a Dubai company oversee U.S. port operations.

Much of President Bush's inner circle has been with him since 2001 and even longer, because he imported to Washington many Texans from his gubernatorial staff and 2000 presidential campaign.

Top adviser Karl Rove, presidential lawyer Harriet Miers, press secretary Scott McClellan, communications counselor Dan Bartlett, budget-minder Clay Johnson and others at the White House came from Texas. Others, such as chief of staff Andrew Card and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, have been around since the early days of Bush's presidency.

Bush puts a premium on loyalty. But there is generally more turnover in a two-term administration, including at the Cabinet level.

DOJ_NMG_0019087

It's a burnout job. Just look at Bush — he has aged considerably since he first came to the White House. For staffers, the hours are long, expectations are high and time away from family is extensive.

And it can't be much fun now, with Bush experiencing the lowest public approval ratings of his presidency and a restive Congress behaving as if it lost the rubber stamp it used to keep on hand for him.

It's a long way from the 89 percent, do-no-wrong approval ratings Bush had right after Sept. 11.

Rumors of high-profile departures wax and wane. Is Card leaving? What about McClellan? Similarly, prognostications of imminent staff shake-ups are on the rise.

McClellan did little to stanch the speculation with an enigmatic nondenial last week.

"This is part of the inside Washington babble that goes on in this town," the spokesman said. "It's part of the parlor game. We are focused on the priorities that the American people care most about and getting things done."

Seniors denied break, despite law's history

When Congress passed the Medicare prescription drug bill in 2003, Republican leaders held open the House vote for an extraordinary three hours while leaders twisted arms to get members to go along with the president. It finally passed by one vote.

Bush on Wednesday visited a retirement home in Maryland where he was asked about possibly extending past May 15 the deadline to sign up for the complex program.

But the president, proving again that sometimes it's the one legislative vote that matters, refused to bless an extension of a deadline for a program created thanks to the extension of a deadline on the House floor.

"No, and the reason why is there's got to be a fixed time for people to sign up," the president said.

When a media op goes to the dogs

Bush's visit to the retirement home was unusual in a number of ways. Among other things, it took the president deep into blue-state territory and placed him before an audience of seniors who were not as warm and friendly as most of the groups to whom he speaks.

A woman asked about implanting Americans with microchips containing medical records. She said her dog had one. Bush didn't seem to know what to make of it. He said he didn't know if his dogs had such chips. "Barney might not like it," he said.

Major Changes Raise Concerns On Pension Bill (NYT)

By Mary Williams Walsh

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

With a strong directive from the Bush administration, Congress set out more than a year ago to fashion legislation that would protect America's private pension system, tightening the rules to make sure companies set aside enough money to make good on their promises to employees.

Then the political horse-trading began, with lawmakers, companies and lobbyists, representing everything from big Wall Street firms to tiny rural electric cooperatives, weighing in on the particulars of the Bush administration's blueprint.

In the end, lawmakers modified many of the proposed rules, allowing companies more time to cover pension shortfalls, to make more forgiving estimates about how much they will owe workers in the future, and even sometimes to assume that their workers will die younger than the rest of the population.

On top of those changes, companies also persuaded lawmakers to add dozens of specific measures, including a multibillion-dollar escape clause for the nation's airlines and a special exemption for the makers of Smithfield Farms hams.

As a result, the bill now being completed in a House-Senate conference committee, rather than strengthening the pension system, would actually weaken it, according to a little-noticed analysis by the government's pension agency. The agency's report projects that the House and Senate bills would lower corporate contributions to the already underfinanced pension system by $140 billion to $160 billion in the next three years.

That shortfall raises the specter of more pension plans failing, pushing their liabilities on to the government, according to the agency and critics of the bills. And some companies with fully financed pensions feel unfairly penalized by having to pay higher pension premiums to make up for others' shortfalls.

"It takes a better economist than me to understand how reducing contributions by that much is going to protect benefits and put the system on a sounder footing," said Jeremy I. Bulow, an economist at Stanford University.

Both pieces of legislation — one passed by the House and the other by the Senate, both by overwhelming majorities — do contain measures that would reduce some of the lapses and inaccuracies that the current pension law permits. They would also increase the premiums that companies pay to the federal guarantor, the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, an agency grappling with a $23 billion deficit.

DOJ_NMG_0019088

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, says the bills attempt to strike the proper balance between providing for workers' pensions and allowing companies to remain competitive.

"My goal is to make sure that companies set aside enough money for the pensions they promise their workers," Mr. Grassley said. "At the same time, we can't put burdens on plan sponsors that are too heavy."

The overhaul of the pension system is being undertaken at a time when it is reeling from a series of big bankruptcies, like those of United Airlines and Bethlehem Steel, which sent billions of dollars' worth of obligations to the pension agency.

The agency's pension insurance is limited, and a growing number of these companies' employees have discovered to their dismay that their benefits exceed the limits and that they will simply lose part of the money they had been promised.

The House-Senate conference committee intends to reconcile the bills before April 15, when the next round of corporate pension contributions are due. But the White House already warned in November that President Bush might veto any bill that extended too much special pension relief to individual companies and industries.

Legislators argue that, while they want the pension agency to be strong, they also want to encourage companies to continue offering pensions. Lately, some companies, like I.B.M. and Verizon, have moved to freeze their pension plans, arguing that the costs of their plans make it hard to compete.

Kevin Smith, the spokesman for Representative John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio and the new House majority leader, who was one of the driving forces behind pension changes, defended the House bill, arguing that many specific measures, particularly those phasing in the new rules slowly, were necessary.

"Both the House and Senate pension bills represent the most comprehensive pension reforms in a generation," Mr. Smith said, "so a responsible transition period for employers to meet the new, stricter rules is appropriate."

He added that he believed the pension agency's analysis did not take into account the weakened financial condition of many companies that offer pensions.

The law that Congress wants to amend was enacted in 1974 after a series of scandals in the auto industry in which employees of dying companies like Studebaker and Packard discovered that little or nothing had been set aside for their pensions. It gave rise to rules for the financing of pensions and to an insurance program roughly comparable to the federal insurance program for bank deposits.

The law did help safeguard pension benefits, but it has not been strong enough to stop some companies from falling short in their contributions.

When Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao sent Congress a blueprint for amending the pension law in January 2005, many companies thought her proposals were too tough.

From the start of the legislative process, lobbyists representing a wide swath of American business, including those from the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Benefits Council and the Erisa Industry Committee (which represents large companies with pension plans), argued for easing the burden on companies by allowing them more latitude in estimating how long their workers would live, for example, and what they would need to set aside for future payouts.

The biggest single-industry pension break in the bill passed by the Senate is for the airlines, to allow them to keep their unstable pension plans going.

Among other things, the airlines would be given 20 years to close the shortfalls in their pension funds — nearly three times as long as other companies. They would also be allowed to factor in highly optimistic assumptions about their investment returns when calculating how much they needed to contribute to their pension funds each year.

The measures were written into the bill at the request of Northwest Airlines, which is in bankruptcy proceedings and is trying to keep its pensions alive, though in sharply reduced form. Northwest sought a 14-year breather on its pension contributions.

But then Senator Johnny Isakson, Republican of Georgia, said that 14 years of relief would not be enough to help Delta, a big airline based in his state, which is also operating under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protections. Senator Isakson amended the bill to provide 20 years of relief. After complaints from other big airlines, the relief was expanded to them all.

The Senate bill would also help recover more than $1 billion of benefits that thousands of pilots for Braniff, PanAm, Eastern, United and other airlines have lost in bankruptcy cases going back as far as the 1980's. That amendment was made by Senator Daniel H. Akaka, Democrat of Hawaii.

But helping those pilots would be expensive: the pension agency projected that the entire provision would increase its total obligations to retirees by more than $1 billion.

Someone must pay for this. Currently, the pension agency finances itself in part through the insurance premiums that companies are required to pay into the system. Raising the premiums to support pilots or help other victims of corporate bankruptcies, some companies in other industries are starting to say, would be unfair.

DOJ_NMG_0019089

In a letter to shareholders last week, Edward S. Lampert, chairman of Sears Holdings, which is responsible for the pension plans of employees at Kmart and Sears, complained that his company's pension insurance premiums were going up by 60 percent, "not in order to address any risk associated with Sears, but rather to make up for the difficulties of other companies."

Mr. Lampert also deplored the current pension law, which bars companies with richly financed pension plans from taking any of the surplus money out, except in rare instances.

Prudential Financial has the same complaint, but instead of writing to its shareholders, it took direct action in Washington, hiring William F. Sweetnam Jr., until recently the Treasury Department's senior legal adviser on employee benefits, to lobby on the issue of surplus pension assets. Mr. Sweetnam is now a principal at the Groom Law Group, a Washington law firm that specializes in employee benefits issues.

Prudential has a $1.2 billion surplus in its pension fund. Mr. Sweetnam was able to persuade several senators, including Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey (where Prudential has its headquarters), that the companies that are more than 15 percent overfinanced should be allowed to remove some of the surplus and use the money to buy health insurance for retirees.

Currently, only companies that are 25 percent overfinanced are allowed to do so.

Robert DeFillippo, a Prudential spokesman, said that the provision would improve pension security because in exchange for the ability to take more money out of the pension fund, the company would be required to handle the money remaining in the fund much more carefully.

Smithfield Farms also got help in the name of strengthening the system. It bought another meat company out of bankruptcy in 2003, taking over its pension fund at the same time. That kept the bankrupt firm's pension plan alive, Smithfield said, and saved the government from having to take it over. In light of that, the company contends that it would hardly be fair to impose tougher new financing rules on Smithfield.

That argument caught the ear of Senator Mike DeWine, Republican of Ohio, where Smithfield has major operations. Mr. DeWine added a provision that would let Smithfield follow the old pension rules until 2014, no matter what Congress does in the meantime.

The bills would also be a boon to Wall Street by permitting financial service companies to handle more retirement money with fewer restrictions. Hedge funds, for example, would be permitted to manage more pension money without being held to the pension law's exacting standards of fiduciary duty.

Mr. Boehner has championed easing the restrictions on investment advice for several years. He included a provision that would permit investment firms to advise participants in 401(k) retirement plans, even if the firms' own mutual funds were among the employees' investment choices. Current pension law forbids this practice, on the thinking that it could taint investment recommendations.

Mr. Boehner has argued that employees need more investment advice, however, so that they can save more and earn better returns on their money. The securities industry is his top campaign contributor, providing more than $125,000 already in the 2005-06 House election cycle.

Mr. Smith, the spokesman for Mr. Boehner, said that the House bill would provide better quality financial advice for workers, adding that the Bush administration strongly supported that amendment.

"The Senate advice provision does little more than restate current law," he said, "which has left workers to fend for themselves without the type of quality advice they so desperately need."

Curse Of The Young Old (WP)

Why Should We Pay Them?

The bad news is, we're living longer.

Don't get me wrong. I hope you have a long and happy life. I just hope your kids don't end up paying one-fifth to one-third of their incomes to subsidize your retirement and mine. Because that's what awaits them: more and more boomers living to age 65 and beyond, perfectly healthy but collecting checks for decades. To head this off, we need a radical change in Social Security. I'm not talking about privatization. I'm talking about rethinking, and possibly abolishing, the whole idea of payments based on age.

The problem is grimly detailed in "65+ in the United States," a recent report by the U.S. Census Bureau. Five years from now, the boomers will start hitting age 65. By 2030, we'll have more than twice as many old people as we did three years ago. As a percentage of the population, this increase is enormous. In 1935, when Social Security was established, about 6 percent of Americans were 65 or older. Since then, the percentage has doubled. By 2030, it will have tripled. Not only are more people reaching 65; they're living well beyond it. In 1900, an American who made it to 65 could expect fewer than 12 additional years. By 1960, he could expect more than 14 years. By 1980, remaining life expectancy at 65 reached 16 years. By 2000, it was 18 years.

If you thought last week's budget fights over Iraq and Katrina were bad, wait till you see the bloodbath over retirement benefits. Hurricanes come and go. Iraq can be abandoned. But the debt to retirees increases every decade, and their clout grows, perversely, in proportion to the burden they impose. In 1945, for every Social Security beneficiary, we had 42 workers paying in. By 2002, we had just 3.3 workers per beneficiary. By 2030, we'll have only 2.2 workers per beneficiary. To keep the system afloat for the next seven decades, its trustees say the Social Security tax rate will have to reach 19 percent. And if life expectancy keeps rising over that period, academics project a tax rate of 27 to 32 percent.

Now for the good news. We're not just living longer; we're staying healthy longer. From 1982 to 1999, the percentage of senior citizens who had chronic disabilities dropped from 26 percent to less than 20. Active-life expectancy at age 65--the average number of additional years a person could expect to live free of chronic functional impairment--rose from fewer than 12 years to nearly 14. That's a five-year gain from what a 65-year-old could expect in 1935, according to Kenneth Manton, a leading scholar of old age. The experience of being 65 to 74 has changed so radically that the Census Bureau now calls this group the "young old."

So all these young old folks are working longer, right? Wrong. In 1950, more than 45 percent of men 65 or older were still in the labor force. By 2003, that percentage had plunged below 20. Five years ago, a study showed that men and women were retiring five and six years earlier, respectively, than their predecessors did 45 years earlier. Why? Because they could. Pensions helped, but the bigger factor was Social Security. By 2001, the program was supporting 91 percent of people age 65 or older. It provided nearly 40 percent of their income--equal to what they got from earnings and assets. A study quoted in the Census report documents the effect on work. When Social Security payments went up, men 65 and older quit the labor force at an accelerating pace. When payments were reined in, the trend reversed.

The point of Social Security was to subsidize those who couldn't work, not those who could. The program's founding document said it would support old people who were "dependent," "beyond the productive period" and "without means of self-support." In 1935, that described people around age 65. Today, it more accurately describes people a decade older. The intuitive remedy is to raise the retirement age well beyond the measly increases currently scheduled. Last year, Manton calculated that if you were designing a system in 1999 for people who could expect as many active years as a 65-year-old could expect in 1935, you'd set the retirement age at 70. And by 2015, you'd raise it to 73.

There are four obvious problems with this proposal. The first is that if we ask the young old to keep working, somebody's going to have to hire or retain them. This won't be easy. We all know that age discrimination is rampant in our economy. But we've shown before that this problem can be dealt with; look at the success of the 1967 Age Discrimination in Employment Act in helping raise the employment rate among older workers.

The second objection is that some jobs are too strenuous for a 65-year-old. But American jobs have become far less strenuous since 1935. One study shows that the percentage of Americans working in physically demanding jobs--defined as jobs "requiring frequent lifting or carrying of objects weighing more than 25 pounds"--declined from more than 20 percent in 1950 to less than 8 percent in 1996.

The third objection is that people don't age at the same rate. While true, it's not an argument for a low benefits-eligibility age. It's an argument for ending the link between age and benefits. Social Security actually consists of three programs. One pays benefits based on age; another pays if you lose your spouse; a third pays if you become disabled. As of 2002, 70 percent of the money paid out was based on age; only 15 percent was based on disability. That's insane. Inequality of aging means that age is a bad proxy for disability, which is a good proxy for need. If you turn 65 on the same day as your neighbor, but she's disabled and you aren't, we should pay her, not you.

Abolishing age as a standard of fitness would be fairer than simply raising the eligibility age. We've already taken steps in this direction. In 1986, Congress removed the upper age limit on people protected by the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. If you're healthy enough to do the job, age doesn't matter.

The final objection to both proposals is that Social Security is a trust fund; you made your deposits, and you're entitled to your withdrawals. But if you think the reason you'll live longer than your grandparents is that you're a better person, think again. Programs such as the ones Congress debated last week--Medicare, public sanitation, biomedical research--bought you longer life and better health. Maybe, instead of asking what your country owes you at 65, you should ask what you owe your country.

Standardized Tests Don't Always Make The Grade (LAT)

By Stuart Silverstein

DOJ_NMG_0019091

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Recent snafus in SAT scoring have brought attention to the inherent fallibility of such exams.

High school seniors and their parents, along with college counselors and admissions officers, have been roiled by recent disclosures that at least 4,600 SAT exams taken in October were graded incorrectly.

But education testing experts point out that similar mistakes have happened before — and inevitably will happen again.

"Tests are a fallible product," said Kathleen Rhoades, a research associate with the Center for the Study of Testing, Evaluation and Educational Policy at Boston College. "The way we treat tests in this country, it's as if the tests deliver these strong, solid, positive, irrefutable results. And that is not the case."

By Rhoades' count, there were 137 publicly disclosed cases of large-scale testing errors by educational testing companies from 1976 through early 2004, with most of them occurring since 1997.

"People are under the false illusion that because the tests are graded by a machine that the process is objective," said Robert Schaeffer, a spokesman for the National Center for Fair and Open Testing, or FairTest. "But everything, including programming the machine and doing quality control on it, is, in fact, done by human beings. And all humans make mistakes."

Rhoades and Schaeffer say a lack of regulation, cost pressures and tight deadlines aggravate the problems.

The consequences of grading mistakes and other mishaps have intensified over the last decade with the increasing reliance on so-called high-stakes testing. In recent years, President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act has triggered expanded testing by many states.

At the college level, standardized tests play an important role in deciding who is admitted, who wins scholarships and who gets into honors programs.

In K-12 education, they help make such determinations as school rankings, teacher licensing and pay, and whether students graduate high school.

The SAT and other tests are usually graded accurately, but when problems occur, "it gets people crazy because it's high stakes and it makes important decisions," said Eva L. Baker, co-director of the National Center for Research on Evaluation, Standards and Student Testing at UCLA.

The potential for problems was driven home last week with the disclosure that the Educational Testing Service, one of the nation's biggest testing organizations, had agreed to pay $11.1 million to settle a class-action lawsuit.

The case was brought on behalf of plaintiffs who received incorrect scores on teacher-licensing tests known as the Praxis exams.

In all, 4,100 test takers were wrongly told they failed.

The tests are used in many states but not in California.

California has suffered other testing problems, however. They include a foul-up in which a company now known as Harcourt Assessment Inc. miscalculated the results of 19,000 students and 22 schools on a Stanford 9 achievement test given six years ago.

The SAT grading problem, which came to light this month, involves incorrect scoring on at least 4,600 college entrance exams, less than 1% of the total. About 400 students received lower grades than they deserved.

The College Board, the owner of the exam, later disclosed that there were an additional 1,600 SAT exams from October and that some of those tests may have been incorrectly graded. Those exams had been flagged for scrutiny due to concerns about possible cheating, among other reasons.

Many admissions experts said the effect on this year's high school seniors would be muted. Although some test scores were off by nearly 400 points — out of a possible 2400 — 83% of the errors were in the range of 10 to 40 points.

College Board officials have repeatedly expressed regret over the problem, which sent many colleges scrambling in the final days of the college admissions season to reevaluate applications from affected students.

But the officials said that with a test taken by 2.3 million students a year, including 495,000 in October, it was difficult to eliminate all errors.

"It is a very high-volume operation, and you are dealing with millions of tests a year, and you're dealing with many questions on each test," said Laurence Bunin, the College Board's senior vice president for operations. "In any high-volume operation like this, there's statistically the chance for some rare error."

In this case, the problems were blamed on the scanning of the multiple-choice portions of the test performed by a College Board contractor, Pearson Educational Measurement, one of the nation's biggest educational testing and assessment businesses.

Pearson officials said the problems stemmed mainly from humid weather that caused answer sheets to expand.

Also, some answers were penciled in too lightly or too incompletely to be read by scanners, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0019092

Some testing experts said they were perplexed by that explanation and by the fact that two students, not Pearson, discovered the problems.

Craig Hoyle, a research consultant at Boston College's education school, said there were ways to prevent problems, such as using equipment to screen out humidity-tainted answer sheets. In addition, he said, "dummy" quality-check tests can be interspersed with the tests to detect scanning problems.

Pearson spokesman David Hakensen said his company had used quality-check tests, but not until the exams arrived at its processing center in Texas.

He said they were not mixed with exams at test sites — where they might pick up the same humidity that affected the actual tests — because any stray marks made on the quality-check tests would undermine their effectiveness.

Critics attribute scoring problems partly to cost-cutting by testing companies.

Pearson officials dispute that point.

The company has experienced problems in Minnesota, where in 2002 a judge found that a company Pearson acquired "continually short-staffed" a testing program, and in other states.

But experts point out that no technology, be it an airline or a testing system, is foolproof.

"Funny stuff happens," said Robert Boruch, a professor of education and statistics at the University of Pennsylvania. "The main objective is to reduce the likelihood of it happening. You can't reduce it to zero."

Bush's Fee On Futures Trades Probably Won't Pass, Boehner Says (BLOOM)

By Darrell Hassler

Bloomberg, March 19, 2006

March 18 (Bloomberg) -- A new fee on futures contracts proposed by President George W. Bush is unlikely to be passed by U.S. legislators, given that it hasn't passed in multiple previous attempts, said John Boehner, the U.S. House Republican majority leader.

``If it hasn't happened in 13 consecutive tries, that probably means it won't happen again," Boehner, an Ohio Republican, said in response to questions at a Futures Industry Association conference in Boca Raton, Florida.

Bush's proposed $2.77 trillion budget for the fiscal year that begins in October includes an unspecified fee on futures contracts to fund the government agency regulating that market. The fee would cover the $127 million budget for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission that regulates the $2.5 trillion-a-day U.S. futures industry, according to the budget Bush sent to Congress in February.

Futures contracts are agreements to make a transaction at a preset date and price. At the expiration date, a product such as corn or sugar may be delivered at the price or the buyers and sellers settle the difference in cash between the market price and futures price.

Industry Opposition

Similar attempts by Bush in 2002 and former President Bill Clinton failed. The Chicago Board of Trade and the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, the two biggest U.S. futures exchanges, oppose the fee because the higher cost of trading may drive traders to exchanges outside the U.S.

Chicago Merc Chairman Terrence Duffy said in an interview on March 15 that he has visited legislators in Washington D.C. four times to argue against the fee. The fee likely would be about 14 cents per contact for each trade, he said. The Merc, which charges about 67 cents a contract, is assuming that legislators will consider the fee when voting on the budget, even though it's failed so many times previously, Duffy said.

``We are telling people in Washington how serious this is to our industry," Duffy said. ``This is an issue that we feel very passionate about and we have to make people understand how markets work."

The Washington-based CFTC is the only federal financial regulator that doesn't receive funding from the companies it oversees, Bush's budget document says.

Congress created the CFTC in 1974 as an independent agency to protect futures users from fraud related to the sale of commodity and financial futures. The agency's five commissioners are appointed by the U.S. president.

Separately, Boehner said he's ``hopeful" that the U.S. Senate will complete its version of the reauthorization of the CFTC within two months in order to begin negotiations between the Senate and House on the final bill.

The House approved a version in December that included a new requirement that the CFTC more closely monitor fraud in natural gas trading, an item that traders oppose because of the extra reports to the government it will require.

In the Senate there are five or six senators who want a similar requirement in the Senate version, Boehner said. That has stalled the Senate proposal, he said.

Congress reauthorizes the CFTC every five years.

Public Comments By Justices Veer Toward The Political (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

Speeches by Supreme Court justices are usually sleepy civics lessons studded with references to the Federalist Papers and the majesty of the law. That seems to be changing.

This month, former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor told an audience at Georgetown University that a judiciary afraid to stand up to elected officials can lead to dictatorship. Last month, speaking in South Africa, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said that the courts were a safeguard "against oppressive government and stirred-up majorities."

Justice Ginsburg also revealed that she and Justice O'Connor, who retired in January, had been the targets of an Internet death threat over their practice of citing the decisions of foreign courts in their rulings.

The justices' speeches were mostly a reaction, students of the court said, to attacks on judicial independence in Congress. "The volume is being turned up on both sides," said David J. Garrow, the legal historian, "both in the attacks on the court and in the justices' response."

The recent speeches, said Kermit L. Hall, the editor of "The Oxford Companion to the United States Supreme Court," may be breaking ground in judicial decorum.

"What's going on," Mr. Hall said, "is that Ginsburg and O'Connor are using their position — and it is striking that both are women — to state a position in favor of the judiciary that comes real, real close to taking a political position."

The O'Connor and Ginsburg speeches, variations on basic speeches they had given often before, were sharper and more topical than what many expect from Supreme Court justices. Justice O'Connor's Georgetown speech was apparently neither recorded nor transcribed, but Nina Totenberg, the legal affairs correspondent for National Public Radio, reported on it the next day.

In the speech, Justice O'Connor seemed to address comments made by two Texas Republicans, Representative Tom DeLay and Senator John Cornyn, concerning Terry Schiavo, a brain-damaged woman whose feeding tube was removed by court order.

Ms. Schiavo was the subject of a confrontation between Congress and the courts last year. Congress lost.

Senator Cornyn said afterward that political rulings from judges had fueled public frustration. "It builds up and builds up and builds up to the point where some people engage in violence," he said. "Certainly without any justification, but a concern that I have."

Justice O'Connor said that interference with an independent judiciary had allowed dictatorship to flourish in developing and Communist countries, Ms. Totenberg reported. "It takes a lot of degeneration before a country falls into dictatorship," Justice O'Connor said, according to Ms. Totenberg, "but we should avoid these ends by avoiding these beginnings."

Justice Ginsburg's speech, posted on the Supreme Court's Web site, focused on the citation of foreign law. She said that no one on the court contended that foreign decisions were binding precedents, only that they could illuminate common problems. Judges consult and cite all sorts of materials in making decisions, and she said she was perplexed that one category of potentially valuable information should be out of bounds.

She also discussed what she called "dynamic versus static, frozen-in-time constitutional interpretation," suggesting a preference for the former.

Mr. Hall, who is also the president of the State University of New York at Albany, said Justice Ginsburg's statements were "really quite remarkable in the history of the court."

"She is pressing for a view of the Constitution that is quite cosmopolitan, and she is using an out-of-country venue to make her point," Mr. Hall said.

Justice Ginsburg's comments may have been a response to Justice Antonin Scalia, who, in opinions and speeches, has rejected the view that the Constitution is a living document.

"You would have to be an idiot to believe that," Justice Scalia said in a speech in Puerto Rico last month, The Associated Press reported. "The Constitution is not a living organism. It is a legal document. It says some things and doesn't say others."

The dueling speeches, Mr. Hall said, represented "two Supreme Court justices arguing with each other off the bench."

Justice Ginsburg seemed to blame stalled Congressional measures that would have prohibited the citation of foreign law for the Internet death threat.

"Although I doubt the current measures will garner sufficient votes to pass, it is disquieting that they have attracted sizable support," she said. "And one not-so-small concern — they fuel the irrational fringe."

The threat, passed to the justices by a court security officer, was a February 2005 posting on an Internet chat site addressing unnamed "commandos."

DOJ_NMG_0019094

"Here is your first patriotic assignment," the message said. "Supreme Court Justices Ginsburg and O'Connor have publicly stated that they use foreign laws and rulings to decide how to rule on American cases. This is a huge threat to our Republic and constitutional freedom. If you are what you say you are, and NOT armchair patriots, then those two justices will not live another week."

Mr. Garrow said the threat was all the stranger because the stakes were trivial. "The odd thing is," he said, "that Justices Ginsburg and O'Connor are being attacked for their footnoting practices."

The death threat went nowhere, Justice Ginsburg said last month. Justice O'Connor, who will turn 76 this month, "remains alive and well," Justice Ginsburg, 73, said.

"As for me," she added, "you can judge for yourself."

Lobbyists Foresee Business As Usual (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Post-Abramoff Rules Expected to Be Merely a Nuisance

Some of Washington's top lobbyists say that they expect to find ways around congressional efforts to impose new restrictions on lobbyists' dealings with lawmakers in the wake of the Jack Abramoff corruption scandal, and that any limits will barely put a dent in the billions of dollars spent to influence legislation.

Though Congress may ultimately vote to eliminate a few of the more visible trappings of special pleading, such as gifts, free meals and luxurious trips, lobbyists say they have already found scores of new ways to buy the attention of lawmakers through fundraising, charitable activities and industry-sponsored seminars. An estimated $10 billion is spent annually to influence legislation and regulations, and that spending is not likely to be diminished by the proposed lobbying changes, these lobbyists contend.

"I wouldn't classify those changes as major," said Dan Danner, executive vice president of the National Federation of Independent Business. "Between charitable events and fundraising events, there will still be lots of ways to get in front of members [of Congress]."

Abramoff's guilty plea in January -- to charges of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials with lavish trips, luxury skybox fundraisers, meals and campaign contributions -- triggered a new push in Congress to rewrite the rules governing lobbying.

An emerging Senate bill, which has yet to be completed, would bar lawmakers from accepting meals and gifts such as sports tickets from registered lobbyists. The leading House measure, which has been proposed by GOP leaders, would rely more heavily on additional disclosures but would also impose a temporary ban on privately paid travel.

But many lobbyists said they consider these bills more of a nuisance than an impediment to their ability to work their will.

"Even if all lunches and sporting tickets are banned, legislation and regulations are so complex that the need for professional lobbyists will not diminish," said Frederick H. Graefe, a Washington lawyer and lobbyist.

"If meals are heavily restricted, we're likely to see executives from the home office picking up checks because they're not lobbyists," added J. Steven Hart of Williams & Jensen, a major lobbying firm. "And there are lots of other ways we can still get our cases before members of Congress."

Besides, experts said, industries and interest groups have turned to more sophisticated tactics in recent years, and such tactics are generally not addressed in the new bills on Capitol Hill. Lobbyists are increasing their campaign contributions, widening their use of the Internet to stir voter activism, and donating large sums to think tanks and charities affiliated with such big names as Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

The Business Roundtable, which represents big-business chieftains, has embraced a new technique of advertising on Web sites for grass-roots advocates. And organizations from the left and the right are increasingly offering meetings with top government officials in exchange for hefty dues.

Americans for Tax Reform, which is headed by conservative strategist Grover G. Norquist, invites contributors who give more than $15,000 a year to receptions and dinners, often at Norquist's home. Featured speakers have included Republicans such as Sens. George Allen (Va.), Chuck Hagel (Neb.) and Bill Frist (Tenn.), the majority leader.

Third Way, a group that devises policies for moderate Democrats, invites its $25,000-a-year donors (many of whom are lobbyists) to regular discussions around Washington that have spotlighted Democratic Sens. Thomas R. Carper (Del.), Evan Bayh (Ind.), Blanche Lincoln (Ark.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.).

The most important framework for lobbying clout -- campaign finance laws -- would not be altered in the Senate approach, while House GOP leaders have proposed putting limits on the contributions made to big-money independent groups known as 527s. But without Senate support, the effort to clamp down on the independent groups will fail.

As a result, lobbyists would still be able to contribute to lawmakers' coffers, host and organize major fundraising events, and arrange trips subsidized by their clients to encourage electoral giving -- just as they do now. Total federal giving in this election cycle is expected to rise by at least 20 percent, to more than $3 billion, compared with the 2002 midterm-election cycle, according to Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute.

Such campaign-related activities are "the most significant benefits lobbyists use to influence members of Congress," said Larry Noble, executive director of the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics.

The proposed ethics changes would not restrain the fastest growing part of lobbying: grass-roots activities. This ginning up of letters, telephone calls and, increasingly, e-mails from back home has become a $1 billion-a-year business, said Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), an activist for lobbying law changes.

Congress might require that such lobbying costs be disclosed but is not likely to limit them. In fact, lobbying in its many forms would continue unabated under the coming legislation.

In 2004, the most recent full year about which data are available, lobbying was a $10 billion industry, according to estimates by James A. Thurber, a political science scholar at American University. Of the total, $2.1 billion was used to pay the salaries of registered lobbyists, while the rest was spent on more subtle forms of persuasion.

Lobbying is done even at charity events. Lobbyists say privately that they are all but required to contribute to an annual dinner that helps low-income Roman Catholic schools in the District. The dinner is co-hosted each September by Boehner and Kennedy. Boehner has solicited contributions for the $10,000 tables, a request that lobbyists say they are loath to ignore.

"Some lobbyists might consider this a lobbying opportunity," said Michael L. Smith, the dinner's director. "But we see it as a very worthy charitable event."

The communications industry has its own lobbying-and-charity gala. Every December, the Federal Communications Bar Association fills the Washington Hilton's grand ballroom for a fancy dinner that raises money for D.C. schoolchildren and honors the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, which regulates the interests of the dinner's patrons.

At the 2004 Chairman's Dinner, FCC commissioners dined at an elaborately set table while then-Chairman Michael K. Powell gave a lengthy speech and showed a video about himself.

Interest groups also pay to participate in social activities, which double as lobbying venues. State societies, for example, offer lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists numerous opportunities for informal encounters.

The California State Society's fall 2005 newsletter featured a photograph of Rep. Ed Royce (R-Calif.) and former congressman Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), who is a lobbyist for an electric utility and a defense contractor. Both are active members.

According to its Web site, the society's Platinum ($10,000) corporate sponsors in 2005 included Fleishman-Hillard, a lobbying and public relations company, and Sallie Mae, a Virginia-based provider of student loans that lobbies in Washington.

Lawmakers and their staffers have lately reduced their social interactions, especially meals, with lobbyists in anticipation of a possible crackdown under a new law.

But interests will always find a way to be heard, lobbyists say. One is through think tanks. The Competitive Enterprise Institute, which widely publicizes its belief that the earth is not warming cataclysmically because of the burning of coal and oil, says Exxon Mobil Corp. is a "major donor" largely as a result of its effort to push that position.

"I think what attracted them to us was our position on global warming," said Sam Kazman, CEI's general counsel. "And we hope to get support from other industries that agree with us."

Lawmakers Holding Solid Seats Spend As If They Were Shaky (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Use of Campaign Treasuries Is Coming Under Scrutiny

Rep. Spencer Bachus hasn't drawn a serious opponent in the past three elections. So far, his only 2006 challenger is a write-in with $49 in the bank.

But the Alabama Republican burns through significant sums of campaign cash, as do plenty of other House members sitting in safe congressional seats. Among the items billed in 2005 to Bachus's campaign account and his "Growth and Prosperity" political action committee: $6,689 for U2 concert tickets and expenses as part of a campaign event; $1,298 in lodging in Vail, Colo.; and $270 for the catering of an "American Idol" party.

Rep. Corrine Brown (D-Fla.) spent $15,835 of campaign funds on condolence flowers for constituents, Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) used $8,328 of his campaign war chest to buy gifts for his staff, and Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) was reimbursed for a $1 "meal" at a local gas station, which his staff believes was bottled water.

DOJ_NMG_0019096

Some lawmakers say that such expenditures are routine and completely legal under Federal Election Commission rules. But these spending practices are beginning to attract attention from watchdog groups and the news media, as the 2006 congressional campaigns heat up and Congress considers measures to crack down on the perks of office.

A Washington Post review of more than 200 House campaign finance reports filed with the FEC for the past year found that lawmakers from safe districts demonstrated widely differing spending practices. The reports were compiled by PoliticalMoneyLine, an independent, nonpartisan campaign finance Web site.

According to those records, Rep. Mark Edward Souder, a six-term Indiana Republican who was reelected in 2004 with 69 percent of the vote, spent $45,027 in campaign operating funds last year. Most of the money went to cover phone charges, rent, payroll and catering for campaign events.

In contrast, Pence, whose congressional district adjoins Souder's to the south, spent $348,255 in 2005, plus $25,472 from his PAC, after winning a third term in 2004 with 67 percent support.

Pence sought reimbursement for 293 meals in 2005, for a total of $9,806. Most were at fast-food or family-style restaurants, including Wendy's, Arby's, Ruby Tuesday, and various pancake houses and pizza parlors, as well as convenience stores and airport concessions based in Anderson, Ind. Ninety-four of the charges totaled $10 or less. He also paid $4,082 for a 1998 Oldsmobile minivan that he drove throughout his east-central Indiana district.

"When Mike Pence campaigns, he campaigns as if he's in a tight race," said William A. Smith, Pence's chief of staff. He said that his boss prefers one-on-one meetings to big groups, which explains the numerous small charges, and that items are often billed to the campaign, as opposed to the official account, to avoid potential ethics questions. "If he's doing political work, that's going to be part of his campaign budget," Smith said.

Bachus spent $415,000 from his 2005 campaign and political action committee funds on meals, travel, entertainment and other election-related operations. He said he has no choice but to keep up the spending even without a serious challenger.

"Since the campaign registration season remains open in Alabama, I have no assurance at all I won't have serious competition again this year," he said in a statement. "It is only prudent I be prepared."

The government reimburses members for some nonpolitical expenses, such as traveling to and from their districts and attending official events, but the rules are fairly strict. In contrast, the FEC gives lawmakers broad discretion with campaign funds. As Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor who heads Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, an independent watchdog group, describes it, "as much as you can raise, you can spend."

For example, FEC rules state that campaign funds may be used "in connection with the campaign for federal office" but also "in connection with duties of the individual as a holder of federal office." Some items are specifically banned: home mortgages, clothing, personal automobile expenses, country club and health club memberships, vacations, household food, nonpolitical admissions to concerts and sporting events, and tuition.

Otherwise, candidates have a fair amount of leeway in how they spend the money they raise. "I think it's more personal than political," said Stanley Brand, a Democratic ethics lawyer. "Some people are more liberal about money." Some throw lavish fundraisers, Brand noted. "Some are looking for ways to underwrite their existence, and some aren't."

The National Republican Senatorial Committee has launched a Web site, http://www.fancyford.com , chronicling the Davidoff cigar gifts and exclusive hotel stays of Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), who is running to succeed retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). The Bergen Record recently tallied up $80,000 in Morton's steakhouse bills that Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) amassed over five years as a House member. Menendez was recently appointed to fill an open Senate seat and is battling for a full six-year term against GOP candidate Thomas H. Kean Jr.

Rep. Ralph M. Hall (R-Tex.), elected to a 13th term in 2004 with 68 percent support, submitted more than 100 meal receipts, many of which were for low-dollar charges from Sonic, IHOP, Chili's and Applebee's outlets. He was more generous with gifts for donors, billing his campaign for $13,235 in Godiva chocolates. "He has it in his head that people love Godiva chocolate," said Hall chief of staff Janet Perry Poppleton, who added that he used to give away hams.

Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy (D-R.I.), elected in 2004 to a sixth term with 64 percent, filed more than $500,000 in campaign and PAC operating expenses for 2005. He racked up the highest number of Starbucks charges for one year, submitting 24 receipts ranging from $2 to $12. Every purchase was made at the same Main Road Starbucks in Middletown, R.I., near the congressman's home. Kennedy spokeswoman Robin Costello said the location was a "convenient place for his campaign staff to meet."

Rep. John P. Murtha, a 17-term veteran from a solidly Democratic Pennsylvania district, reported $620,066 in campaign operating expenses. Nearly 250 items were related to driving, including $6,800 for gas, car washes and travel-related petty cash charges, and $6,500 to lease a 2003 Buick. Murtha spokeswoman Cynthia Abram said her boss is "very active in local politics" and attends fundraisers and other events for local candidates around his central Pennsylvania district throughout the year.

Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska), who was elected to a 17th term in 2004 with 72 percent support, filed one of the longest 2005 campaign expenditure reports, billing about $650,000 in total expenses to his campaign account and Midnight Sun PAC. Young listed $405 in snow-plowing charges, $300 to sponsor Miss Alaska, $345 for fishing licenses and $45 for a ladder. Myrna Maynard, office manager in Young's Anchorage office, said the ladder was needed because the ceiling lights are too high.

The $15,835 in flowers purchased by Brown, a seven-term incumbent who was uncontested in 2004, accounted for more than 10 percent of the total $123,243 Brown spent in 2005 on her campaign. Elias Ronnie Simmons, Brown's chief of staff, said her boss sends floral arrangements costing $60 to $80 apiece to the funerals of constituents. "You never think it's going to escalate like that," Simmons said.

"If you get in the habit of raising a lot of money, even if you don't have real races, the question is 'What are you going to do with it?' " said Fred Wertheimer, a longtime critic of political fundraising and spending and founder of Democracy 21, a nonpartisan group seeking campaign finance reform. "The fact is, there's just far more money in politics than anyone actually needs."

Losing Ground (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, March 19, 2006

A NEWSWEEK poll shows President Bush's approval rating dropping to new lows on domestic issues and rising public anger over Iraq and homeland security.

A bitterly divided electorate gives President George W. Bush an approval rating of only 36 percent in the latest NEWSWEEK poll, matching the low point in his presidency recorded last November. His image as an effective leader in the war on terror is tarnished, with less than half the public (44 percent) approving of the way he's handling terrorism and homeland security. Despite a series of presidential speeches meant to bolster support for the war in Iraq, as well as the announcement of a major military offensive when the poll was getting under way, only 29 percent of the people questioned approved Bush's handling of the situation in Iraq. Fully 65 percent disapprove.

The way the president has dealt with issues at home hasn't brought him much support either. His approval ratings for the handling of energy policy (28 percent) and health care (28 percent) were new lows, while approval on the economy (36 percent) mirrored his overall rating. The single area where President Bush accrued more approval than disapproval was in his appointments to the Supreme Court, which 47 percent approved.

The outright anger against Bush felt by many Americans was reflected in responses to questions about the effort of Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin to censure Bush in Congress for his warrantless wiretapping program. Feingold has found very little support for his move on the Hill. Four in 10 (42 percent) of the adults in the general public say they would support Congressional censure of the president, while half (50 percent) say they would not. Censure wins majority support from Democrats (60 percent) and one in five Republicans (20 percent) say they'd support it. Yet if Democrats in Congress do decide to push for such a measure, they may run into trouble with that same public. By a margin of 53 percent to 33 percent, Americans feel the censure proposal was made as a partisan ploy, not for reasons of principle.

In today's strongly polarized political climate, roughly one in four American adults (26 percent) say they think Congress should actually impeach President Bush and consider removing him from office. There is in fact no effort to do this on the Hill, and the public mood appears to be more a reflection of the passionate sentiment against Bush in some quarters rather than considered support for actual legislative action. (Some recent national polls show about 45 percent of adults strongly disapprove of the president's performance.) The NEWSWEEK poll shows that only 5 percent of Republicans would support impeaching Bush, while 94 percent would not. Among Democrats, almost half (49 percent) support impeachment, while 48 percent oppose it. Overall, 69 percent do not think Congress should consider removing him from office.

By comparison, the level of public support for impeachment today is below the 32 percent support for Bill Clinton's removal in October 1998, before he was impeached by the U.S. House of Representatives. Support for the impeachment of Richard M. Nixon had reached 52 percent in a June 1974 Harris poll shortly before he left office.

A much less radical response to sagging confidence in President Bush—a major staff shake-up in the White House—gets a mixed response from the public. While 40 percent think it is time for the president to clean house and ask some top people to leave, 48 percent think it is best to avoid making major changes to the White House staff at this time. Only 20 percent of Republicans favor a major staff shake-up, compared with 43 percent of Independents and 56 percent of Democrats. Unhappiness with President Bush's cabinet and staff apparently is not as great as dissatisfaction with the president himself.

All of this bodes ill for the Republicans as midterm congressional elections approach this fall, although some Democratic strategists are concerned that the censure resolution and impeachment talk may actually make for an unwanted distraction.

Registered voters continue to prefer Democratic candidates for Congress over GOP candidates by a margin of 50 percent to 39 percent.

This is the third of four NEWSWEEK polls taken since September 2005 showing the Democrats with a double-digit lead. The Democrats never had such an advantage in any NEWSWEEK poll conducted before the last two off-year Congressional elections, 2002 and 1998. The Democrats now lead in Congressional vote preferences of Independents by 47 percent to 31 percent. Key to the election outcome is whether the Democrats' big advantage with independent voters will be maintained and how many of these voters will actually turn out in November.

Both houses of Congress are now controlled by the Republicans, but public opinion now favors a Democratic takeover this November by a margin of 50 percent to 34 percent. Among Independents, the Democrats are preferred by more than a two-to-one margin: 51 percent to 22 percent.

Low as Bush's approval ratings are at the moment, three of the last six U.S. presidents actually had ratings below Bush's current score at some point in their presidencies. His father, George H.W. Bush, saw his rating decline to 29 percent in August 1992, amid growing economic woes. Jimmy Carter slipped to 28 percent in July 1979 and Richard Nixon plunged to 23 percent in January 1974, the year he resigned his office as a result of the Watergate scandal.

Survey Methodology

This poll was carried out by Princeton Survey Research Associates International. Results are based on telephone interviews with 1,020 adults, 18 and older, conducted March 16-17, 2005. Results are weighted so that the sample demographics match Census Current Population Survey parameters for gender, age, education, race, region, and population density. The overall margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3 percentage points for results based on total adults and plus or minus 4 for results based on 800 registered voters. Results based on smaller subgroups are subject to larger margins of sampling error. In addition to sampling error, the practical difficulties of conducting surveys can also introduce error or bias to poll results.

Bush's Approval Rating Stuck At 36%, Newsweek Poll Shows (BLOOM)

By Susan Decker

Bloomberg, March 19, 2006

March 18 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush's approval rating stands at 36 percent as voters expressed anger over the continued war in Iraq, according to a poll released today by Newsweek magazine.

The overall approval rating matches his standing in November, a record low for his presidency, and compares with 40 percent at the end of September, 2005, the magazine reported. Less than half, 44 percent of those polled, approved of how he's handling homeland security and terrorism issues compared with 57 percent a year ago.

The president's misfortune has translated into good news for Democrats, with 50 percent of registered voters polled saying they will back Democratic candidates, compared with 39 percent for Republicans. It's the third of four polls taken since September that show Democrats with a double-digit lead over Republicans. The question, Newsweek said, is whether the Democrats can maintain their strong lead among independent voters.

The poll showed that recent presidential speeches supporting the war in Iraq haven't improved the public's perception of the conflict. Two thirds of those polled, 65 percent, disapprove of how Bush is handling the war, and just 29 percent approve, the poll showed. As in other polls, Bush, a Republican, fared better among those of his own party than with Democrats.

Domestic Issues

On the domestic front, 58 percent disapproved of Bush's handling of energy issues and 62 percent disapprove of how he's dealt with health-care issues, with only 28 percent approving in each area, a new low in both cases. The poll showed 36 percent approved of his handling of the economy.

A bright spot for Bush is the Supreme Court. His choices of John Roberts and Samuel Alito met with approval from 47 percent of those polled. It was the only area where more people approved than disapproved, Newsweek said.

Wisconsin Senator's Russell Feingold's call for censure of the president was met with approval by 42 percent of those who were polled, while 50 percent disapproved of the Democrat's censure request. Those polled thought the censure call was based more on politics than principle, by a margin of 53 percent to 33 percent.

Just 26 percent would support taking the step of impeaching Bush, with 94 percent of Republicans opposing the idea and Democrats split, with 49 percent in favor and 48 percent opposed. Still, 69 percent overall oppose having him removed from office.

The poll, conducted by Princeton Survey Research Associates International, was based on telephone interviews with 1,020 adults conducted on March 16 and 17. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points for results based on total adults and plus or minus 4 for results based on 800 registered voters.

Dangerous Incompetence, Part II (BOS)

By Nina J. Easton

The Boston Globe, March 19, 2006

Republicans got a much-needed laugh last week when Senator Debbie Stabenow-- a Michigan Democrat whose seat the GOP is determined to nab this year -- launched an attack on the White House from the Senate floor. The snickers came when Stabenow's recounting of President Bush's failings was overshadowed by an unfortunate visual: She was wearing a red suit that matched a sign to her left reading DANGEROUSLY INCOMPETENT, suggesting that she, rather than the president, might have deserved the label.

A GOP aide quipped that Stabenow should wear that sign like a sandwich board. And Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, strolled into the Senate press gallery with a sign of his own held over his head: COMPETENCE.

Republicans don't seem to have much else to laugh about this election year.

The Democrats' sudden discipline at staying on message is beginning to score points in pubic opinion polls. The Pew Research Center's Andrew Kohut has reported that "incompetent" has replaced "honest" as the most frequent descriptor applied to Bush.

While the Democrats have used "incompetence" with increasing regularity since the administration's flat-footed response to Hurricane Katrina, the phrase "dangerous incompetence" is a recent invention of Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and his staff.

The one-time amateur boxer was eager to give the incompetence label "an edge," said a Reid aide, Jim Manley, and "dangerous" was the winning adverb, adding a flourish to the Democrats' new line of attack.

A couple of weeks ago, Reid strategists began inserting the words into talking points for press secretaries to the Senate's 44 Democrats. And during Reid's weekly Saturday afternoon huddle with Democratic senators scheduled to appear on the Sunday morning talk shows, he encouraged them to use the label to describe the White House.

"It's on the cutting edge of what's going on," Manley insisted.

A Kennedy campaigns in Boston

A Kennedy, candidate for US Senate, is planning a fund-raiser in Boston.

No, not that Kennedy. This is US Representative Mark Kennedy, Republican of Minnesota, who is on a mission to dilute the Kennedy name in the upper chamber.

The Minnesota Kennedy is drawing money and attention from Republicans nationally, including in Massachusetts, because his race is considered the GOP's best shot to pick up a US Senate seat. Kennedy is running to replace Mark Dayton, a Democrat who is retiring.

"We have almost nothing in common," Kennedy says of his relationship to Senator Edward M. Kennedy, "except that my grandmother was Rose Kennedy." Another Rose Kennedy, that is.

But the Minnesotan does share floor space on the US House, and a cordial relationship, with Rhode Island Representative Patrick J. Kennedy, Senator Kennedy's son. "Patrick and I are both third children of the youngest of four sons of Rose Kennedy," he says.

On a family visit to the US Capitol, when his son was mistakenly handed a tag identifying him as Patrick Kennedy's son, the house's other Kennedy said his boy should have kept it: "Patrick's in better shape to pay for your college."

For Kerry, Imus gets his Irish up

During the 2004 presidential campaign, MSNBC radio and TV personality Don Imus was a vocal supporter of John F. Kerry, sharing stories of the Massachusetts senator's visits to the Imus ranch. But after Kerry's loss, some of the bloom has come off that political rose.

On St. Patrick's Day, Imus -- broadcasting from Boston -- invited Kerry on his show for some respectful discourse on issues of the day.

But minutes after the senator left the air, the irascible Imus ridiculed Kerry. "If I was his adviser," Imus proclaimed, "I'd tell him he's just got to loosen up. . . . Man, talk English!"

Bid to reverse a Romney role model

As he tests the presidential waters, Governor Mitt Romney is eagerly courting the conservative wing of the Republican Party. So it was curious that in a C-SPAN interview airing tonight, he dwelled on Dwight D. Eisenhower -- a moderate-- as one of his favorite presidents.

DOJ_NMG_0019100

"I looked at what he did in the White House and the character and integrity he brought to the White House and said, that's a man I respect," Romney told C-SPAN's Brian Lamb. "I grew up when he was president. He's my first memory of president, 1952 election. I remember that, you know, 'I like Ike' slogan."

And, Romney continued, Eisenhower "was a person you did like and you respected as an individual. Now he did some important things as well. The whole idea of building an interstate highway system and investing in infrastructure turned out to be enormously powerful. . . . Staring down the Russians. . . . But it's his contribution as a man, as a father, as a husband, as a person of integrity that I most respect."

Romney strategists eyeing a Republican presidential primary fight might coach the governor to use every opportunity he can find to wax eloquent over a different Republican president: Ronald Reagan. To the conservatives who dominate GOP primaries, Eisenhower is considered, in hard-right parlance, a "squish."

'I Hope That I've Made A Difference' (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 19, 2006

U.S. Rep. Martin Sabo bids tearful farewell to public office. He leaves with a pledge to continue his causes and a lament over political polarization.

Rochelle Olson, Star Tribune U.S. Rep. Martin Sabo, the stoic, gentle giant of Minnesota politics, broke into tears Saturday as he announced plans to retire after 46 years in elective office, the last 28 in Congress.

"I've decided it's time to move on," Sabo said. "In my gut, I know the time is right. It's time to open the door for a new generation of leadership."

Sabo, 68, said he will continue to work for peace, responsible budget policies, civil rights and civil liberties.

"I want to see more of the grandchildren," he said in Minneapolis. The baseball fan plans to attend more Twins games, play more golf and travel the country. "Some fall, I'd love to drive up to New England and see the leaves," he said.

When asked, Sabo cited no particular reason for the timing of his decision, only seven weeks before the May 7 DFL endorsing convention for the Fifth District congressional seat. He said his health and energy levels are good. Sabo quit smoking cold turkey two years ago after 45 years of a two-pack-a-day habit.

His action leaves prospective candidates little time to organize for the DFL convention. The endorsee is expected to become the prohibitive favorite in the race in the strongly DFL district, which includes Minneapolis and a number of inner-ring suburbs.

Many potential candidates remained noncommittal Saturday while Sabo gave a farewell speech filled with gratitude and a touch of criticism. He left most of the praising to others. "I hope that I've made a difference over the years," he said as his wife, Sylvia, daughters Karin Mantor and Julie Sabo and young grandchildren stood behind him.

Voice cracks, eyes fill

Sabo's voice cracked for the first of many times and his eyes filled when he talked about how he had been in public office since 1960, the first 18 years as a member of the Minnesota House. "When you've been running every two years for 46 years, the normal thing is to just keep doing it," he said in explaining the suddenness of his announcement.

He thanked Minnesotans who welcomed a North Dakota farm boy to Minneapolis 50 years ago to attend Augsburg College. "Being able to serve Minnesota has been an unimaginable dream," he said.

He offered the most praise to Wendell Anderson, whom he called the state's "greatest governor." Sabo, who was speaker of the state House for six years, said he's proud of his work on the "Minnesota Miracle" of the 1970s, which shifted the burden for public school funding from local property taxes to increased state taxes.

As former chairman of the U.S. House Budget Committee, he said he was also proud of the 1993 budget, which he said led to the first surpluses in three decades and the largest economic expansion in history.

"But these historic accomplishments also remind us that progress can be reversed. Elections do matter," he said.

Sabo said he is most concerned now about the "fiscal mess" the country is in because of what he called the "irresponsible and reckless budget policies" of the Bush administration. "We are bankrupting the country and leaving mountains of debt for our children and grandchildren," Sabo said.

He said a fundamental problem in politics today "are people who over-promise and overstate. I've tried to do the opposite."

Sabo, who praised his Democratic colleagues from Minnesota as well as GOP Rep. Jim Ramstad, lamented a growing political polarization. "I don't recall ever making a public statement critical of my colleague whether it's a Democrat or a Republican," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0019101

Jim Adams was in the state House and door-knocked with Sabo in the early days. "I retired after 20 years. It was a big relief for me. It was a big relief for him," said Adams.

Sabo will serve out his term, which ends in January. Sylvia Sabo said the couple will sell their home in Washington and live permanently in their condo in Minnesota.

Candidate list forming

State Rep. Keith Ellison, DFL-Minneapolis, Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer, a college professor, and DFL Minneapolis City Council Member Gary Schiff already are in the race to succeed Sabo.

Green Party member Jay Pond also is in, as are Republicans Tim Anderson and James Turnham.

Former DFL Hennepin County Commissioner Mark Andrew and former state Sen. Ember Reichgott Jung, DFL-New Hope, also said they are interested. State Sen. Satveer Chaudhary, DFL-Fridley, and state Rep. Connie Bernardy, DFL-Fridley, said they are thinking about a run. Sabo's longtime chief of staff, Michael Erlandson, and Julie Sabo said they wouldn't talk about their plans Saturday.

Hennepin County Board Members Gail Dorfman and Mike Opat also are considering a run.

State Sens. Scott Dibble and Linda Berglin, both DFL-Minneapolis, said they would not run.

A New Spring In The Market's Step? (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Spring came early to Wall Street last week, as both the stock and bond markets rallied, fears of inflation ebbed and the economy headed toward the finish of one of the strongest quarters in more than three years.

The blue-chip Dow Jones industrial average and the S&P 500 indexes both reached their highest levels since May 2001. The Dow has now been above the 11,000 mark for most of the last month, suggesting to some analysts that a new "floor" has been reached in a bull market that still has a way to run. And the broader S&P 500 index broke through 1300 early in the week. Only the tech-heavy Nasdaq lagged behind, reflecting a growing consensus that tech stocks have become too frothy and raced too far ahead of the business fundamentals.

Stocks were buoyed during the week by stable oil prices and boffo profit reports from three of Wall Street's biggest investment houses. Shares in Goldman Sachs, the second largest security firm, rose more than 6 percent for the week after reporting that its quarterly earnings jumped 64 percent. Lehman Brothers and Bear Stearns also posted strong increases. Other reports suggested continued strength in consumer confidence and industrial production.

The major factor in the week's market activity was a changing consensus about inflation, and how the Federal Reserve would respond to it. As late as last week, bond market futures reflected an expectation that the Fed would raise short-term rates three more times this spring, to 5.25 percent, to help cool down an economy that looked to be growing at an unsustainable annual rate of 5 percent.

But a government report showed a modest -- and unexpectedly low -- 0.1 percent increase in consumer prices in February, even after factoring in energy and food prices. At the same time, some Fed officials were heard to express confidence that the economy would cool down on its own later this year, as some of the steam is let out of the housing bubble. All of this led expectations to shift in favor of a two-move, 5 percent target on the Fed's benchmark short-term interest rate. Bond prices rose in response, and the yield on the closely watched 10-year Treasury bond drifted down to 4.67 percent, a decline of 8 basis points for the week.

When they weren't tuning in to the NCAA basketball tournament, Wall Street traders and analysts could be heard talking about "soft landings" or a "Goldilocks economy" -- neither too hot nor too cold. Playing out in the background has been a steady flow of corporate mergers and takeovers at premium prices that give confidence to momentum investors. Furthermore, the ease with which many of these highly leveraged deals are financed suggests to the bond market that there is still so much money sloshing around the global financial system that any sudden backup in interest rates is highly unlikely.

Stocks Rally To Best Week Yet Of '06 (NYT)

By Jeff Sommer

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

It was the best week for stocks since the beginning of the year, as several economic reports suggested that inflation was under control while economic growth remained strong. The Dow Jones industrial average and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index both ended the week at fresh five-year highs.

On Thursday, the Labor Department reported that the Consumer Price Index rose only 0.1 percent in February after a 0.7 percent increase the previous month.

DOJ_NMG_0019102

Wall Street firms themselves helped lead the market higher. Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers Holdings and Bear Stearns all reported record earnings. Shares of Goldman Sachs rose more than 6 percent for the week.

Shares of North Fork Bancorp, which agreed to be bought by the Capital One Financial Corporation for $14.6 billion, rose nearly 15 percent for the week.

For the week, the Dow industrials rose 203.31 points, or 1.8 percent, to close at 11,279.65. The S.& P. 500 climbed 25.67 points, or 2 percent, to close at 1,307.25. The Nasdaq composite index gained 44.44 points, or 2 percent, to close at 2,306.48.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note slipped to 4.67 percent from 4.72 percent the previous week. JEFF SOMMER

Stocks Blow Past previous highs (WP)

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

With the economy tootling along and fear of inflation fading, the stock market reached new highs last week.

The Dow Jones industrial average advanced 203 points to 11,279.65. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 26 points, to 1307.25. The Nasdaq Stock Market composite index climbed 44 points, to 2306.48.

The gains were the biggest since the first week of the year for the Dow and the S&P, which last week cruised past their previous peaks and now are trading at their highest levels since the summer of 2001.

Tech stocks still lag, but the Nasdaq is just 25 points shy of the high it reached earlier this year. If it can return to that level, it too will be trading at a four-year high.

The market benefited this week from a new Wall Street consensus on interest rates. The Federal Reserve will boost rates only another half of a percentage point, most economists now are saying. That light at the end of the tunnel is what traders want to see -- even if it might be a mirage.

MARKET BEAT (LAT)

By Tom Petruno

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Investors Aren't Scaring Easily

The Dow is up 5.2% this year, its best start since 1999. A steady economy is trumping other issues.

Market Beat

March 19, 2006

Something may come along to scare the U.S. stock market down from its current heights. But it may have to be a problem people haven't seen before.

The usual suspects seem to be losing their ability to frighten investors. That's often a good sign for a bull market's staying power.

The blue-chip Dow Jones industrial average is up 5.2% this quarter, its best start to a year since 1999.

Much of the rest of the U.S. market is doing as well or better, which should translate into some happy returns on investors' first-quarter financial statements.

The advance in share prices lifted the Dow last week to its highest level since 2001 and some broader indexes, such as the small-stock Russell 2,000 and the New York Stock Exchange composite, to record highs.

It's true that the U.S. market is a laggard compared with the gains racked up this year in many foreign markets. That was the case last year as well.

Still, this probably is a better beginning to 2006 than many investors had expected. If this pace continues, the Dow will be up more than 20% for the year.

You won't find many people on Wall Street who believe that kind of gain is achievable, however. A Bloomberg News survey last week of seven big brokerages found the average forecast was for a Dow of 11,785 at year-end, which would be a 10% full-year gain. That would mean a 4.5% rise from Friday's closing level of 11,279.65.

What would it take to make this a 20% kind of year? The temptation is to say, "Everything has to go right." But then, the Dow has gone a quarter of that distance with plenty going wrong this year.

Oil prices are higher than they were on Jan. 1, and so are long-term bond yields. The trade deficit is up. Congress is rattling the protectionist saber. The housing market is slowing.

More risks loom. The dollar is weakening again, Iraq might yet plunge into civil war, and bird flu could arrive in the U.S. any day.

Yet none of this has been enough to undermine the equity market this quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0019103

Maybe investors simply have grown tired of worrying about the ups and downs of oil and bond yields. The shock value is waning.

Or maybe the potential negatives are being trumped by one overriding positive: The U.S. economy is in good shape. The Federal Reserve said as much last week in its latest summary of regional economic conditions, the so-called beige book report.

The Fed said most of its 12 district banks characterized the pace of economic expansion as "moderate or steady" in January and February. Importantly, it said that "employment continued to increase in most locations and in many sectors of the economy."

That jibes with the government's report on March 10 that the economy created a net 243,000 jobs in February, the second-best monthly gain in the last 12 months.

Decent job growth has been the missing element of this expansion since 2001. If that tide is turning, it could underpin the next phase of economic growth. More jobs mean more households, more household income, and, eventually, more spending.

Wall Street also is betting on continued good times for the industrial sector of the economy, which is turning out the commodities and heavy machinery that are in demand in many emerging-market countries.

This year's rally in the Standard & Poor's 500 index, which is up 4.7% since Dec. 31, has been led by stocks of companies such as grain processor Archer-Daniels-Midland Inc. (up 43% year to date), machinery titan Caterpillar Inc. (up 32%, making it the hottest stock in the Dow index) and railroad Union Pacific Corp. (up 13%).

Union Pacific last week raised its earnings forecast for the current quarter by more than 20%, in part citing growth in commodity hauling.

They may lack the glamour of the technology leaders of the late 1990s, but grimy industrial stocks are getting the job done in people's portfolios in this bull market. Since the end of 2002, Caterpillar's stock is up 233% and Union Pacific is up 52%.

Semiconductor giant Intel Corp., by contrast, is up 25%.

John Kosar, head of Asbury Research in suburban Chicago and a longtime analyst of stock and bond market trends, doesn't take much comfort in the leadership of industrial shares.

Without a strong rally by tech issues the market's advance this year won't be sustained, he contends.

Historically, "If tech doesn't lead, the market doesn't go up very much," Kosar said. "When stocks really are doing well, people want to ride the fastest horses," and that's often tech shares, he said.

The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index, which ended at 2,306.48 on Friday, remains below its five-year high of 2,331.36 reached Jan. 11.

Kosar says the broad market is likely to trip soon, although he isn't sure what the catalyst might be to take it down.

Let's say he's right. A market correction may well be overdue, given stocks' gains since October. (Although bearish analysts were arguing the same thing at the start of the year.)

But one highly anticipated event could make any sell-off short-lived: The Federal Reserve may be nearing the end of its credit-tightening campaign.

Many on Wall Street expect Fed policymakers to announce at either their May or June meetings that they are pausing after lifting their key short-term rate from 1% in mid-2004 to the current 4.5%. (A rate increase to 4.75% at the March 28 meeting seems all but certain.)

How would investors likely react to the prospect of even a temporary halt to the Fed's rate increases at, say, the 5% level?

Some surely would rush to buy long-term Treasury bonds to lock in yields.

But if the Fed stopped, and if confidence remained high that the economy wasn't at risk of falling into recession, that almost certainly would be an invitation for investors to take on more risk in search of higher returns. The stock market would be a logical destination for those investors.

In effect, the Fed would be removing a restraint that has held the U.S. market back since the beginning of 2004, when it became obvious that rock-bottom interest rates were going away.

"When people believe with confidence that the Fed is done, equities will probably be the primary beneficiary," said Anthony Karydakis, chief U.S. economist at JPMorgan Asset Management in New York.

Consider what happened in Britain in 2004 and 2005. The Bank of England raised its benchmark rate from 3.5% in October 2003 to 4.75% by August 2004. It then went on hold.

The FTSE-100 index of British blue-chip stocks rose 9% from the date of the bank's August 2004 meeting to the end of that year. It then jumped 17% in 2005.

With so many short-term traders in markets worldwide, it isn't hard to imagine that U.S. stocks would attract a mountain of money once it was clear that the Fed was pausing, if the economic outlook remained upbeat.

How long that money would stay, and how high it might be willing to bid share prices, are anyone's guess.

DOJ_NMG_0019104

But if the Fed in fact is nearly done, the stock market's performance this quarter could just be an opening act to a surprisingly good year.

The March Of The Bears May Only Be Starting (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

TRADERS may not have much data to worry about this week, thanks to a calendar that is light on economic reports and earnings. So maybe this is a good time to focus on how they feel, instead.

Some analysts do precisely that — study the mood on Wall Street — and their conclusion is that investors do not feel so hot. Popular gauges of sentiment toward stocks show extreme bearishness, at least by the standards of the last few years, even with the market hitting new highs.

"The equity market is climbing a wall of worry right now," David Rosenberg, an economist at Merrill Lynch, said in a note to clients. He cited a recent edition of the widely followed survey of investment newsletter writers by Investors Intelligence, which recorded the highest level of bearishness since April 2003 and the least bullishness since August 2004.

Mr. Rosenberg sees reason to cheer such comparative despondency. After those prior two milestones, he said, "the S.& P. 500 managed to take off in the ensuing two to three months." His advice is to take the survey readings "as signs that there is a lot of bad news already being discounted" in stock prices.

But Louise Yamada, head of Louise Yamada Technical Research Advisors, warned investors not to get their hopes up just yet. Bad news can be infectious, she said.

"Once the market letter-writers begin to turn bearish, there is a slow progression," she said. "Those early writers advise their clients, who lighten positions, the effect of which on stocks leads more letter writers to turn more cautious."

As the next wave of advisers turns gloomy, their followers begin to sell, and on and on. "So if the bearish writers continue to move up in numbers," Ms. Yamada said, "there can be a cascade effect on equities."

Eventually, there are so many bears that few have retained their holdings, and the market goes back up. But bearishness has been moderate during the last couple of years, she said, "so if this initial increase continues, the progression would just be beginning."

And Mr. Rosenberg acknowledged that there were reasons to feel pessimistic these days, including the inability of oil to stay below $60 a barrel; avian flu; trade skirmishes with China; and the potential for falling home prices.

"The bottom line is that there are legitimate things to be concerned about," he said.

DATA WATCH The report on February producer prices due Tuesday is forecast in a Bloomberg News poll of economists to show a 0.3 percent decrease; excluding food and energy prices, a 0.1 percent increase is predicted.

Orders for durable goods, often a volatile statistic, are expected to record a turnaround, rising 1.4 percent in February after a 9.9 percent decline in January.

Rice Seeks To Balance China's Power (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

PAGO PAGO, American Samoa, March 18 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held talks on Saturday with Japan and Australia to deepen a three-way regional alliance aimed in part at balancing the spreading presence of China.

At the same time, American officials said the United States was also looking at the meeting of top envoys of the three countries in Sydney, Australia, as a means to draw Japan into improving relations with neighboring countries still suspicious of its intentions 60 years after World War II.

Heading toward the end of what aides said would be one of the longest trips by a secretary of state, Ms. Rice joined with the foreign ministers Alexander Downer of Australia and Taro Aso of Japan in welcoming China's "constructive engagement" in East Asia. Australian and American officials acknowledge, however, that the phrase understates the Chinese sphere of influence.

"The tenor of the discussion was how to make China a positive force in the region," said Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, briefing reporters on the secretary's plane to American Samoa for refueling. He said the discussion was an effort to add to the web of American alliances in the area, to enhance stability and not threaten China.

Nevertheless, in Indonesia earlier in the week and then in Australia, where Ms. Rice spent nearly three days, she was repeatedly asked by the local news media about American intentions toward China, which has signed an array of economic deals with countries on its rim.

At a news conference in Sydney on Thursday, Ms. Rice reinforced those concerns, criticizing China's military buildup, economic policies and human rights record. Asked if China would see Ms. Rice's trip as a cause for concern, another senior official, speaking anonymously under briefing ground rules, said, "I think we certainly hope so."

Ms. Rice's visit to Australia, from Wednesday night to Saturday afternoon, was long compared with other stops. But American officials said Australia, an ally that has sent forces to Iraq and Afghanistan, had been feeling neglected, and Australian leaders appealed for Ms. Rice to do some public diplomacy to prop up the sagging American image.

U.S. Confers With Allies On China Energy Efforts (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia -- The United States, Japan and Australia yesterday discussed China's "aggressive" buying of energy assets in Africa and Latin America, the first time China's "energy diplomacy" has been examined at an official international forum.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the foreign ministers of Japan and Australia, Taro Aso and Alexander Downer, were unable to agree on steps to address the issue.

"It was a constructive conversation over China's role in the region and its future role in the world, and how to make China a positive force within the international system," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters traveling with Miss Rice.

He said the meeting had not been a "finger-wagging" anti-China session, but he acknowledged that Beijing's dealings with problematic states -- whose actions are often referred to the U.N. Security Council, where China has veto power -- were part of the discussions.

The trio did not agree on a solution to the problem, which has been most evident in Beijing's reluctance to support U.N. action against Sudan over atrocities in its Darfur region, Mr. McCormack said.

Yesterday's session had worried China, but U.S. and Australian officials insisted there was no conspiracy against the world's most-populous nation.

"We welcomed China's constructive engagement in the region and concurred on the value of enhanced cooperation with other parties," such as the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and South Korea, the ministers said in a joint statement.

"Supporting the emergence and consolidation of democracies and strengthening cooperative frameworks in the Asia-Pacific region was a particular focus of our attention," they said.

Mr. Downer said China should not feel that the three allies are "ganging up" on it.

Earlier in the week, Miss Rice sought to assure Beijing that Washington's efforts to solidify its alliances with Japan and Australia, and to build up India and Indonesia as formidable Asian powers are not aimed at encircling China with pro-U.S. states.

At the same time, she voiced concern over China's 14 percent increase in its defense budget this year to about $35 billion.

In a separate meeting with Mr. Aso yesterday, Miss Rice asked him "to reconsider the total ban on beef imports" from the United States that Japan has imposed, Mr. McCormack said.

Japan's Kyodo news agency quoted Japanese officials in Sydney as saying that Miss Rice told Mr. Aso that reinstating the ban on U.S. beef was an excessive reaction after a U.S. meat-packing plant mistakenly shipped banned spinal materials in a batch of meat to Japan in January.

Just a month earlier, Tokyo had lifted a previous two-year ban on U.S. beef imports imposed because of mad cow disease fears.

A third case of mad cow disease in the United States was discovered last week, while Japan confirmed on Friday it had found its 24th case and the first in a beef cow.

Miss Rice and Mr. Aso also discussed the repositioning of U.S. forces in Japan.

Rice Finishing 10-Day, 31,263-Mile Trip (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, March 19, 2006

Condoleezza Rice is flying around the world — and then some. Whether she breaks a record by a secretary of state will have to wait for a thoughtful assessment free of jet lag.

Rice finishes a 10-day, 31,263-mile odyssey on Sunday that took her to three continents. She crossed four oceans and the international dateline twice. A trip around the world at the equator is only about 25,000 miles.

DOJ_NMG_0019106

Her diplomatic tour of Chile, Indonesia and Australia probably breaks Madeleine Albright's 1997 record for the most miles flown by a secretary of state on a single trip, although State Department spokesman Sean McCormack could not say for sure.

The Rice trip included a punishing, 23-hour slog that may set its own State Department record for most continuous miles. She flew from Santiago, Chile, to Windhoek, Namibia to refuel her plane, to Mauritius to refuel again, and then to Jakarta, Indonesia.

That's a strange hopscotch across the Southern Hemisphere. The Air Force, which operates Rice's Air Force Two plane, insists it's faster than a more direct route because of favorable winds.

There were some odd moments along the 60-hour journey around the world.

Bolivian President Evo Morales gave Rice a musical instrument shellacked with coca leaves. The gift stayed behind in Santiago, Chile, where Rice and Morales were attending the inauguration of Chilean President Michelle Bachelet. Coca growing is legal in Bolivia, even if the ultimate use of much of the crop is not.

"There was some question about the legal regulations" imposed by the U.S. Customs Department, McCormack said. "She was very pleased to receive it," he offered, well, diplomatically.

In Windhoek, the tarmac was carpeted with beetles drawn by the lights required for Rice's middle-of-the-night arrival. Really, really big beetles. She did not get off the plane and thus missed the local fauna.

The Windhoek airport is reported to be the site of a secret U.S.-run detention center for terrorism suspects. Reporters who ventured to the darkened edge of the tarmac, in sight of a string of low, nondescript buildings, met a muscular guard with a gun who materialized from the darkness.

A huge and eerily beautiful moon hung over the scene, beetles and all.

In Mauritius, some in Rice's party boarded a bus for a quick, delightful trip to a beach while the plane was refueled and the Air Force switched crews.

In Indonesia, Rice toured an Islamic elementary school that receives U.S. funding. Announcing an $8.5 million grant to bring "Sesame Street" to Indonesia, Rice posed with an actor dressed head to toe in a red, furry Elmo suit.

In Sydney, Australia, Rice got a little rattled by anti-war protesters who interrupted her during a speech. "Sir, do you have something you'd like to say?" Rice asked a young man who called her a war criminal.

"Iraqi blood is on your hands and you can't wash that blood away," he shouted over and over until guards led him away.

Rice had a comeback, noting that democracy is alive and well both in Sydney and in Baghdad, but her voice grew thin.

For a woman who habitually rises at 4:30 a.m. to exercise and bounds into her office two hours later, Rice's trip had a relaxed feel.

Rice actually played the tourist for the first time in her 14-month tenure as the top U.S. diplomat.

She took in a boxing match and several swimming events at the Commonwealth Games in Melbourne, Australia, near the end of the trip. She hung medals around the necks of three Australian swimmers and chatted with swim star Ian Thorpe.

She looked like she was having fun.

What do you do for 60 hours on an airplane? Work, eat, read, sleep, eat some more. And listen to your iPod.

Most of Rice's staff and traveling party were equipped with the popular digital music devices, with tastes ranging from Vivaldi to Tupac.

Rice senior adviser Jim Wilkinson offered a tour of his iPod: Def Leppard, Kid Rock, Kanye West. Speechwriter Chris Brose listens to Spoon, Rufus Wainwright and Miles Davis.

Reading material for reporters and aides ranged from "Assassin's Gate," George Packer's account of the early phase of Iraq reconstruction, to Truman Capote's "In Cold Blood." Rice was reading Doris Kearns Goodwin's new biography of Abraham Lincoln.

"When you fly 60 hours, at some point everyone goes mad," Wilkinson said. "You just pray that it happens at different times along the way."

World Scrambles To Feed China's Appetite For Metal (LAT)

By Don Lee, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

YONGKANG, China — About once a month, Ying Guangwu tucks some cash inside his black shirt, slings a knapsack over his back, and hits the road.

DOJ_NMG_0019107

The square-jawed 33-year-old doesn't always know where he's headed or when he'll return. But he knows exactly what he's looking for: tons of scrap metal.

A pen-shaped magnet in his pocket helps him determine the quality of some metals. In December, Ying spent two weeks in Guangdong province, a 20-hour bus ride away, rummaging through factory warehouses and scrap yards. He bought 10 tons of tin ingots, lead cables and imported scrap, shipping them by truck to his wife, Lin Li. She sorted the stuff inside their two-story home before reselling it to metal traders and recyclers in town.

Ying and Lin, high school graduates, earned about $25,000 last year — more than what many Chinese doctors and lawyers make.

"I didn't want to do this when I was young. It seemed stupid to me," says the second-generation scrap collector, whose sunburned face bears the mark of 10 years on China's dusty streets. But his father took the right path, Ying says. "This is turning trash into treasure."

China's voracious appetite for metals is convulsing the world. It has led to economic booms in some nations and crime waves in others by so-called urban miners who steal metals from houses and public buildings. China's runaway economy needs the metals to build railroads, office towers, cars and appliances.

The Middle Kingdom is now the world's biggest consumer of copper, lead, zinc, iron ore, steel and aluminum.

China's hunger has boosted mineral-rich nations, from copper-laden Chile to Australia, which has vast iron deposits. Prices of new and used lead, copper, nickel and other metals have tripled or more in the last few years, triggering a worldwide scramble for the commodities.

Chinese state-owned mining companies are prowling the planet for fresh supplies, while armies of people such as Ying and Lin spend their days hunting for castaway metals from typewriter letterheads to 30-foot-long aluminum missile casings.

Nowhere in China is the craving for metals more evident than Yongkang. This landlocked city in southeastern China's Zhejiang province calls itself the hardware capital. With a population of about 530,000, Yongkang boasts about 10,000 hardware businesses, nearly all of them private family enterprises.

Yongkang is legendary for itinerant tinkerers who mended pots and pans for a living. Today, countless homes, storefronts, junkyards and factories carry on that tradition, buying, selling and recycling more than 600,000 tons of scrap metal every year. The city's streets teem with tractors, trucks and bicycles hauling metal rods, coils and sheets.

Many head for Yongkang's scrap-metal market, an outdoor bazaar slightly smaller than the Los Angeles Convention Center. More than 400 garage-sized storefronts are filled with scrap collected around the world: crushed beer cans from Japan, fuel pumps and used car parts from the West, air-conditioning condensers from northeastern China.

On a recent afternoon, Ying Sufang sat stooped outside Store No. 287, meticulously separating printers' lead pieces no bigger than grains of rice.

The lead was shipped to her by her husband, who was foraging for scrap about 1,000 miles away — not far from the Vietnam border. Last year, Ying and her husband earned more than $7,000, their best take in 10 years.

"That's not bad," the 44-year-old said.

But it has come at a price. Ying, who is unrelated to Ying Guangwu, grumbles about the grimy, sometimes punishing work.

She has never become accustomed to her husband being away for long stretches. He has been gone for the last month, leaving her and their middle-school daughter at home.

"I chose this business because 60% to 70% of people in our village are doing this," she said. "This is how we make money…. I don't know what else to do."

Across the Pacific, George Adams is also cashing in on one of the greatest commodity booms in modern times. He is the president of Adams Steel, a scrap metal dealer in Anaheim that shreds used cars, washing machines and dryers down to the size of a wallet. The crushed metal is loaded onto trucks and containers that are shipped to traders around the world. Much of it winds up in China, in the hands of millions of scrap traders like those in Yongkang.

Adams' annual sales now exceed $100 million. Last year he bought scrap yards in Southern California, installed more shredding equipment and added 70 employees to boost his workforce to 500.

He has a lot of competition. Thieves have ripped apart ballpark fences in Des Moines and stripped copper from cathedral domes in Cleveland. In Buenos Aires, people have made away with bronze plaques on boulevards and copper wires from utility companies. And in England, India and Malaysia, tens of thousands of manhole covers have vanished.

"They're taking copper out of brand-new houses in Southern California," says Carl Clark, Adams Steel's plant manager. Such stolen copper pipes and wires don't need to be recycled; they are bundled together and sold to brokers who send them all over the world, where they fetch triple the prices of a few years ago.

"An actual copper penny today is worth more as scrap than its face value," Clark says.

DOJ_NMG_0019108

The crime spree has resulted in deaths as people have fallen down manholes, and has caused such concern that countries like Argentina placed restrictions on the export of scrap metals.

The price of iron ore, a major ingredient in steel, jumped 71% in the last year alone, sharply cutting steel producers' margins. But with China accounting for one-fourth of the world's steel production last year — and half of all iron ore imports — Beijing is demanding that iron ore exporters put a lid on prices.

"The Chinese are flexing their market power," says Ruth Stroppiana, an economist at Moody's economy.com in Sydney, Australia. "The China factor," she adds, "has been absolutely huge" for Australia, Brazil, Chile and other resource-rich nations.

Chinese towns such as Yongkang also have benefited, although the metal boom has taken a heavy toll on China's environment and workers. Pollution-spewing metal factories have tainted rivers and land.

In Yongkang, officials have shut down dozens of the 1,000-plus smelters in the city, say plant managers. Authorities also have toughened rules governing imported scrap metals — prohibiting car motors containing oil, for example, says Du Huanzheng, a metals expert at Zhejiang Institute of Industry and Commerce.

Still, China's imports of scrap metal surged nearly 30% last year, Du says, and the trend is not likely to abate soon, least of all in Yongkang.

Ying Zhiang's family has been in the scrap metal business for several generations. He is no relation to Ying Guangwu or to Ying Sufang. About 20 years ago, Ying collected scrap as he traveled the country fixing scales for merchants. "Even though products can get old and useless, the metal in them still has value," he says.

Now 52, Ying runs Yongya Copper Industrial Co., one of China's leading copper producers and recyclers. His Yongkang-based company ships 100 tons of the metal a day. He buys most of his scrap copper from dealers in town and the nearby port city of Taizhou, which is also known as Linhai.

In Yongya's warehouse, workers in red caps moved bales of scrap wire, and others in street clothes picked up small bits of loose copper on the ground. Ying says he is considering collecting scrap himself again, because prices have soared beyond belief. A decade ago, he was buying a metric ton of copper in China for about $625. Now it costs about 10 times that amount.

"The numbers are out of this world," he says.

Deep In China, A Poor And Pious Muslim Enclave (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

DONGXIANG, China — No, the old man answered, standing in his bare home deep in a mountain ravine, he had never seen an airplane. The man, Tie Yongxiang, has never watched television, either. He listened to the pop quiz and seemed pleased when he could answer the last question in the affirmative.

China? Had he ever heard of it?

"I know what China is," said Mr. Tie, 68. "It is a country run by people who are supposed to be helping us."

"Us," as Mr. Tie puts it, are the Dongxiang people, an ethnic group that has lived for eight centuries in the dry, forbidding mountains that make this county in Gansu Province one of the most isolated places in China.

The most recent census found 513,000 Dongxiang people in China, and an overwhelming majority live in and around Dongxiang County. Of the 25 townships in the county, 19 do not have a single Chinese person. Most people do not speak Chinese, and some, like Mr. Tie, have only a vague notion of China, despite living in the middle of it.

The geographic isolation has helped preserve an Islamic culture, as well as an ancient language, but it has also separated the Dongxiang people from the prosperity lifting other parts of China. The Dongxiang, one of China's 56 officially recognized ethnic minorities, are now among China's poorest and most illiterate people.

On a recent Friday, two days after a heavy snowstorm had coated the mountains and left a sheet of ice on the narrow village roads, old men in white caps trudged through the snow to different mosques. Though some are too poor to send their children to school, they have pooled money to build village mosques as well as graceful towers with elegant curved roofs that serve as Muslim burial vaults.

"The Dongxiang people have always believed in Islam," said Ma Ali, 36, the imam at an old mosque in the village of Hanzilin. Indeed, even within a larger region known as the center of Islam in China, the people of Dongxiang have a reputation for being particularly steadfast in their faith.

"People were devout in the past," said Ma Kui, 75, as he leaned on a wooden cane and waited for afternoon prayers with other farmers dressed in lambskin coats. "They are still devout now."

But as everywhere in China, modernity is seeping up the winding roads to the county's larger settlements and beckoning many younger people. In the county seat, Suonanba, cellphones, blue jeans and Internet cafes arrived several years ago. So did Chinese building contractors, cigarettes, alcohol and food not prepared to Islamic code.

DOJ_NMG_0019109

"The Islamic atmosphere has become watered down over time, and the older people are aware of that," said Ma Chunling, who is 22. "So they want to protect their culture, and particularly Islam."

Growing up, Ms. Ma (the family name is quite common here) felt the otherness of being from Dongxiang. Her mother told stories of hiding in caves during her own childhood, fearful that "the Chinese" were coming.

"All of the people in the village were waiting for the Chinese to come and slaughter them," Ms. Ma said. "But the Chinese never came."

Ms. Ma, now a primary school teacher, spent three years at a vocational school in the eastern port city of Tianjin and wanted to stay and become a hairdresser. But she said her parents were conservative Muslims who believed it was inappropriate for an unmarried woman to travel far from home.

"A lot of young people really want to go out and see the rest of China," she said. "But often their families don't let them. It's still very, very isolated."

For years, many Chinese scholars assumed that the Dongxiang descended from the Mongol soldiers in Genghis Khan's army who eventually settled in Gansu during the 13th century when the Mongols ruled China under the Yuan Dynasty. But their exact origins were never fully known, an uncertainty that fed an inferiority complex.

"A man once asked me, 'Where do the Dongxiang come from?' " said Ma Zhiyong, a historian who grew up in the county but moved to the provincial capital, Lanzhou, as a teenager. "I was 18 or 19, and couldn't answer the question. I was ashamed."

Mr. Ma decided to look for an answer. Over several years, he scoured research libraries in Gansu, talked to other scholars and studied old maps. He found that some Dongxiang villages shared names with places in Central Asian countries like Uzbekistan.

He also found shared customs. He said peasants in Uzbekistan and Dongxiang both learn to cut a slaughtered chicken into 13 pieces. He found that Dongxiang people described themselves as sarta, a term that once referred to Muslim traders in Central Asia.

There was even a physical similarity, as many Dongxiang look more like people from Central Asia, as opposed to Han Chinese.

Mr. Ma decided that the story about Genghis Khan's army was only half right. Some of the Dongxiang ancestors were Mongol soldiers. But he concluded that many others were a diverse group of Middle Eastern and Central Asian craftsmen conscripted into the Mongol army during Khan's famed western campaign. They brought several languages and, in many cases, a strong belief in Islam.

Mr. Ma said that generations of intermarriage, including marriages with local Han Chinese and Tibetans, resulted in a new ethnic group and language.

The language, if a source of pride, is also blamed for Dongxiang's educational shortcomings. The language is oral, so children never learn to read or write in their native tongue.

In grammar school, the curriculum is in Chinese and many students drop out. Government statistics show that the average person in Dongxiang has only 1.1 years of schooling. Because of the cost, many families never even send children to school, particularly daughters.

"When I was in primary school, I didn't understand what I was learning," said Chen Yuanlong, a local official and scholar. "Often, I wanted to talk to the teacher, but I couldn't communicate my ideas in Chinese. It was very difficult."

The challenge of trying to teach Chinese to Dongxiang children has attracted international aid groups to Dongxiang. The British government is financing a large training program for teachers.

Another pilot program, paid for by the Ford Foundation, has created a bilingual curriculum using a Dongxiang-Chinese dictionary developed by Mr. Chen and other scholars. That program has already produced an improvement in test scores, but its supporters are searching for more financial backing.

Education is a basic problem but many people still struggle just to survive. Villages in the deepest ravines depend on potatoes and face starvation during drought years.

Some men who live closer to roads and commerce have become mules for drug runners. Others have left for manual labor in bigger cities, demolishing buildings or working as butchers or dishwashers.

Mr. Tie, the man who took the pop quiz, is too old for such work. He lives halfway down a ravine with his wife and their 16-year-old mentally retarded son. "We beg," Mr. Tie said. "We have land but when our crops aren't enough, we go to nearby villages to beg."

Farther up the ravine, closer to the road that leads to the county seat, Ma Hezhe, 25, watched over her 3-month-old son. Her family is like a snapshot of Dongxiang: two of her husband's brothers had left the county to work as migrant laborers; her mother-in-law, huddled in the corner of the communal bed, had not left Dongxiang in her entire life. The tiny baby, the newest generation, had been given an Islamic name, Ibrahim.

DOJ_NMG_0019110

Ms. Ma had not yet given him a Chinese name. "He doesn't need one until he starts school," she said. It was a local custom, she added, to wait until a child came "into contact" with Chinese society.

There would be plenty of time.

Thousands Of Taiwanese Rally To Assert Freedom From China (LAT)

By Mark Magnier And Tsai Ting-i, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan — President Chen Shui-bian on Saturday called on Taiwan to resist China's bid to annex the island as tens of thousands of people took to the streets protesting Beijing's growing military threat.

"Our future will never be decided by the 1.3 billion people of China," Chen told supporters in front of the presidential office building. "Taiwan is an independent sovereign state, and its future should be determined by its 23 million people. Taiwanese people oppose annexation and invasion."

Protesters on the three-hour march held balloons and waved banners as a flatbed truck hauled a large globe surrounded by red-colored likenesses of missiles bearing the Chinese flag.

The rally, with the slogan, "Protect democracy, oppose annexation," was held to mark the passage of a controversial law in Beijing last year that threatens to use force if Taiwan declares independence.

In recent weeks Chen's government has raised the temperature across the Taiwan Strait by announcing plans to dissolve a largely symbolic unification council, a move nonetheless viewed critically by Beijing, which considers Taiwan part of its territory.

The Bush administration has signaled its displeasure with Chen's latest move, concerned over the prospect of inflamed tensions across the Taiwan Strait at a time when its military forces are stretched thin by conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan and its diplomats distracted by Iran and North Korea's nuclear programs.

Beijing, which announced a 14.7% increase in its military budget this month, raising it to $35.3 billion, has more than 700 missiles aimed at Taiwan.

Chen's Democratic Progressive Party and some television stations estimated that Saturday's march drew 100,000 people, though some police put it closer to 50,000.

The festive atmosphere often seemed more like a street fair as Taipei mothers pushed baby carriages alongside party loyalists bused in from around the island.

"I am here to show my patriotism," said 53-year-old Wang, who gave only his surname. He was accompanied by his wife and three daughters. "We have our own country."

Analysts said Chen could become more provocative in coming months, as he tries to keep his party in power beyond the next presidential election in 2008.

"The China threat issue is a perfect button to push to avoid people looking at his domestic record," said Wenran Jiang, acting director of the China Institute at the University of Alberta in Canada. "Things could get complicated with this kind of game."

Chen's ruling DPP is reeling from a weak showing in local elections late last year and a recent scandal over alleged payoffs involving the use of foreign labor.

On key issues for voters, including the economy and education, Chen's legacy leaves little for his successor to run on. And the opposition Nationalist Party is gaining momentum under the leadership of Harvard-trained Taipei Mayor Ma Ying-jeou.

Chen hopes Beijing will lose its cool and make a threatening move that will push centrist voters to his party, analysts say.

But this strategy could create ripples well beyond the island. Keeping Taiwan in the fold is a core issue on which Chinese leaders judge their legitimacy, especially at a time when they want stability in the run-up to the 2008 Olympics in Beijing.

Taiwanese Hopeful Would Alter Course On China (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan -- Ma Ying-jeou has always loved to run marathons, and he has approached politics the same way. From the day he was named Taiwan's youngest-ever cabinet member 18 years ago, he has been running for leadership. Now, 55 and head of the Nationalist Party, he has started a sprint toward the presidency that, in the view of many Taiwanese, could dramatically alter the island's tense standoff with China.

In an interview last week, Ma pledged that if he won the next presidential election, in 2008, as widely expected, he would shift Taiwan sharply away from the confrontational, pro-independence policies followed by President Chen Shui-bian. A

Nationalist government under his leadership, he declared, would seek neither unification with nor independence from China, focusing instead on practical improvements in cross-strait relations while maintaining the status quo of Taiwanese self-rule.

"When I talk about these things, I say, 'Let's forget about unification and independence,' " he said. "Let's maintain the status quo and concentrate on the economy."

His statements were framed to sound like music in Washington, where the Bush administration has repeatedly expressed irritation with Chen's relentless efforts to move Taiwan's 23 million people along the road toward independence since his rise to power in 2000. Although the United States has no formal diplomatic relations with Taiwan, it has promised to help in the island's defense, raising the specter of U.S. involvement should the tensions over independence explode into military confrontation with China.

Ma's lower-the-temperature approach is also calculated to appeal to Beijing, where Chinese leaders constantly express dismay at Chen's independence moves. China, which regards Taiwan as a province that must return to Beijing's rule, has warned it will do whatever it takes to prevent the island from attaining formal independence, including using force. Seeking to portray Chen as the main source of that danger, the Chinese government has gone out of its way to take a friendly stance toward the Nationalist Party, particularly since a history-making visit to China last April by Ma's predecessor as party leader, Lien Chan.

Here in Taiwan, a strong majority has consistently told poll-takers that maintenance of the status quo is the wisest course, expressing unwillingness to embrace reunification but uneasiness about the possibility that a passionate quest for independence could lead to war. A dip in the island's economic growth has added another argument, raising fears that Chen's independence drive is diverting official attention from economic concerns. In casual conversations last week, residents of the capital, Taipei, repeatedly emphasized worries that Chen's priorities were out of balance.

There are signs that these sentiments have caused a shift in the electorate, boding well for Ma's chances in 2008. The Nationalist Party and its allies retained control of the legislature in December 2004 elections, despite wide expectations to the contrary. Elections for city and county councils last December again showed a drop in support for Chen's Democratic Progressive Party. A poll taken the same month showed the president's approval rating down to 21 percent.

Ma, the mayor of Taipei, has the movie-star looks and sleaze-free appeal to capitalize on the new political winds, Taiwanese analysts said, provided nothing blows him off course during the next two years. Women on both sides of the Taiwan Strait especially appreciate him. Hearing that a friend was about to interview Ma, Chen Hui-ting, a 24-year-old college student, said: "Wow, that's so cool to be meeting Ma. Say hi to him for me."

But he has left nothing to chance. To broaden his appeal among Taiwan's native population -- who provide Chen his base -- Ma has been studying Taiwanese dialect and renewing ties to the man he defeated to become Nationalist chairman, Wang Jin-pyng, the parliamentary speaker and a native Taiwanese.

The son of a Nationalist general who came from the mainland with the defeated Chiang Kai-shek in 1949, Ma has been a party activist since his student days. In addition to his pedigree, an elite education and smooth manners propelled him upward. A fluent English speaker, he interpreted for then-President Chiang Ching-kuo when Chiang announced in a 1986 interview with The Washington Post that Taiwan would lift martial law. By age 38, he was appointed to his first cabinet-level post. Ma defeated Chen, who was then Taipei mayor, to win his current job in 1998, the first of two terms.

Ma, educated at New York University and Harvard Law School, will get a chance to convey his views directly to Americans in a visit beginning Monday in New York and including stops in Boston and Washington as well as on the West Coast. The main purpose, he said, is to promote U.S. investment in Taiwan's high-tech industries. But his schedule also includes talks with U.S. officials designed to burnish the résumé of a possible future president.

Despite his promise to smooth relations with China, Ma is likely to face hostile questions in Washington about why his party's legislative majority has blocked an $18.2 billion arms sale proposed by the Bush administration five years ago and pushed without success by Chen. Ma, whose Nationalists have sought a smaller package, said Chen's government had taken "a dangerously wrong course" by focusing on confrontation with China.

Taiwan's president, he said, seems eager to please the "nationalist fundamentalists" at the core of his Democratic Progressive Party and to steer attention away from corruption charges leveled in recent months against some of his top aides. But more broadly, Ma added, Chen appears determined, in his two years remaining in office, to advance as far as possible toward his passionately held goal of Taiwanese independence.

"What the president is doing now is an incremental policy leading toward de jure independence," he said.

Chen's announcement on Feb. 27 that Taiwan's National Unification Council had "ceased to function" was the latest step and not the last, Ma warned. The next move will be revising the Taiwanese constitution in ways that move the island toward formal independence, according to Su Chi, a Nationalist member of the Legislative Yuan, or parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0019112

Ma said the Bush administration was unwise to accept Chen's decision on the unification council with only a mild reaction. U.S. and Taiwanese officials had negotiated the language carefully, leading Chen to abandon his stated intention to "abolish" the council in favor of the "ceased to function" formulation. Largely on that basis, the administration accepted Chen's contention that the status quo was not changed by his decision.

But Ma, citing his training as a lawyer, said the Chinese word Chen used in fact means "terminate," which does imply a change in the status quo. In addition, he said, no matter what the language, Chen's decision to stand up and announce the end of an official symbol of willingness to get along with China amounted to provocation.

"The U.S. side looks a little gullible," he said.

Administration Blocks Ex-Hostages' Bid For Damages From Iran (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

At an emotional meeting this month at the State Department, steps from the office of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a group of former American hostages released by Iran a quarter of a century ago, accompanied by lawyers and some relatives, confronted two of Rice's most senior aides.

The families' grievance: Why has the Bush administration, which has labeled Iran one of the world's most dangerous regimes and has called the hostages American heroes, fought their efforts to win damages for their ordeal from the Islamic republic?

The answer is rooted in diplomatic obligations and a wariness about favoring one set of terrorism victims over others. U.S. officials express sympathy for the former hostages. But the administration has thwarted every effort in the courts or in Congress to win a monetary judgment against Iran, even as other victims of Iranian-linked terrorism have secured hundreds of millions of dollars in compensation.

Those attending the March 2 meeting said that Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns and legal adviser John B. Bellinger III tried to keep the discussion civil but that anger spilled over. The wife of a former hostage exclaimed at one point: "You are bloodless!" The meeting broke up with Burns acknowledging the difficulty of the issues and saying he would be open to further discussions.

But last week the State Department objected when Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Calif.) tried to address the issue in a House bill that would maintain sanctions against Iran for its links to terrorism, forcing the lawmaker to withdraw his proposal.

"We have 52 of our finest Americans who were held hostage," Sherman said. "They go to court, and you know who appears against them? The State Department."

The former hostages have long tried to sue Iran over being blindfolded, tortured and held in dank cells during 444 days in captivity. Earlier lawsuits were dismissed because other countries generally cannot be sued in federal court. But in 1996 Congress amended the foreign sovereign immunity law to allow suits against countries listed as state sponsors of terrorism. The former hostages sued under the new law, seeking $33 billion in compensatory and punitive damages, and won a default judgment against Iran in 2001.

But on the eve of a hearing to consider damages, the Bush administration intervened, saying the suit violated an agreement with Iran that had secured the hostages' release. The judge threw out the suit in 2002 after Congress twice tried to intervene by passing legislation favoring the hostages. The Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal in 2004. Now the former hostages are seeking relief from Congress.

"Every one of us has spoken the same line for 26 years: The Iranians cannot get away with what they did because it sends the wrong message," said Richard H. Morefield, a former hostage and 50-year State Department veteran who was the embassy's consul general when it was seized in 1979 and who still works at State, declassifying records for the archives.

Beyond the plight of these hostages, the case raises difficult issues.

Even if a victim of terrorism wins at trial, it is almost impossible to collect damages. Iran's assets in the United States, for instance, are worth only about $20 million, mainly diplomatic property, according to State Department officials. So Congress in 2000 passed legislation authorizing the payment of $380 million in U.S. Treasury funds to claimants in cases involving 14 victims who were held hostage or killed by Iranian-supported groups such as Hezbollah, according to the Congressional Research Service. Lawmakers ordered the State Department to try to get that money reimbursed by Iran someday.

Other victims of terrorism, however, have received nothing, leading some lawmakers to conclude that it is inequitable -- and costly to U.S. taxpayers -- to carve out exceptions on a piecemeal basis.

"The problem is you have had some greedy lawyers" who have blocked efforts at a comprehensive solution because it would limit a big payout, said Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), who wrote to Rice last month to urge the administration to come up with a "fair, just and equitable system." He said: "You have to have something that cuts the lawyers out."

DOJ_NMG_0019113

The administration proposed a plan in 2003 that would have given any victim of terrorism $262,000. But only one hearing was held in the Senate, and the idea has languished, largely because of complaints that the amount was too low.

The former hostages of Iran have benefited from two laws, passed in 1980 and 1986, that among other things gave them tax breaks, paid their educational expenses and provided a "token detention benefit" of $50 for each day in captivity. In bringing a lawsuit, they must overcome the terms of the diplomatic agreement that led to their release but has also put the State Department directly in their path.

The agreement, known as the Algiers Accords, codified the 1981 deal between the United States and Iran under which the hostages were released, billions of dollars in Iranian assets were unfrozen, and an arbitration tribunal was established in the Netherlands to settle claims between the two countries. In the first part of the document, the United States pledged that it "will be the policy of the United States not to intervene, directly or indirectly, politically or militarily, in Iran's internal affairs." Elsewhere, the United States pledged to "bar and preclude" any claims filed by the hostages against Iran.

For the hostages, the situation is rich in irony. The State Department, in legal arguments and on Capitol Hill, has maintained that allowing the hostages' case to go forward will violate the Algiers Accords. But Rice has announced a $75 million plan to bolster democracy in Iran and to foster opposition to the theocracy that controls the country. The hostages say Rice's program violates the prohibition on interfering in Iran's affairs; Iran has also filed a complaint with the United States through the Swiss Embassy, which handles U.S. interests in Tehran.

"This administration has not been shy about breaking international agreements," said Barry Rosen, who was press attache at the U.S. Embassy and who now heads the Afghanistan Education Project at Columbia University's Teachers College. "The administration appears to be in contradiction of itself. It seems to me the Algiers Accords should be dead and buried."

Rosen, angry that others have "laid claim to millions and millions of dollars of compensation," added: "This may sound weird, but if I were made aware of that agreement, I would have stayed in Iran."

U.S. officials say that supporting democracy does not amount to interference under international law. And they say abrogating the Algiers Accords, though not a formal treaty, would be viewed overseas as a serious breach of international norms, harming U.S. interests. U.S. banks and companies have been able to settle claims with Iran because of the accords, while the United States has been forced to pay about $900 million to Iran for contract violations and property damage.

William J. Daugherty, a CIA employee who spent 425 days in solitary confinement during the crisis and is now a college professor, said the State Department is being "deceitful and dishonest." He added that "you can't argue that getting people to rise up against their government is not interfering in a country's affairs." He said that, after taxes, the check he received under the 1986 detention benefit was $17,000. "This came from the U.S. taxpayer, which none of us wanted to happen," he said. "We have always wanted Iran to pay for what it did."

Spokesman J. Adam Ereli said that the State Department supported the 1980 and 1986 measures giving direct benefits to the former hostages and that now the administration favors a "comprehensive program" for victims of international terrorism, including the former hostages.

"These brave people are members of the State Department family and are true heroes," Ereli added. "We are committed to having a full and open discussion about any issues they want to raise, and we will do our best to address them."

Iranian Dissident Released From Jail (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Defiant Journalist's Criticism of Ruling Clerics Remains Untempered

TEHRAN, March 18 -- Iran's most prominent dissident emerged from prison looking far older than his 46 years. His clothes hung on a frame reduced to 108 pounds by repeated hunger strikes. He smiled through a beard grown to the bushy nimbus of a Hindu holy man.

"All the time I was in prison was illegal," Akbar Ganji said of the six-year sentence he served for exposing the government's role in assassinating its critics. "From the very first day it was illegal."

Ganji's incarceration ended at 10 p.m. Friday, when Iranian security services dropped him unannounced at his family's apartment in northwest Tehran. The homecoming, which blossomed Saturday morning into a celebratory news conference as word of his release spread, was a rare moment of cheer for Iranian activists who have been steadily steered to the sidelines by the clerics who regulate Iran's politics from powerful, appointive offices.

Ganji, squeezed into a love seat between his wife and his attorney, faced a living room jammed with buoyant Iranian journalists who have seen more than 100 newspapers closed down since he was jailed for what he wrote in one of them. The bones of his shoulders poked through the fabric of a rayon T-shirt. His forehead was scabbed by sores that suggested poor nutrition.

The persistence with which Ganji defied Iran's ruling clerics made him an international symbol of resistance but also ensured he served his entire sentence. Once freed, he proved unable to heed advice to keep quiet until he could assess the current level of tolerance for dissent in Iran.

"Please don't do anything that will take him off to prison again," said his beaming wife, Masoumeh Shafiei, as visiting neighbors edged through the crush, offering trays of tea and a jumbo box of sticky sweets. Digital shutters burred like cicadas, and attorney Yusef Molaei joked that since his interrogators insisted Ganji had received money from foreigners, they might as well charge photojournalists a fee.

"I was told when I was in prison I was too stubborn to listen to anybody," Ganji said. He sounded almost sincere when he added, "Don't write anything, please."

Self-censorship has become a fact of life for Iran's surviving private press as the country's reform movement has flagged. In 1999, thousands of Iranians marched in the streets to express their outrage at the assassination of dissidents in their homes. Ganji went to prison in 2000 for writing about the killings, but public support for reforms continued to grow. The demonstrations, along with landslide elections of a reformist president and parliament, checked the power of conservatives who insisted that a hard line was essential to protect Iran's theocratic system after the death of its charismatic founder, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

But by 2004, conservatives had regained the upper hand, relieving pressure for social freedoms by greatly relaxing enforcement of laws on personal behavior while steadily reducing the maneuvering room of political reformers and publications that supported them.

Against that unrelenting pressure, Ganji pushed back. From prison, he published a manifesto calling for Iran to discard clerical rule and become a secular republic. When allowed home for a few days' leave, he urged foreign reporters to print statements that made officials visibly blanch.

Other advocates of reform opted against direct confrontation, hoping to nurture progress inside a system that grew steadily more responsive under eight years of reformist administration. Emad Baghi, who like Ganji was jailed for writing about what were known as the "serial murders," served only half of the same sentence. During the extra three years Ganji remained inside as a beacon of defiance, Baghi began a newspaper and, after it was banned, a human rights organization.

"I believe both of the approaches are important for us," said Saeed Bostani, a reporter who worked for Baghi and was jailed for seven months for reporting Ganji's deteriorating medical condition.

"When I was in prison, I believed in Mr. Ganji's approach that refuses to compromise, just go all out," Bostani said. "But since I came out into society, I think Mr. Baghi's approach has merit, that we can put pressure on the state and make changes."

Neither avenue is free of risk. Two of Baghi's associates were jailed for a month by security officials suspicious of their attendance at a human rights workshop in Dubai last year.

"Every day I woke up and said, 'Open your heart, I'm coming home.' It's the Pink Floyd song," said Ali Afsahi, freed this week after 30 days alone in a cell with a light that was never turned off.

Afsahi said his interrogators accused him of accepting money from the Bush administration, which has proposed spending $75 million to promote democracy in Iran. He said he was disturbed to find the Dubai workshop run by Iranian exiles, who he described as out of touch with the subtleties of the country's society.

"Look, with the reformists out of power I got put in prison," Afsahi said, but he was freed after intervention by senior officials who shared his values. "Even though I'm working alone, because the ideas I promote are in touch with the realities of our society, people understand what we are doing."

Late Saturday, eight more prisoners were released, all members of a bus drivers union jailed after striking for more pay. Mohsen Kadivar, a leading reformist cleric, said at least 40 political prisoners remain behind bars.

Iranian Writer Released After Serving 6-Year Prison Term (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

TEHRAN, March 18 — An Iranian writer was released Friday night after serving a six-year sentence on charges brought after he wrote a book that accused government officials of playing a role in the killing of intellectuals.

The case of the writer, Akbar Ganji, 46, drew international attention last summer, when he went on a long hunger strike to force authorities to release him. Mr. Ganji appeared weak and frail at his apartment in Tehran on Saturday, his beard heavy.

He did not make any formal comments to reporters. His lawyer, Youssef Mowlai, said he told Mr. Ganji that he first needed to recuperate from the continuing effects of the hunger strike.

"I have advised him not to give interviews and instead see a doctor and spend time with his family," Mr. Mowlai said. "Anything is possible in Iran and we do not want to cause any sensitivity."

DOJ_NMG_0019115

The timing of the release came as a surprise. A judiciary official had said Thursday that Mr. Ganji would not be released until March 30, and a statement by the judiciary on Saturday said Mr. Ganji was on leave for Nowruz, the Iranian New Year.

But Mr. Ganji's wife, Massoumeh Shafiee, said her husband was driven home by prison officials at 10 p.m. on Friday with all his belongings.

"It seems that he has been officially released," she said. "I think they want to close his case."

Mr. Ganji, who supported the 1979 Islamic revolution and served in the hard-line Revolutionary Guards, later shifted politically. His book linked the killing of 80 dissidents and intellectuals in the late 1990's to senior Iranian officials.

While in jail, he continued his political writings, called for the resignation of the supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and urged voters to boycott the 2005 presidential election. A manifesto, in which he argues that Iran must separate state and religion, is popular among student activists.

Abdullah Momeni, a student leader, said he received more than 100 phone calls and messages about Mr. Ganji's release from elated students.

"Mr. Ganji is very popular among students because of his resistance," he said. "He served his sentence and never showed any sign that he will surrender to pressure and give up his beliefs."

"In addition," he said, "students find their ideas very close to what Mr. Ganji has written and said about a republican system."

Reformist allies and friends gathered at Mr. Ganji's home to welcome and salute him.

Mohsen Kadivar, a midranking cleric who also served 18 months in jail in 1999 and came to greet Mr. Ganji on Saturday, also saluted his perseverance, saying, "Mr. Ganji's resistance shows that jailing activists is not a good way to suppress political dissent."

Suppose We Just Let Iran Have The Bomb (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

WASHINGTON

PRESIDENT BUSH'S message to Iran these days sounds unambiguous: The United States will do what it takes to keep the mullahs from getting the bomb. Diplomacy is vastly preferred, President Bush and his aides insist. Yet it was no accident that the just-revised National Security Strategy declares: "This diplomatic effort must succeed if confrontation is to be avoided."

To nervous allies, those words echo the run-up to the Iraq invasion, which began three years ago today. But Iran is not Iraq. And some experts in the United States — mostly outside the administration — have been thinking the unthinkable, or at least the undiscussable: If all other options are worse, could the world learn to live with a nuclear Iran?

"The reality is that most of us think the Iranians are probably going to get a weapon, or the technology to make one, sooner or later," an administration official acknowledged a few weeks ago, refusing to talk on the record because such an admission amounts to a concession that dragging Iran in front of the United Nations Security Council may prove an exercise in futility. "The optimists around here just hope we can delay the day by 10 or 20 years, and that by that time we'll have a different relationship with a different Iranian government."

A roll of the dice, for sure. Yet is the risk greater than it was when other countries — from the Soviet Union and China to India and Pakistan — defied the United States to join the nuclear club?

And could deterrence, containment and cool calculation of national interest work to restrain Iran as it worked to restrain America and its competitors during the cold war? Or is that false comfort?

"We've lived with Iran as a terror threat for a generation," says Stephen Biddle, the senior fellow for defense policy at the Council on Foreign Relations, making the case that containment could work again. "Iran has a return address, and states with a return address can be retaliated against."

As for concerns that an Iranian nuclear capability would touch off a Middle East arms race, with Egypt and Saudi Arabia trying to join the club, the West would most likely head them off, said Barry R. Posen, a political science professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in a Feb. 27 article on The New York Times Op-Ed page. Israel, he said, might finally acknowledge publicly that it has nuclear weapons. But everyone already knows about this capability.

What of the fear that Iran might pass a weapon to Hezbollah or to Al Qaeda in Iraq? Those arguing for a containment strategy say Iran knows that the origins of any detonated bomb would be traced sooner or later, so the mullahs would not be foolish enough to trust proxies with such a weapon.

The Bush administration rejects all such arguments as near madness, especially since Mahmoud Ahmadinejad became Iran's president.

"Accommodating a nuclear armed Iran is not in our interests," says R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs who will be at the Security Council today to argue for a clear warning to Iran and then a steady escalation of pressure to force it to give up any ability to enrich uranium. "Given the radical nature of Iran under Ahmadinejad and its stated wish to wipe Israel off the map of the world," Mr. Burns continued, "it is entirely unconvincing that we could or should live with a nuclear Iran."

The two views of the Iran threat boil down to this: if Iran is simply a new example of a 60-year-old problem, then classic containment should work in 2016 the way it worked in 1956. But traditional deterrence strategy will not work if Iran is one of the first nightmares of a second nuclear age — in which weapons are pieced together by agents working in the shadows and supplied by networks of private entrenpreneurs like Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani nuclear engineer who gave the Iranian nuclear program its start.

In this new era, the argument goes, the best way to head off an attack is to prevent loosely controlled (or devious) countries from acquiring the makings of nuclear bombs in the first place. If an attack is staged not from a missile silo but from a basement or a cargo container, it will take time to pinpoint who deserves the blame. By then, the human cost is already too high and retaliation is no longer certain.

The debate is likely to play out for much of the year, based on a series of guesses about Iran's true intentions, and its capabilities. The list of unknowables is long. They range from the technical to the political, from how long it will take Iran's scientists to get their centrifuges running to who will ultimately prevail in Iran's seemingly endless internal battle over its relationship to the Westernized world.

But getting this right requires projecting what happens to America, Israel and Europe, especially if Iran's power to send the price of oil skyrocketing is enhanced by the confidence that a nuclear arsenal can bring.

The Iranians know exactly what the bomb would make them: the dominant regional power in the Middle East. Iran would become, in a stroke, more powerful than the Saudis, an even greater influence than it is today over a Shiite-controlled Iraq and, arguably, as powerful as Israel. And the better Iran's missile technology becomes, the greater its influence and ability to blackmail.

Bush administration officials who have reviewed the classified assessments of Iran's next moves worry that it would not even have to build a complete bomb to gain leverage. It would just have to make a credible case that it could assemble a weapon on short notice. "For their political needs, that would be enough," said Gary Samore, who was a nonproliferation official in the Clinton administration.

That explains why the Americans have been so adamant about not allowing Iran to conduct even experimental uranium-enrichment technology on its soil, even if it has a right to do so as a signer of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. It may also explain why the Iranians are so insistent that they will never give up that right.

The Iranians also know that history suggests they have a good chance of reaching their goal. This is not the first time the Americans have declared that another nation cannot be allowed to unlock the secrets of the atom — and then learned to live with the risk when it did.

In the mid-1960's, President Lyndon Johnson contemplated pre-emptive strikes against sites where China had nuclear installations. "Many today forget that Stalin's Soviet Union and Mao Zedong's China were seen as more threatening in both capabilities and intentions than are today's mullahs in Tehran," Richard K. Betts, a professor of political science at Columbia University, wrote in the most recent issue of The National Interest.

In both cases, though, what seemed at the time like a life-threatening menace morphed into a manageable threat — partly because containment worked, and partly because Soviet and Chinese leaders made shrewd assessments of their real strategic interests.

Both, however, are somewhat flawed comparisons: Iran is no superpower. The cases of Pakistan, India and North Korea may be more instructive.

When Pakistan and India set off tests and countertests in 1998, Washington tried to punish both. That effort didn't extend past 9/11. Mr. Bush needed both countries too much. Today Pakistan is a "major non-NATO ally" with a nuclear force that many in Washington still fear could fall into the wrong hands in the event of a coup. Last month, President Bush gave India the ultimate blessing, agreeing to seek an exemption from Congress that would allow the United States to sell India fuel for its civilian nuclear plants.

Even more to the point is the case of North Korea. As in the case of Iran, Mr. Bush has said the United States cannot "tolerate" North Korea as a nuclear power. But Washington is already tolerating exactly that. John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, told Congress recently that intelligence officials assume that North Korea is telling the truth when it boasts it has produced enough nuclear fuel for several weapons. But no one — least of all its closest neighbors, China and South Korea — dare push it to the brink. They have learned to live with the status quo.

DOJ_NMG_0019117

The Iranians are betting that this confrontation — what Graham Allison, a nuclear expert at Harvard, calls a "slow motion Cuban missile crisis" — has a good chance of coming out the same way. If so, the problem may go beyond Iran.

"Remember, Iran is just one instance of the problem, and in Iran's case, containment might work," says Brent Scowcroft, who was the national security adviser to Mr. Bush's father. "But if that happens, I think we are on the way to a world of proliferation like we have not seen before."

Hamas Completes Lineup For Palestinian Ministries (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 18 — The militant Islamic group Hamas said Saturday that it had completed its lineup for a new Palestinian cabinet and would present it Sunday to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, for his approval. An aide to Mr. Abbas said he was likely to give his approval.

"Our cabinet is ready," Ismail Haniya, the Hamas leader and prime minister-designate, told a news conference in Gaza City.

Mr. Haniya declined to provide names of the cabinet nominees, though he said Hamas members, independents and technocrats would be included. However, no other Palestinian political parties have announced their intention to participate despite Hamas's invitation to join.

The crucial question now is whether Mr. Abbas will support the Hamas-led cabinet. If he rejects it, his decision could lead to a political crisis, and Palestinian law is not clear on how it would be resolved.

Mr. Abbas has called on Hamas to accept previous agreements with Israel and the possibility of negotiations with the Jewish state. Hamas has always opposed these positions.

Still, a spokesman for Mr. Abbas, Nabil Abu Rudeineh, told Reuters he did not believe that Mr. Abbas would reject the list from Hamas, which won an outright majority in parliamentary elections in January.

Mr. Abbas, known as Abu Mazen, traveled from the West Bank to Gaza on Saturday and planned to meet Hamas leaders in Gaza City on Sunday.

Hamas has until March 28 to form a new cabinet, meaning that Mr. Abbas and Hamas could still negotiate in the coming days. "We are committed to the principle of cooperation with Abu Mazen and a dialogue with all the Palestinian factions," Mr. Haniya said.

Last month, Hamas chose Mr. Haniya, 42, to be the prime minister, and he has been working on choosing a cabinet. While the names have not been formally announced, Hamas appears set to put its own members in the most important posts.

Dr. Mahmoud Zahar, a surgeon, is expected to be named foreign minister. Dr. Zahar speaks English and often deals with the foreign media. Considered a hard-liner, he is often confrontational in his public comments, in contrast to Mr. Haniya, who comes across as less radical.

Said Siam, a Hamas lawmaker from Gaza, is considered the likely choice to lead the Interior Ministry, which controls the police and other security agencies. Mr. Abbas will also control some security forces.

Omar Abdel-Razeq, a Hamas member and an economics professor from the West Bank, is expected to be appointed finance minister. He was arrested by Israel a few months ago and released this past week.

In the Jan. 25 Palestinian election, Hamas won 74 of the 132 parliamentary seats, so it does not need any partners to form a government.

Hamas has invited other Palestinian factions to join it in the interest of Palestinian unity. But it was still not clear on Saturday whether any other factions would be taking part. Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement, the dominant Palestinian faction for decades, has said it would not join.

Salah Bardawil, a recently elected Hamas lawmaker, said the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, which won three parliamentary seats, was prepared to join. But Jamil Majdalawi, one of the Popular Front's legislators, said it had not made a final decision.

Israel seized five members of the Popular Front, including its leader, Ahmed Saadat, in a raid on Tuesday on a Palestinian jail in the West Bank town of Jericho. The Popular Front had claimed responsibility for the 2001 assassination of an Israeli cabinet minister, and Israel says the five orchestrated the shooting.

Under a deal reached in 2002, the Palestinians agreed to jail the five rather than hand them over to Israel. Israel said it took the men on Tuesday because it believed Hamas was preparing to release them. Israel labels Hamas a terrorist group and says it will not deal with a Palestinian Authority led by Hamas.

In another development on Saturday, an Israeli military official said the army was investigating the circumstances surrounding the shooting death of a 10-year-old Palestinian girl, Akber Zayed, who was killed Friday night during an Israeli incursion into the West Bank village of Yamoun. Palestinians in the village said she was shot when soldiers fired on the taxi in which she was riding.

Hamas Says It Has Formed A Cabinet (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

JERUSALEM — Hamas announced Saturday that it had formed a Palestinian government but acknowledged that it had been unable to attract coalition partners whose presence might have made dealings with the Islamist group more palatable to the outside world.

The group refrained from formally announcing its Cabinet lineup pending its presentation to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who was expected to travel to the Gaza Strip today for meetings with the Hamas leadership.

But Hamas officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said key positions would go to Hamas loyalists such as firebrand Mahmoud Zahar, who has been designated foreign minister.

Other senior appointees include lawmaker Said Siyam, who is considered a relative moderate, as interior minister, and economics professor Omar Abdel Razeq, who was jailed at the time of January's parliamentary elections, as finance minister.

"We respect [other] parties' decision not to join the Cabinet," Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister-designate, said at a news conference in Gaza.

Israeli officials declined to comment on the prospective Cabinet lineup, saying they would wait until it was formalized. But one senior official scoffed at the notion that Israel would have any dealings with Zahar, a hard-liner whom it has repeatedly tried to assassinate.

In the wake of its upset victory in the Jan. 25 elections, Hamas wrestled with the question of whether to form a government weighted toward outsiders in order to leave open the possibility of maintaining at least indirect contacts with Israel.

The idea of a broad-based government went by the wayside, however, because more militant elements within the group insisted it must not back down from its stated goal of Israel's destruction.

That unyielding stance, plus unrelated antagonisms with other Palestinian factions, appeared to have driven off any potential coalition partners, although the radical Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine was said to still be deliberating whether to accept some junior Cabinet posts.

Haniyeh, speaking to reporters in Gaza, sought to calm fears that Israel and the United States would now intensify efforts to isolate the Palestinian government.

"We have no doubt of success in the Cabinet's responsibilities for running Palestinian affairs," he said. "Those Palestinians who granted us their trust will never starve or be deprived."

Most Western countries have threatened to cut off or severely curtail aid to a Hamas-dominated Palestinian government. Hamas, which Israel, the United States and the European Union consider a terrorist organization, carried out dozens of suicide attacks during the five-year Palestinian uprising, or intifada, but has largely adhered to a truce over the last year.

The makeup of the Cabinet appeared to dash hopes on the part of Abbas, who was elected a year before the vote that brought Hamas to power and has broad authority of his own, that Hamas might moderate its views sufficiently to avoid an aid and diplomatic boycott.

Abbas must approve the Cabinet lineup before it can be put before parliament. He is expected to try to delay that step until after Israel's parliamentary elections, scheduled for March 28.

Left To Rot In Gaza (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Strip's Economy Suffers as Trade Passage to Israel Remains Sealed

NETZARIM, Gaza Strip -- The harvest is underway inside a row of greenhouses here on the grounds of a razed Israeli settlement. But most of the tomatoes and sweet peppers, usually shipped to European markets, will rot in a nearby ravine.

"We keep getting it, but we don't know what to do with it," said Abdul Fatah al-Eilah, the greenhouse manager, as workers stacked boxes of vegetables in a storage shed while tractors towing flatbeds full of produce lined up to enter.

The main trade passage between the Gaza Strip and Israel has been closed for much of the year, despite an agreement brokered by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in November that required Israel to "ensure the continued opportunity to export." Israeli security concerns, heightened by Hamas's parliamentary victory in January and the almost daily rocket fire from Gaza, have rendered the deal largely moot.

To protect Gaza's small farmers from competition by Eilah's Palestine Economic Development Corp. and its 1,000 acres of greenhouses, the corporation is barred from selling its produce locally. But without regular access to the outside world, the corporation has had to donate some produce to local charities and dump the rest. Losses so far add up to millions of dollars.

"The government will likely have to give this away," Eilah said of an operation once considered the key to Gaza's economic future.

The lost harvest is the most recognizable sign of Gaza's declining fortunes six months after Israel's evacuation. It is also a telling indicator of Israel's evolving policy toward the Palestinian territories as Hamas, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement and at war with the Jewish state, prepares to take political power.

Unreliable trade passages, frozen Israeli tax transfers that helped pay salaries and lapsed permits of Palestinians who work in Israel are evidence of a broader disengagement, one that Israeli security officials say they hope to accelerate once Hamas installs its cabinet this month.

The Israeli defense establishment plans to resurrect a proposal to ban thousands of Palestinian workers from Israel, seal trade passages and end utility services once the Palestinian Authority has arranged alternative sources. Behind the push is the belief, promoted by senior security officials, that Hamas's election has made it all but impossible to sustain economic and political relations with the Palestinian territories, at least in the near term.

Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, whose Kadima party is far ahead in opinion polls heading into Israel's March 28 elections, chose another approach to the caretaker Palestinian government last month. But Olmert has said he may adopt a stricter policy after Hamas assumes control of the Palestinian ministries.

That will happen at about the time Israel concludes its own election, which is shaping up as a referendum on Olmert's proposal to withdraw unilaterally from parts of the West Bank. Olmert has said he intends to draw Israel's final borders over the course of his four-year term, consolidating scattered Jewish settlements in the West Bank into larger blocs on the side of a separation barrier that Israel intends to keep.

Carrying out that move, designed to ensure the longevity of a Jewish majority inside Israel's final boundaries, would also entail the economic separation now quickening in Gaza. A World Bank assessment last week said frozen tax transfers, trade restrictions and future reductions in foreign aid would result in "a one-year contraction of economic activity equivalent to a deep depression," warning that per capita income in the territories would fall 30 percent this year.

As those sources dry up in Gaza, an economy dependent on public salaries, agriculture and foreign aid to sustain its 1.3 million people is already lifeless. Regular rocket fire into southern Israel, carried out by the radical group Islamic Jihad, has turned the northern strip into an artillery range. Prices have soared in stores as the supply of flour, sugar and dairy products that come from Israel is constantly interrupted.

"The thing we get most is the horror," said Ibrahim Harb, an unemployed father of 10 in the village of Um el-Nasser. "There is a panic here."

The village, alive with rowdy children one recent morning, sits on the edge of an area in the northern strip that Israel has designated a no-go zone. An Israeli artillery shell whistled high above the Harbs' sandy street, followed by a nearby bang. The children didn't pause from their play.

Among dunes in the near distance, a pair of tires mark a makeshift border. Israel declared the area beyond the tires off-limits in order to have a freer hand in targeting Palestinian fighters who launch crude rockets from there toward the smokestacks of the Ashkelon power plant in the middle distance. Earlier in the day, gunmen from Islamic Jihad had done just that.

"We want them to do this far from us," Harb said. "We live here, and we'll be the first ones harmed."

Until last month, Harb was one of the fortunate 4,000 or so Palestinians with a permit to work in Israel, where wages are higher. When his permit expired in February, it was not renewed, as the Israeli government reduces the Palestinian workforce. Harb's family gets by with help from a Hamas-run charity.

"You sit here, there is nothing, so you go inside," said Harb's 68-year-old father, Mohammed, passing a stormy morning on a bench. "That's it."

The Karni crossing, the main trade passage between Israel and Gaza, is nearby. This year, the crossing has been closed more often than not because of Israeli security concerns. A U.N. humanitarian assessment estimated that the 21-day closure that ended in February cost more than $10 million.

The Israeli military opened Karni 10 days ago for several hours a day to allow essential supplies into Gaza, but closed the crossing Tuesday. It has not reopened, and its future remains unclear, even though the Bush administration has paid to upgrade security, including state-of-the-art cargo scanners.

Nasser Jaber, director of the Palestinian Industrial Estates and Free Zone Authority at Karni, has little to do these days. He manages the compound of 30 factories adjacent to the crossing, a complex built in part with U.S. development money. A U.S.-funded security fence was being installed at the time of Hamas's election. That project and other U.S. development work in the territories have been suspended.

Jaber said Israel has closed Karni to move the main crossing to the Kerem Shalom terminal in the south, far from the strip's economic center. On Friday, Israeli defense officials said Kerem Shalom would be opened on Sunday. "This industrial park was invented by the Americans," Jaber said. "Now look at it. Things are being done you can't understand."

At a furniture factory inside one of the long corrugated-steel sheds on the grounds, 17 of 50 employees were still at work finishing stacks of living room chairs. There is no wood to begin new orders, all placed by Israeli companies.

"This will stop soon, too," said Yusef Ahmed, 27, a father of four children from the Jabaliya refugee camp. "Then we don't know what we'll do."

At Netzarim, where most of the Jewish settlement's structures were demolished during last year's evacuation, scavengers still come in hopes that the piles of concrete blocks bristling with wires and weeds may hold something of value. Beneath where homes once stood, a small canyon has become the dumping ground for export-quality peppers and tomatoes from the Palestine Economic Development Corp.

The company, formed to manage the greenhouses that were bought with international funds on behalf of the Palestinians, is nearly bankrupt. Amid al-Masri, the project manager, said he will recommend that the business be closed and its 4,000 workers laid off at the end of the month if Karni is not opened soon.

Even if it is, Masri said, the failure of the November agreement to keep the crossing running has cost him future investors he counted on to develop the greenhouse operation. He estimated that the closures have cost him more than $6 million.

"The worst time to make a decision is during moments of chaos," Masri said. "And right now we're in such a moment."

On Eve Of Vote, Belarus Braces For Aftermath (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 18 — There are no campaign posters or billboards here, not even for President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, who has otherwise thoroughly orchestrated his re-election to a third term on Sunday.

The security services barred campaigning in the city's center. Handing out leaflets — even possessing them — risks arrest. Dozens have already been jailed in the prelude to the vote, some of them senior campaign workers for the democratic opposition.

The results of the election on Sunday, widely denounced here and abroad as undemocratic, are a foregone conclusion. But the vote is only a prelude to the real struggle against Mr. Lukashenko's government, one that many fear could end in violent reprisals along the monumental streets of Minsk, the capital.

A text message sent to Belarussian mobile phones on Saturday, from an unknown sender, carried an ominous warning about what might unfold on Minsk's central square. "On the evening of March 19, 2006, on October Square, provocateurs are preparing bloodshed," said the message, apparently intended to discourage attendance. "Protect your life and health."

In an attempt to replicate the popular uprising against a rigged presidential election in Ukraine in 2004, two opposition candidates, Aleksandr Milinkevich and Aleksandr V. Kazulin, have called on their supporters to assemble Sunday night to protest what they denounced as a chimera of a democratic process. They have done so in defiance of a ban on Election Day rallies and threats that those who gather could face charges of terrorism.

"We will stay for 24 hours," said Alyaksei Yanukevich, a close aide of Mr. Milinkevich's, describing a plan to occupy the square in peaceful protest. "If on Monday night there are more people than on Sunday, then that means the process will continue."

What might happen after that, he could not say. Mr. Lukashenko vowed to crush any protests, warning Belarussians not to participate and foreign governments not to encourage them.

"We know where they met, whom they met with and what discussions they had," Mr. Lukashenko said during remarks made at an auto factory in Zhodino on Friday, according to the Interfax news agency. "God forbid that they should try to perpetrate something in the country. We will twist off their heads as though they are ducklings."

The United States and European Union have warned of sanctions. In Washington, the White House released a report on Friday that accused Mr. Lukashenko of having created "a repressive dictatorship on the doorstep of the European Union and NATO."

The report, citing news accounts and critics, accused him of personally enriching himself and asserted that he was "likely among the most corrupt leaders in the world."

DOJ_NMG_0019121

Mr. Lukashenko, already shunned in the West, has responded with defiance as the election campaign unfolded. The arrests of opposition workers and the restrictions on public events "have limited the scope for a vibrant election campaign," the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said in a report based on the findings of its observers here.

The most prominent independent newspaper, Narodnaya Volya, or People's Will, had 250,000 issues seized on March 3 as they were being delivered from a printer in Smolensk, Russia. On Monday, the printer suddenly annulled the paper's contract, said the editor, Iosif Seredich.

He found another printer in Russia, but after Tuesday's copies were seized, he shut down the newspaper, one of the last public forums available to the opposition candidates.

"There is no sense," he said.

Mr. Lukashenko himself forswore campaigning. He has instead carried on with official duties, which state television has extensively covered while it has ignored the opposition except to criticize it.

One of his campaign managers, Vladimir Gostyukhin, declined a request to be interviewed. He said that he was very busy, and that he would vote early on Saturday — a widespread practice that Mr. Lukashenko's critics warn would be used to rig the results in the absence of observers — and then leave Minsk.

On Friday night, Mr. Lukashenko gave a short, televised address. He urged people to vote, defended his government from accusations of authoritarianism and reassured viewers that there would be no coup.

"The fact that four candidates are taking part in the ongoing election campaign is also evidence of democracy in this country," he said in remarks transcribed by the BBC. (In addition to Mr. Milinkevich and Mr. Kazulin, a fourth candidate, Sergei Gaydukevich, is a Lukashenko supporter.)

"Some candidates insistently call on people to take to the streets if the results of the vote are not in their favor," he added. "Is this their understanding of democracy? It is unrest, pogroms and violence?"

His opponents vowed only peaceful demonstrations. "I beg you to come out with smiles and flowers and balloons," Mr. Kazulin, who was beaten and detained during a confrontation with security officers on March 2, told an overflowing crowd of hundreds in a tattered movie theater on the edge of Minsk on Friday night. "Take chocolates or sweets and give them to the police."

The rally was the first joint appearance for Mr. Kazulin, a former university rector, and Mr. Milinkevich, a former physics professor who is the more prominent opposition candidate, representing a coalition of 10 parties. The audience erupted into chants of "Long live Belarus."

"The mood of the people now is different," Mr. Milinkevich said when asked about the expected announcement of an overwhelming victory for the president. "The people will laugh now, and that is what the authorities are most afraid of."

Beyond those who attend opposition events, fear remains pervasive. People asked about the election invariably refused to give their names. "Are they filming?" a middle-aged woman asked near Victory Square. She had no doubt about the outcome, she said, because she had no illusion about democracy here.

"Like Fidel Castro, he will be president forever," she said and hurried off.

The democratic changes in Ukraine — as well as in Georgia in 2003 and Kyrgyzstan in 2005 — inspired many here, but Mr. Lukashenko's government took note, too. In December, his government enacted new laws increasing criminal penalties for organizing the sort of public protest now being planned.

"He analyzed very well the mistakes made by Shevardnadze and Kuchma," said Igor Marinich, referring to former leaders of Georgia and Ukraine whose autocratic governments were swept aside by protests. He is the son of Mikhail Marinich, an opposition leader who was jailed in 2004, the first of what he predicted then would be a wave of politically motivated arrests.

"And they," he added, "were not the dictators he is."

Belarus President Expected To Win Reelection (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Despite suppression of media and opposition, a poll shows Lukashenko getting a third term. Democracy groups vow to demand honesty.

MINSK, Belarus — Those who missed the highlights of American history in their civics class had only to turn on the television last week in Belarus, a small nation on Europe's eastern border where old Soviet-era propaganda machines are kept lovingly lubricated.

The program, "America Without Makeup," described Richard Nixon's attempt to bug Democratic campaign offices in 1972, Ronald Reagan's covert sale of weapons to Iran, the Pentagon's arming of Iraq and murky hints of conspiracy behind the deaths of Robert Kennedy and Marilyn Monroe.

"It's not for nothing that people say democracy demands sacrifice," a narrator commented wryly. "Money doesn't smell — that's the main principle of American democracy."

Here in Belarus, President Alexander G. Lukashenko has a stake in giving democracy a black eye: The U.S. government is spending more than $9 million a year here on attempts to develop a sophisticated political opposition and a well-informed electorate, tools for combating one of the most repressive dictatorships in the world.

Voters go to the polls today for an election that is widely expected to hand Lukashenko, Belarus' president since 1994, a third five-year term. In echoes of recent revolutions in Ukraine and Georgia, the opposition plans to muster thousands in the streets to demand a free election.

Belarus state security, still known as the KGB, threatened Monday to charge protesters "who try to destabilize the situation" with terrorism. That prompted an immediate protest from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which has sent observers to monitor the balloting.

"I am particularly shocked … that peaceful demonstrators could face charges of terrorism, carrying a sentence of eight years' imprisonment to the death penalty," OSCE Chairman Karel De Gucht, the Belgian foreign minister, said in a statement Friday. "Is that a way to conduct democratic elections?"

"We haven't seen such a politicization of people since perestroika," said opposition candidate Alexander Milinkevich, referring to the era that preceded the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. "The reason is not socioeconomic. It's a moral protest. People don't want to live in fear and humiliation. I call it a revolution of the spirit."

Lukashenko's government has all but shut down the independent media, arrested hundreds of opposition campaign activists, kicked and beaten one presidential contender during a campaign rally, expelled students and reportedly fired state workers who did not toe an ideological line that reads like a reissue of the Communist-era Pravda. The KGB has been accused of operating secret death squads responsible for some of the disappearances and deaths of half a dozen journalists, businessmen and political opponents since 1999.

Why, then, does a recent InterMedia poll show Lukashenko drawing an easy 52.9% of the vote, far ahead of his rivals?

Belarus officials say it is because they have succeeded in doing what the conventional wisdom in the West says is not possible: maintaining a state-run economy with one of the strongest growth rates in Europe, generating increases in wages and pensions, boosting productivity and minimizing the disparities in wealth that have destabilized so many of the former Soviet republics in their transition to market economies.

State-owned oil refineries here buy Russian oil and sell its products to Europe at a hefty profit. Collective farms abound and have been merged with profitable enterprises, such as tractor companies, to bring their balance sheets out of the red. Unemployment is officially at 1.5%, although thousands more may simply be unregistered.

The World Bank does not know quite what to make of the model, but said in a November report that it wouldn't last without major reforms.

Advocates of overhaul say the entire economy is operating on the good graces of neighbor Russia, which buys large quantities of Belarusian goods and sells natural gas to its closest ally at subsidies worth an estimated $3 billion a year.

Still, many Belarusians say they are ready to vote again for Lukashenko, if only for the sake of stability and his pledge that the government will keep paying pensions and salaries on time.

"People want to live quietly. They want stability, they want jobs, they want their children to walk safely in the streets," said Yelena Yeseyeva, 40, a bookkeeper at a state-owned communal services company. "I think the president has chosen the right way."

Yet support for Milinkevich, a U.S.-educated physicist chosen by a broad coalition of pro-democracy parties, and Alexander Kozulin, a former university rector and leader of the Social Democratic Party, has grown among Belarusians who say the nation's economic gains are illusory and its growing climate of repression intolerable.

"These are myths they're talking about. Simply myths. Yes, in Belarus there are no pension arrears. But if a pension in Russia were as small as it is in Belarus, it would be paid on time too," said Svetlana Kalinkina, managing editor of Narodnaya Volya, the last remaining independent daily in Belarus.

Milinkevich has drawn crowds of several thousand throughout Belarus, despite arrests and beatings.

Opposition candidates were allowed to make addresses on state-run television and radio, but their remarks were censored. The omitted remarks were aired as part of a new 24-hour-a-day radio broadcast into the country, European Radio for Belarus, that began Feb. 26 with a $2.4-million grant from the European Commission.

U.S.-funded organizations such as the National Democratic Institute and the International Republican Institute, banned in Belarus, have set up shop in neighboring Ukraine and Lithuania. From there, they offer a democracy primer to activists, women and youths, which the Belarus government calls a covert attempt by the West to engineer an overthrow of the regime.

"When it comes to foreign financing of the political processes inside the country, we, as any other country in the world, do not welcome that … in the same way the U.S. doesn't welcome that, in fact prohibits it, according to federal laws," said Foreign Minister Sergei Martynov.

In an interview, Martynov said the United States may fear "the emergence of an entity in the area of the former Soviet Union which will be in a position to challenge the United States," and said Belarus' growing economic union with Russia could be perceived as such a threat.

"We're not trying to resurrect the former Soviet Union, it would have been stupid and unrealistic." Opposition leaders say that getting out their message in Belarus is next to impossible without outside help. In recent years, the government has prevented the few remaining independent newspapers from printing in Belarus, and when they began printing at a private press in Russia, the government prohibited sales at kiosks and distribution through the mail.

Publishers of Narodnaya Volya found volunteers to handdeliver the paper in all major cities of Belarus, but this month, authorities stopped the trucks bringing the paper into the country and seized all the copies.

"What's happening now is totally unprecedented, even for the entire rule of Lukashenko. Everybody is under KGB surveillance, telephones are bugged. If in the past they would interrogate people when they were detained on the street, now they send official invitations to parents to bring their children in and answer questions," said Irina Toustsik, an activist with the underground youth movement Zubr.

At campaign rallies last week in southeastern Belarus, Milinkevich urged citizens to imagine a future in which jobs are not dependent on loyalty to the government, small entrepreneurs can flourish and losing state businesses give way to more productive private enterprises.

"The entire world is getting integrated, and we're being self-isolated," he told supporters in Mazyr.

Outside the hall, Ivan Kovalenko, 64, a retired oil company employee, said he was ready for an alternative to Lukashenko.

"What right direction for the country can you talk about if people are scared, if they're being persecuted?" he said. "The only hope is that the number of people who begin to understand, who begin to see things in a proper light, is growing. And I am an example of such people."

Keeping The Opposition In Check, If Not In Jail (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Though Favored to Win Today's Vote, Belarus Leader Uses Fear as Tactic

MINSK, Belarus, March 18 -- Syrghei Marchyk, a 20-year-old former law student, has been running from the law since being charged recently with "unsanitary practices." He said he could only guess that an arrest warrant was issued for him because he was spotted putting up posters for Alexander Milinkevich, an opposition candidate in the presidential election here Sunday.

The last couple of months have been tough for Marchyk. In February, he was expelled from law school for "disciplinary problems." He said the action resulted from his political activities against the incumbent president, Alexander Lukashenko. Before his expulsion, he was briefly jailed for silently holding candles on a street with about 20 other young people to commemorate four government opponents who are missing and presumed dead. The authorities called it an unsanctioned rally.

"This may sound a little pathetic, but I love my country and I want to fight for my motherland," Marchyk said. "If I have to wait for a change of regime to continue my studies, I'll wait."

Dissent carries a real price in this country of 10 million people, sandwiched between the European Union and Russia, where Lukashenko has ordered that no one other than Lukashenko can be called "president." Hundreds of presidents of companies, clubs and associations have had to change their titles.

Opposition activists say students who step out of line often receive failing grades or face trumped-up disciplinary charges that lead to expulsion from school. State workers, who commonly have one-year contracts, are routinely dismissed if they question the president's rule. Political activists are arrested and sometimes beaten. Independent newspapers are shut down or lose an entire edition to police seizures.

"We will wring their necks as one might a duck," Lukashenko, 51, said Friday while touring an auto plant, referring to unnamed opponents he said were planning a coup. The head of the KGB, as the security service is still called in this former Soviet republic, said this week that people who protest the outcome of the election could face the death penalty.

"There are two problems in Belarus: The first is fear and the second is apathy," Milinkevich, 58, a physics professor, said in an interview at a campaign stop. "We can ruin apathy at least. Fear is more difficult."

The repression, activists say, is designed to prevent the emergence of a strong opposition to Lukashenko, a former collective farm manager who came to office as a reformer in 1994 and has ruthlessly centralized power since. Members of his inner circle have declined to be interviewed, but analysts say they are particularly anxious about preventing the kind of popular revolt that toppled post-communist governments in Ukraine and Georgia.

What makes Lukashenko more than an average autocrat is that he is genuinely popular with a significant segment of the population -- people who value the modest but secure life that the state-controlled economy offers. Lukashenko plausibly could win a free and fair election, the opposition concedes.

According to a recent survey by Washington-based InterMedia, Lukashenko will receive at least 52.9 percent of the vote and looks set to win in the first round Sunday, avoiding a runoff. Milinkevich is projected to get 6 percent.

Lukashenko also faces Alexander Kozulin, a former rector of Belarusan State University who was once close to the president, and Syarhey Haydukevich, seen by political analysts as a Lukashenko ally whose role is to create the appearance of competition. The InterMedia poll of 1,085 Belarusans gave Kozulin 4.7 percent and Haydukevich 0.5 percent.

About 17 percent said they were undecided. Others declined to answer or said they would not vote. Polls sanctioned by the government show Lukashenko winning at least 60 percent of the vote.

Andrei Vardomatskii, a Belarusan pollster, said in an interview that the climate of fear in the country causes many people to say publicly that they will vote for Lukashenko. That results in an overestimate of his support in polls by at least 10 percent, meaning he probably could not secure a first-round victory in a fair vote, Vardomatskii said.

But there is no question that Lukashenko remains popular among many Belarusans. In a historically brutalized country -- as much as one-third of the population was killed during World War II, and the Chernobyl nuclear disaster of 1986 in Ukraine blighted a large swath of the Belarusan countryside -- stability is a value that can trump liberty.

"I don't love him like an idol, but during his time many positive changes have occurred," said Natalia Kazachenko, 52, who retired from her job as a kindergarten director last year. She said her pension was generous and stable, allowing her to vacation in Egypt and remodel her apartment. Kazachenko said she was also happy that both her sons had free educations, followed by secure jobs as construction engineers. Her eldest, who is 30, just bought his own apartment, she said proudly.

"People have something to lose with change," Kazachenko said, adding that her entire family would vote for Lukashenko.

Through his absolute control of the broadcast media, Lukashenko has warned repeatedly of chaos if the opposition, which is demonized as a puppet of the West, should ever gain political power. The dislocation, emigration and poverty caused by the transition to capitalism in the neighboring Baltic states and Poland is a constant Lukashenko theme.

The political divide is as generational as it is ideological. At a rally this week in the industrial city of Zhodino, about 50 miles northeast of the capital, Minsk, younger members of the audience enthusiastically welcomed Milinkevich. But he received glowers from older people, many of them local bureaucrats, who emulated the state media by portraying him as a Western stooge of uncertain background and values.

"Why didn't your son serve in the military?" one man asked during a question and answer session.

"Because he has a serious kidney condition," Milinkevich replied.

As Milinkevich spoke, three of his local campaign workers were sitting in jail. Police would not say what they were charged with.

In the interview, Milinkevich said he was not running to win -- not this time. The goal of his campaign, he said, is to raise the possibility of an alternative to Lukashenko as president for life. In 2004, in a referendum that outside observers condemned as rigged, the country adopted a constitutional amendment that lifted the two-term limit for presidents.

Kozulin said in an interview that he entered the race to siphon off disaffected voters, particularly among state workers, who would never support Milinkevich in part because he is a favorite of students and the well-educated.

Both Kozulin and Milinkevich said the president's control of the media has limited their ability to present their ideas to the electorate. The 55-nation Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe found that more than 94 percent of news broadcasts about the candidates were devoted to Lukashenko.

French Protests Over Youth Labor Law Spread To 150 Cities And Towns (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

PARIS, March 18 — Students joined forces with teachers, workers, retirees, opposition politicians and labor union leaders in more than 150 cities and towns throughout France on Saturday in the largest nationwide protest against the government's new youth labor law.

A number of public figures joined in, including the mayor of Paris, Bertrand Delanoe; the Socialist party leader, François Hollande; a former culture minister, Jack Lang; and the Communist Party leader, Marie-George Buffet.

The demonstrations were the climax of a week of protests that have shut down dozens of universities and confronted Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin with one of the most serious crises in his 10 months in office.

DOJ_NMG_0019125

The giant left-wing C.G.T. workers' union estimated that 1.5 million people protested nationwide; the Interior Ministry put the total at more than 500,000, with 80,000 in Paris.

Protesters vowed to continue until the government backed down.

Bernard Thibault, the C.G.T. leader, said, "If they don't listen to us, we are going to have to think about moving to a general strike across the entire country."

Jean-Claude Mailly, the leader of the leftist union, Force Ouvriere, said in a telephone interview after the protest, "The Prime Minister must understand that he must renounce" the labor law "before a true dialogue can begin."

Bruno Julliard, the leader of the student union that first organized the protests, threatened that if by Saturday night, "the government doesn't withdraw this initiative, we'll continue."

The protesters want the abolition of a new law — known as the First Employment Contract and set to take effect in April — that allows employers to fire new workers under the age of 26 without cause for two years.

Designed by the government to help ease the crisis of chronic high unemployment, particularly among poor youth after riots last fall in the suburbs, the law is seen by its opponents as a step toward eroding long-cherished employment rights and benefits.

Protesters point out that the law was pushed through Parliament without debate and charge that it is age discrimination. They have dubbed the law the "Kleenex contract" because young workers could be discarded like a facial tissue.

Unemployment in France is at almost 10 percent, and 23 percent of French citizens under 26 are jobless, one of the highest rates in Europe; in some of the major city suburbs, the figure is nearly double that.

President Jacques Chirac appealed on Friday for the marchers to show "calm and respect," and security police officers in riot gear were out in full force throughout France on Saturday.

Authorities were on alert for what they called "professional thugs" after street fights broke out late Thursday in Paris. The police used tear gas and water cannons to quell the violence.

The protests for the most part were peaceful.

Under sunny skies in Paris on Saturday afternoon, the police, anticipating trouble, urged shopkeepers along the march route to shut down.

But the demonstrations started with a party spirit, with balloons and music of the Rolling Stones and Madonna. Protesters were joined by parents with children. Officials from the major unions distributed banners and flags from the back of trucks. Vendors sold hotdogs and kebabs.

"I'm sick and tired of all these phony contracts and I want to protect my children's future," said Carole Cases, a 43-year-old nurse, with two of her children, from the Paris suburb of Noisy-le-Grand. "They're trying to dupe the young."

"Villepin, you nonelected jerk," read one banner. In a sign that spring, the season of protests and strikes in France, is coming, another banner read, "Long live spring."

There is little indication that the jobs measure is welcomed by unemployed youth in the suburbs, who are also worried that it does not provide any long-term job security.

"It's stupid," said Mariam Sidibe, a 17-year-old student of Malian descent from Les Mureaux, a working class suburb of Paris rocked by last fall's riots, who marched in Paris. "There's going to be more unemployment."

The police in Paris used tear gas to disperse a small band of youths who thraew bottles and stones at them at the Place de la Nation, on the right bank, the official end point of the protest. Protesters broke shop windows and one car was set afire.

In Lyon, French youths protesting the law clashed with Turks demonstrating against the construction of a memorial to Armenian victims of a 1915 massacre, Reuters reported. The youths shouted, "Fascists!" and "Go home!"

The two sides threw objects at each other and engaged in fistfights. The police used water cannons to disperse them.

In Marseille, the police used tear gas to disperse protesters who replaced the tricolor French flag at city hall with a black and red banner reading, "Anticapitalism and self-management."

In Nancy, about 200 youths blocked railroad tracks for an hour, throwing rocks at the police, who used tear gas against them.

In Rennes, protesters blocked a railway line for about an hour. The police used tear gas to disperse protesters who attacked the local office of the governing U.M.P. party.

The police are still investigating which groups or individuals were responsible for violence in the heart of Paris on Thursday evening.

It was during that protest that antiriot police fired tear gas to disperse bands of youth who threw rocks and bottles at police and burned a newspaper kiosk near the upscale Bon Marché department store. The police also used water cannons against protesters who had set fire to a bookstore and destroyed the terrace of a cafe in the square in front of the Sorbonne.

DOJ_NMG_0019126

Extreme right, extreme left and anarchist groups are being blamed for inciting trouble. The youth branch of the extreme right National Front, for example, has distributed antileftist leaflets that say, "Parasites, out of our universities."

About 300 people have been arrested in a week of protests. More than 100 police and 21 protesters have been injured.

In meeting with antiriot police officers on Friday, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, who, like Mr. de Villepin, hopes to run for president next year, held up a damaged police helmet for the cameras. "Those who do this are not demonstrators, they're thugs," he said.

Thus far, Mr. de Villepin, whose poll ratings have collapsed recently, has been the main target of criticism by the law's opponents, and Mr. Sarkozy has said little about its merits.

On Friday evening, Mr. de Villepin met with a group of university presidents who asked him to suspend the new measure for "a period of reflection" of six months.

"We told him that things are getting worse and that next week could prove very risky," said Yannick Vallée, first vice president of the conference of university presidents.

Mr. de Villepin called on protesters to end their blockades and allow nonstrikers to study. "We want students to be able to prepare confidently for their exams and to have the freedom to study," he said.

Well over half of France's 84 public universities remained either closed or partially closed because of student blockades, according to the Ministry of National Education. On Friday, students demanding the right to study demonstrated in Paris and several other university towns.

Rallies Across France Protest New Job Law (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Unions Bring Many Thousands to Streets

PARIS, March 18 -- Hundreds of thousands of demonstrators marched in anti-government protests Saturday across France, with the largest of the rallies ending in clashes between riot police and protesters at one of the largest plazas in Paris.

Teachers, unionized government employees and retired workers joined students in escalating demonstrations against a new law that would allow companies to fire employees under age 26 at will during their first two years of work.

Protesters jammed the streets of about 150 cities and towns in mostly peaceful, union-orchestrated demonstrations. On a perfect sunny day for a protest in Paris, families joined in the march, which began in an atmosphere of a friendly weekend outing of songs and chants with political overtones.

But as the hours-long parade drew to a close in the chill of the early evening darkness, several hundred protesters turned on police at the Place de la Nation in the southeastern part of the city, throwing stones, garbage and sticks at riot police who huddled behind protective shields.

Demonstrators smashed windows, burned a car and set a pile of boxes ablaze. City police said 14 protesters were detained and four officers were slightly injured in the standoff.

Union organizers said 1.5 million people participated in marches throughout the country, while police officials estimated the number at just more than 500,000.

The demonstrations have grown larger and have spread to more cities in recent days at the urging of France's powerful student and worker unions, creating a crisis for Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and his Union for a Popular Movement party as France heads toward presidential elections next year.

Villepin pushed the new law as a vehicle to prompt companies to hire more young people at a time when joblessness among that group averages 23 percent and exceeds 40 percent in some poor neighborhoods populated by immigrants and their French-born children. Villepin argued that under existing labor laws, employers were increasingly reluctant to hire young people because of job protections that make it all but impossible to fire workers, even if they are incompetent.

Young people and unions argue that the law -- expected to take effect in April -- will allow employers to discriminate against their youngest workers.

"It's always better to earn one franc than nothing," said Sophia Lamri, 23, a law school graduate interning at a law firm. "The government is just about to get rid of a social policy that took over a hundred years to build. Change shouldn't mean regression."

The new law has become the latest target of youth anger at a government that many young people believe has become increasingly divorced from them.

"People say the young people are lazy and can only think about how much money they'll make," said Jean-Francois Dessessard, who walked among the Paris protesters, one arm draped around his wife and the other resting on the shoulder of his 17-year-old daughter. "But they just want to have it like we had it when we were their age."

As the march passed the Prison de la Sante, inmates waved in support from behind wire mesh windows. A sign hung out one window declared "Chirac belongs here," a reference to President Jacques Chirac.

French Youths Riot Over Jobs Law (WT/AP)

By Angela Charlton, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 19, 2006

PARIS -- Police loosed water cannons and tear gas on rioting students, and activists rampaged through a McDonald's and attacked storefronts in the capital yesterday as demonstrations against a plan to relax job protections spread in a widening arc across France.

The protests, which drew an estimated 500,000 people in about 160 cities across the country, were the biggest show yet of escalating anger that is testing the strength of the conservative government before elections next year.

At the close of a march in Paris that drew a crowd of tens of thousands, seven officers and 17 protesters were injured during two melees, at the Place de la Nation in eastern Paris and the Sorbonne university. Police said they arrested 156 persons in the French capital.

Four cars were set afire, police said, and a McDonald's restaurant was attacked along with storefronts at the close of the march.

Tensions escalated later yesterday as about 500 youths moved on to the Sorbonne, trying to break through tall metal blockades erected after police stormed the Paris landmark a week ago to dislodge occupying students. The university has become a symbol of the protest.

Police turned water cannons on the protesters at the Sorbonne and were seen throwing youths to the ground, hitting them and dragging them into vans.

"Liberate the Sorbonne," some protesters shouted. "Police everywhere, justice nowhere." In an apparent effort to set fire to a police van serving as a blockade, protesters instead torched the entrance of a nearby Gap store, apparently by accident, engulfing the small porch in flames.

With commerce snarled in some cities, people asked whether Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin would stand firm on implementing the change that he says is needed to encourage hiring. The usually outspoken leader was silent yesterday.

Protest organizers urged President Jacques Chirac yesterday to prevent the law from taking effect as expected in April.

The group issued an ultimatum, saying it expects an answer by tomorrow, when leaders will decide whether to continue protests that have paralyzed at least 16 universities and dominated political discourse for weeks.

"We give them two days to see if they understand the message we've sent," said Remi Jouan of CFDT, France's largest union.

The law would allow businesses to fire young workers in the first two years on a job without giving a reason, removing them from protections that restrict layoffs of regular employees.

Companies are often reluctant to add employees because it is hard to let them go if business conditions worsen. Students see a subtext in the new law: make it easier to hire and fire to help France compete in a globalizing world economy.

Youth joblessness stands at 23 percent nationwide, and 50 percent among impoverished young people. The lack of work was blamed in part for the Muslim riots that shook France's depressed suburbs during the fall.

Protests yesterday reached every corner of France -- most of them largely peaceful -- with organizers citing 160 marches from the small provincial town of Rochefort in the southwest to the major city of Lyon in the southeast.

In Marseille, extreme-leftist youths climbed the facade of City Hall, replacing a French flag with a banner reading "Anti-capitalism." Police used tear gas to disperse them and made several arrests.

Police also fired tear gas at a protest in Clermont-Ferrand, a central city where 10,000 people marched and about 100 youths threw beer cans and other projectiles at a building.

The Paris protest march was the biggest, attracting some 80,000 people, according to police. Organizers put the number at 300,000.

Widespread discontent with the government has crystallized around a new type of job contract that Mr. de Villepin says will alleviate France's sky-high youth unemployment by getting companies to risk hiring young workers.

Critics say the contract abolishes labor protections crucial to the social fabric.

"Aren't we the future of France?" asked Aurelie Silan, a 20-year-old student who joined a river of protesters in Paris.

Government spokesman Jean-Francois Cope insisted on the need for a "spirit of dialogue." "The hand is extended; the door is open," he said on France-3 TV network. However, he limited dialogue to "improving" Mr. de Villepin's plan -- not withdrawing it.

DOJ_NMG_0019128

Waves of red union flags topped the densely packed crowd in Paris, which overflowed onto side streets and stretched more than 3½ miles under bright sunshine.

"Throw away the job contract; don't throw away the youth," chanted a group of students shaking tambourines. Many wore plastic bags to illustrate their feeling that the new law reduces young people to disposable workers.

Some demonstrators became violent as the march ended. Youths set a car on fire, smashed a shop window, trashed a bus stop and threw stones, golf balls and other objects at police. Police responded with tear gas during skirmishes that lasted several hours.

Mr. Chirac has pushed Mr. de Villepin to act "as quickly as possible" to defuse the crisis, but has backed the contested measure.

Dutch Convert To Islam: Veiled And Viewed As A 'Traitor' (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

A Woman's Experience Illustrates Europe's Struggle With Its Identity

BREDA, Netherlands -- Rabi'a Frank sees her Dutch home town through the narrow slit of the black veil that covers her face.

The looks she receives from the townspeople are seldom kindly.

On a recent winter afternoon, the wind tugged at her ankle-length taupe skirt, olive head scarf and black, rectangular face veil as she walked to her car from an Islamic prayer meeting in downtown Breda. Two blond teenagers on bicycles stared, their faces screwed into hostile snarls. Other passersby gawked. Some stepped off the sidewalk to avoid coming too near.

She tried to act like it didn't offend her. But it did. She knows what they think of Muslim women like her.

"If you cover yourself, you are oppressed -- that's it," said Frank, a lanky, 29-year-old Dutch woman who converted to Islam 11 years ago, about the time she married her Moroccan husband. "You are being brainwashed by your husband or your friends."

Or, you're a potential terrorist.

"Sometimes I make a joke and say, 'Oh, you don't have to be scared of me.' " Other times, she gets so fed up that she yanks up her hand under her robe like it's a pistol and shouts, "Boom!"

Frank spoke on a recent day in her living room in this city of 162,000 people near the Netherlands' southern border with Belgium. "They don't have the right to treat me different," she said. "It's like staring at someone in a wheelchair. It's not polite. I'm human, even if you don't like the way I appear."

This day-to-day struggle for acceptance on the streets of her home town is one woman's confrontation with a deepening rift in West European societies, where the emergence of a 15 million-member Muslim minority is reshaping concepts of national and personal identity.

Some European governments have passed laws they say are intended to help preserve national identity. Critics argue that the measures reflect Islamophobia and fears of terrorism triggered by the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and the subsequent transit bombings in Madrid and London.

The Netherlands, with nearly 1 million Muslims, almost 6 percent of its population, is particularly on edge. The 2002 assassination of an anti-immigrant politician, Pim Fortuyn, by an animal rights activist was followed by the execution-style murder in 2004 of the filmmaker Theo van Gogh, who had just released a controversial film seen as anti-Islamic. A young Muslim radical admitted to the killing.

A country with a history of tolerance is now adopting or debating some of the most restrictive anti-immigration and anti-Muslim laws in Europe. One proposed measure would ban women from wearing face veils, called niqab , in public. Another would outlaw the speaking of languages other than Dutch on the street.

Immigrants must learn some Dutch, pass a history and geography test and, to get a feel for whether they can live in this society, watch a film on Dutch culture that includes two gay men kissing and a topless woman walking on a beach.

Geert Wilders, a member of the Dutch parliament, said he was drafting a bill that would ban all immigration for the next five years. "Our culture is based on Christianity, Judaism and humanism," Wilders said in an interview in his tiny office in the parliament building in The Hague. "We should not be ashamed of it. This is who we are and who we should stay."

In Belgium, some cities have banned women from wearing face veils and burqas , which cover the entire body and face, in public places. A year ago, France barred women and girls from wearing head scarves in public schools. A London school district has imposed a similar ban.The Path of a Convert

For natives such as Frank who have converted to Islam, the hostility is often greater than that directed at immigrants.

"They think you are a traitor," said Frank, whose thin, pale face is framed by long blondish-brown curls. "You're not acting like a Dutch girl anymore.

DOJ_NMG_0019129

"I'm a Muslim, a woman and also Dutch," she continued. "What upsets people is that I'm a Muslim first."

Frank can recall the instant she decided to wear a face veil: She had just stepped into Amsterdam's Schiphol Airport last year after making her first hajj, or pilgrimage to Mecca, and going to Medina, in Saudi Arabia. They are the holiest sites in Islam.

It is more difficult, she said, to describe the evolution that took the former Rebecca Frank to her dramatic decision.

It began at age 14 as teenage defiance. She developed a crush on a 16-year-old Moroccan boy named Ali who had moved to the Netherlands as a child with his parents. He was exotic, he was different -- and, to the daughter of a Catholic mother and a Jewish father, he was off-limits.

Over the years, as the relationship became more serious, Ali told Rebecca he could not marry her because she was not Muslim, even though he was not particularly religious. It's not about Islam, he explained, it's about culture.

Without consulting him, she began reading books about Moroccan culture and Islam. Then she decided to read the Koran. "I felt like, 'This is it,' " said Frank, whose parents were divorced and who, like many teenagers, was searching for an identity.

When Ali took her to meet his mother and announced they planned to marry, his mother said she would "break both legs" if he did that, Frank said. Her future husband didn't see his family for the next three months.

Her own mother was so upset over the wedding that she brought flowers to the 18-year-old bride, broke down in tears and left before the Islamic ceremony began. Her father did attend the wedding.Clothing as a Statement

Like most of her Muslim convert friends, Frank said, she found that the process of fully embracing Islamic thinking and dress was gradual. But eventually the clothing became the outward statement of her identity. "I smiled at all the Muslim women I saw in the streets," she said. "But to them, I was just a plain Dutch girl with brown hair and blue eyes. I wanted to be recognized as a Muslim woman."

She changed her name from Rebecca to Rabi'a and began giving lectures about Islam. After she published an article on Islam in a local newspaper, a woman wrote her a letter demanding: "Go back to your own country."

"I'm in it now!" she thought angrily.

The more Frank studied her religion, the more convinced she became that she should take the final step and wear not only a head scarf but a face veil. "It took me two years to convince my husband I wanted to do it," Frank said. "He really didn't want me to wear it because of the reaction when we go out together."

Frank had begun focusing on the words of one of the Koran's foremost ancient interpreters, Rasulullah, who warned that "a woman who reveals her body" violates the tenets of Islam.

During her pilgrimage to Saudi Arabia with her husband and mother-in-law, she covered her face in public for the first time. Far from feeling oppressed, she said, she felt liberated.

"It's like the song," Frank said. She began softly singing the English lyrics of "The Veil," a popular song on Muslim Web sites.

They tell her, 'Girl, don't you know this is the West and you are free?

You don't need to be oppressed, ashamed of your femininity.'

She just shakes her head and speaks so assuredly. . . .

This Hijab, this mark of piety

Is an act of faith, a symbol

For all the world to see.

But on the streets of Breda, covered by her veil, Frank stands out as an anomaly -- a curiosity to some, a freak to others.

A few weeks ago, her middle son, 7-year-old Ismail, pleaded with her, "Why don't you take it off? The children are laughing at you at school."

"I won't take it off," she insisted. "For me, it's like driving a car without a seat belt."

She gazed out her living room window at the street that winds through her suburban enclave of brick townhouses and front gardens browned by winter frosts.

"I am a Muslim," she said with finality. "That's my identity."

Spain Scrambles To Cope With Tide Of African Migrants (NYT)

By Renwick Mclean

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

MADRID, March 18 — Spain's deputy prime minister began an emergency visit to the Canary Islands on Saturday to discuss ways to control a record flow of African migrants arriving in boats from Mauritania that has led to at least 25 deaths in the last week.

The Spanish government says more than 1,000 migrants have been detained at sea in the last 10 days while trying to reach the islands from Mauritania on North Africa's western coast, a voyage of 500 miles.

DOJ_NMG_0019130

The migrants, mostly sub-Saharan Africans, crowd into boats carrying dozens of passengers in hopes of reaching the islands and thereby gaining entry to the European Union.

The detentions have overwhelmed government and Red Cross officials on the islands, prompting them to ask residents to provide clothes and mattresses and to ask Spanish and European Union authorities for help.

"We've never seen anything like this," said an official in the central government's offices on the islands, who followed Spanish protocol by requesting anonymity to avoid upstaging his superiors.

The government of Mauritania has said that without aid from abroad it is practically helpless against the vast numbers of migrants who are collecting within its borders in hopes of going to the islands.

Before traveling to the islands on Saturday, Spain's deputy prime minister, María Teresa Fernández de la Vega, said the Spanish government would do all it could to help stem the flow of migrants and to help care for those who had been detained, many of whom arrive malnourished, dehydrated and in serious need of medical attention.

Juan Antonio Corujo Machín, a Red Cross official on the islands, said, "Most of them are completely disoriented when they arrive."

The Canary Islands, which are 70 miles off Morocco's southwestern coast, have been drawing boatloads of illegal migrants since 1995. They became a particularly popular destination in 2002, when close monitoring at the Strait of Gibraltar persuaded many migrants to look for an alternative route to Spain.

Immigration to the islands slowed over the last couple of years, partly because of a crackdown by Moroccan authorities.

In 2005, more than 4,700 migrants were detained while trying to reach the Canary Islands, down from 8,500 the year before, according to figures from the Spanish government.

The trend appears to be reversing itself this year, however. After less than three months, the number of detentions has already surpassed 3,500.

According to Spanish officials, the resurgence suggests that the Moroccan crackdown has been less effective than previously thought, because the migrants have responded by pushing their departure point south to Mauritania.

The change can add hundreds of miles to the journey, increasing the chances that the boats will wander off course, capsize or otherwise be lost at sea.

Even for migrants who are relatively well prepared, the journey can be hazardous.

All of the 25 bodies found off the coast of Mauritania this week were wearing life jackets, and one had a Global Positioning System navigator, the Spanish government said. The majority of the migrants appear to be departing from Nuadibu, in the north of Mauritania, Spanish officials said. Mauritania has estimated that more than 10,000 potential migrants have gathered in the city in hopes of reaching Spain.

U.S. Warships And Piracy Suspects Exchange Gunfire (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, March 18 (AP) — Two United States Navy warships exchanged gunfire with people suspected of being pirates Saturday off the coast of Somalia, killing one of them and wounding five, the Navy said.

No American sailors were wounded and 12 suspects, whose nationalities were not known, were taken into custody, said Lt. Cmdr. Charlie Brown, spokesman for the Navy's Fifth Fleet.

The battle started about 25 miles off the Somali coast when the American warships Cape St. George and Gonzalez spotted a 30-foot fishing boat towing skiffs and prepared to board the vessels. The suspects were holding what appeared to be rocket-propelled grenade launchers, the Navy said. When the suspects began shooting, naval gunners returned fire with mounted machine guns.

Navy Warships Fire On Suspected Pirates Off Somalia, Killing One (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, March 19, 2006

Two U.S. warships opened fire on suspected pirates in a small boat in the Indian Ocean off the coast of Somalia yesterday when the pirates brandished shoulder-fired rocket launchers at the ships as they approached, the Navy said.

One of the pirates was killed and five were wounded, the Navy said. Twelve suspects were taken into custody. Sailors worked into the night to quell a fire on the suspected pirate craft ignited by the warships' machine guns. No Americans were injured.

Cmdr. Jeff Breslau, a spokesman for the U.S. Navy Central Command at Bahrain, said the USS Cape St. George, a guided-missile cruiser, and the USS Gonzalez, a guided-missile destroyer, were conducting security patrols in international waters off Somalia's central coast when they spotted a small utility boat towing a pair of skiffs.

"All three were wooden boats," Breslau said in a telephone interview from Bahrain. "They were about 25 miles off the coast and heading west, toward shore." Breslau said the incident occurred at 5:40 a.m. local time.

He said the waters off Somalia, a country that has been in turmoil for the past 15 years, are infested with pirates, seaborne armed robbers who board any boat or ship they can approach and rob the crew at gunpoint.

"A lot of it is targets of opportunity," he said. "They'll take over fishing or merchant vessels, then head back to territorial waters where they demand a ransom." Under international law, watercraft in territorial waters cannot be easily boarded by foreign flagged ships.

Breslau said Cape St. George and Gonzalez, both based in Norfolk, were part of Task Force 150, which oversees security operations and interdictions at the Arabian Sea approaches to the Gulf of Aden and the Gulf of Oman. "The main focus," he said, "is to prevent terrorists from using the sea."

Breslau said the suspected pirate vessel was less than 40 feet long and either had two smaller skiffs in tow or was leading them toward shore. Cape St. George is 567 feet long, and Gonzalez is 505 feet long. Both ships are armed with Tomahawk cruise missiles and an arsenal of other weapons.

The warships were maneuvering to come alongside the suspect boat in preparation for boarding and search when the pirates opened fire with automatic rifles and a rocket-propelled grenade launcher, Breslau said. Sailors manning machine guns on board the warships returned fire, he added.

"There is one confirmed dead and five injured," Breslau said. "We took 12 people into custody, including the injured men." He said the firefight ignited the suspects' vessel, but sailors were working to put out the blaze in hopes of salvaging documents or other intelligence materials.

Congo Warlord Handed To International Court (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

THE HAGUE, March 18 — A Congolese militia leader accused of abducting children and turning them into soldiers and sex slaves has become the first suspect to be delivered to the new International Criminal Court, the chief prosecutor announced Saturday.

The former warlord, Thomas Lubanga, arrived at the court's detention center in The Hague late Friday after being flown here on a French military plane, the prosecutor said. Mr. Lubanga had been imprisoned since last year in Congo, whose authorities handed him over to the court for trial.

"He has been accused of conscripting and enlisting children under the age of 15 into armed groups and using them in hostilities," the prosecutor, Luis Moreno-Ocampo, said at a news conference. The crimes involved were "extremely serious," he said. "Throughout the world, children are being trained to become machines of war."

Mr. Lubanga is scheduled to appear at a court hearing on Monday, the start of a new phase in the history of the I.C.C. The court, the first permanent international war crimes court, was founded in The Hague in 2002 over the objections of the United States.

Mr. Lubanga, 45, was the founder and leader of the Union of Congolese Patriots, one of the most dangerous militias in the Congo's northeastern Ituri district.

Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said that investigators had worked for months in the region almost surreptitiously because armed groups were still active in the area "and they could kill our witnesses." He said that further charges against the militia leader were still being prepared, but much evidence was already available, including photographs from camps where children as young as 7 were being trained to become soldiers.

According to Unicef, the United Nations children's aid agency, an estimated 30,000 children, most of them abducted, have been used by armed groups in Congo as fighters, messengers, cooks and sex slaves.

Mr. Lubanga's case will be one in a series of cases against militia leaders in Congolese-Rwandan border region, the prosecutor said.

The militias have been financed and supplied by a number of countries, including Uganda and Rwanda, in a fight over a region rich in minerals and timber.

"We think this is an important first step and we urge the prosecutor to go further and higher, up to the political actors who were manipulating these militias for their own ends," said Richard Dicker, a director of Human Rights Watch, based in New York.

Wonderful World? (NYT)

By James Traub

The New York Times, March 19, 2006

We live in a world that is objectively more dangerous than the one we knew at the outset of the millennium; whatever our disagreements, since 9/11 both our foreign policy and our domestic politics have pivoted around this ineluctable fact. And because the terrorists who struck us represent a global phenomenon, we assume that the world is objectively more dangerous for everyone. But is it?

The answer, it seems, is no. In recent years, scholars have been gathering data in an attempt to measure global trends in conflict and violence. The emerging view is that conflict worldwide is in fact diminishing, not growing. According to "Human Security Report 2005," a study that relies on this recent scholarship, the number of armed conflicts has been dropping steadily since the end of the cold war. Major civil wars, which exploded around the world between 1946 and 1991, declined sharply in the ensuing decade. Indeed, the trend holds true for virtually every category of conflict — coups, interstate wars and even genocides and so-called politicides, in which political belief rather than ethnicity is the criterion for killing. The only exception is international terrorism — as we know all too well.

The study, issued by the Human Security Center, a policy institute at the University of British Columbia, is not entirely convincing. Because, for example, no sound metric exists for tallying them, the "indirect deaths" caused by conflicts that uproot vast numbers of people, disrupt agriculture and shatter health-care systems have not been counted.

Nevertheless, once we get past our initial disbelief, the notion that we live in an era of comparative peace shouldn't be so surprising. Colonial struggles largely ended by the mid-70's. Cold-war proxy battles also ended. And over the last decade or so, the international community has developed a set of mechanisms to put the brakes on incipient warfare. In fact, the authors of the study argue that "the single most compelling explanation" for the decrease in conflict is that preventive diplomacy and peacemaking missions, as well as U.N. peacekeeping operations, which had been almost impossible to mount during the cold war, now accompany almost every major crisis. As a result, outright warfare is now concentrated, albeit to an extraordinary degree, in one area — sub-Saharan Africa. Entire regions that were strife-torn 20 or 30 years ago, including East and Southeast Asia, are largely peaceful today. North Africa is quiet; Latin America suffers from political instability but not warfare.

This is certainly good news, especially for the beleaguered United Nations. But it does nothing to relieve our own sense of vulnerability, since terrorists are not amenable to negotiation or peacekeeping. You can, therefore, draw a troubling inference from the data, which is that for all the talk of "globalized" threats, the American experience of the world is becoming less, not more, similar to that of our allies and trading partners. Our world has become more dangerous; theirs, with some important exceptions, less so.

Why is it so hard for Americans to recognize how very different the world appears when seen from beyond our borders? The authors of "Human Security Report" hypothesize that myths about a rising tide of violence propagated by the media or international organizations "reinforce popular assumptions." O.K., but why the popular assumptions? Why are our intuitions about both the past and the present so far from the reality?

The answer has to do with fundamental differences between the cold war and the Age of Terror. In the cold war, the chief combatants never fought one another — thus the "coldness" of the war between them. The rest of the world was aflame with proxy combats, but the fear of provoking nuclear war served as a heat shield for the West. The authors of "Human Security Report" note that the scholarly description of the post-World War II era as the "long peace" is "deeply misleading." But psychologically it was accurate.

Now the relationship between threat and actual fatalities has been reversed. International terrorism has killed an average of 1,000 people a year over the last 30 years, according to "Human Security Report." That's not a lot. But the threat of terrorism is out of all proportion to its lethality; that is, in a way, the whole point of terrorism. It is true that since 9/11, nothing has happened in the United States, but anything can happen, anywhere, at any time. And of course something has happened. We all had nuclear nightmares in the depths of the cold war, but we recognized them as nightmares, or as scenes from apocalyptic movies. Yet in the case of terrorism, we had the apocalypse before we even had the nightmare. And so while we may accept the idea that we live in a less-war-torn age, the mind rebels at the thought that we live in a less dangerous age.

But that's us; it's not even "the West." In his famous essay "Of Paradise and Power," Robert Kagan argued that Europeans have stepped out of the Hobbesian world of anarchy — our world — into their own Kantian world of "perpetual peace." With Islamic terrorism a growing threat in Europe, Kagan's Mars/Venus distinction may not be quite as salient as it seemed. But outside the West, where in general the world really does feel less lethal than it used to, President Bush has had a very hard time enlisting allies in the war on terror. Many developing nations would rather talk about development and trade than about sleeper cells. Yet we need their help in the fight against terrorism.

The Bush administration has discovered the hard way that diplomacy is more difficult today — and arguably more important — than it was during the cold war. You can only hope that this discovery points toward a wiser and more supple view of the world we have been forced to inhabit.

The Morning Update

Today, President Bush will meet with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer to discuss efforts to strengthen and transform NATO and the Alliance's contributions to transatlantic and global security.

The President will also travel to Cleveland, Ohio, to discuss our work with all elements of Iraqi society to remove the terrorists and restore order in Iraqi cities, to rebuild homes and communities, and achieve stability. The President will highlight concrete examples of real progress and how the strategy for victory is succeeding.

From Today's Morning Headlines

President Bush Marks The Third-Year Anniversary Of Operation Iraqi Freedom. "President Bush called Sunday a 'time to reflect' about the sacrifices of U.S. troops in Iraq over the past three years. <http://www.usatoday.com/news/washington/2006-03-19-iraq-assessments_x.htm> He said he was pleased by Iraqi efforts toward democracy. ...
Speaking to reporters upon his return from Camp David, Bush said he talked by phone Sunday morning with the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and came away 'encouraged by the progress' the Iraqi government is making to establish a balance across Sunni Arab, Shiite Muslim and Kurdish factions." (John Diamond, "Assessments At Odds On War's Anniversary," USA Today, 3/20/06)

Vice President Cheney Discusses The Political Progress Made By Iraqis.
THE VICE PRESIDENT: "The facts are pretty straightforward. The Iraqis have met every single political deadline that's been set for them. <http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2006/02/26/ftn/main1346210.shtml> They haven't missed a single one. They took over, in terms of sovereignty, 21 months ago. They held national elections the following January. They wrote a constitution - one of the best constitutions in that part of the world. They held a referendum on it last October, and last December, had turnout of about 78 percent in terms of the election, and now are putting together a government which they'll form up here shortly." (CBS' "Face The Nation," 3/19/06)

Iraqi Leaders Make Progress In Negotiations To Form A New National Government. "Iraqi officials announced Sunday that they had agreed to form a council of the country's top politicians to make policy on security and economic issues in the new government. The council, which will include the prime minister and president, is an attempt to include all the country's major factions in decision making at a time of rising sectarian tensions. ... 'It's a good thing,' said Adnan Pachachi, the temporary speaker of Parliament and a secular politician. 'It's a safety valve in a way. Decisions will be taken in which all major political parties will be part of. No one will accuse the prime minister of making decisions on his own. <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/03/20/international/middleeast/20iraq.html?_r=1&oref=slogin&pagewanted=print> '" (Edward Wong, "Top Iraqi Leaders Agree To Form A Policy Council," The New York Times, 3/20/06)

Secretary Rumsfeld Highlights The Growing And More Capable Iraqi Security Forces. "Today, some 100

Iraqi army battalions of several hundred troops each are in the fight, and 49 control their own battle space.
<http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2006/03/17/AR20060
31701797.html> About 75 percent of all military operations in the country include Iraqi security forces, and nearly half of those are independently Iraqi-planned, Iraqi-conducted and Iraqi-led. Iraqi security forces have a greater ability than coalition troops to detect a foreign terrorist's accent, identify local suspects and use force without increasing a feeling of occupation. It was these Iraqi forces - not U.S. or coalition troops - that enforced curfews and contained the violence after the attack on the Golden Dome Shrine in Samarra. To be sure, violence of various stripes continues to slow Iraq's progress. But the coalition is doing everything possible to see this effort succeed and is making adjustments as appropriate." (Sec. Donald Rumsfeld, Op-Ed, "What We've Gained In 3 Years In Iraq," The Washington Post, 3/19/06)

General Casey Discusses The Situation On The Ground In Iraq. GEN.
CASEY: "There is - is there terrorist violence in Iraq? Yes, there is.
Is there terrorist violence in Iraq designed to foment sectarian strife?
Yes, there is. But we're a long way from civil war. Let me give you an example. In 15 of the 18 provinces, there are six or less attacks a day across Iraq. That includes all the sectarian strife. That's an average.
In 12 of the provinces, there's two or less attacks a day. So violence is not raging rampantly across Iraq. That's, frankly, what the terrorists and the insurgents want you to believe." (CNN's "Late Edition," 3/19/06)

Rep. Christopher Shays (R-CT) Writes About The Importance Of Winning The War In Iraq. "American credibility in Iraq and across the Middle East has been invested in the outcome of these efforts. Any decision to disengage prematurely for our political convenience squanders that investment. Any judgment that a fractious Iraq is just not ready for democracy betrays our well-earned faith in the universal rights of the men and women so brutally oppressed by the regime of Saddam. Success in Iraq will not be measured in terms of declining U.S. troops, but in the growing number of Iraqis willing to put aside religious, tribal and ethnic divisions to fight, vote and pray for the future of their emerging democratic state. I have traveled to Iraq 11 times since 2003 and have met remarkable people. When I ask them what their biggest fear is, it is not the violence. It is 'that you will leave us.

The New York Times Profiles Donald Powell's Work In The Gulf Coast Region. "With Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and Mayor C. Ray Nagin at his side, Mr. Powell announced that the president would seek $4.2 billion more for Louisiana to compensate homeowners - even those in the flood plain. Mr. Powell's epiphany came after hours of listening to Louisianians: the decision makers; the woman who cleaned his room at the Sheraton; Victoria Reggie Kennedy, the wife of Senator Edward M. Kennedy (whom he called after hearing she was a Louisiana native); the inspectors examining high-water marks in homes. ... 'He had a learning experience,' said Walter Isaacson, vice chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority. 'It's the most amazing thing for somebody of his stature. It's because by himself, he walked around. He walked around and talked to people.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge To Allow New Aviation Witnesses In Moussaoui Trial. Judge Leonie Brinkema yesterday ruled prosecutors in the death sentence trial of al Qaeda member Zacarias Moussaoui will be permitted to present new aviation witnesses in lieu of the witnesses whose testimony was tainted by the actions of a Transportation Security Administration lawyer.

NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 5, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This means the Justice Department can put on a more a or less complete case, arguing that if Moussaoui had not lied when he was arrested, the government could have beefed up airport security and might have blocked the hijackers. But all the preparation the prosecution has done on this point, Power Point presentations and charts, that is all tossed out, still considered tainted by the TSA lawyer. So it will be a nearly complete case, but just not as polished one." The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 5, Schieffer, 7.66M) also reported the story in a brief segment.

The New York Times (3/18, Lewis, 1.19M) adds, "The question remains as to whether it is possible to find new witnesses who are not only untainted, as the judge has required, but familiar enough with the state of aviation security in August 2001 to help support the government's case." In a front page story, the Washington Post (3/18, A1, Markon, 744K) calls it "an extraordinary week." Legal experts say "the week's events still leave prosecutors in a tough spot" as they "are left to scramble to find new witnesses."

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Serrano, 958K) reports that while "prosecutors will be working from a marked disadvantage, with much of the central part of their case stricken from the trial," they say they will "call one witness to explain" do not fly lists "and how they are used to keep suspected terrorists from boarding commercial aircraft.' This, they said, 'will allow us to present our complete theory of the case, albeit in imperfect form.'" The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/18, 424K) covered this story under the headline "Moussaoui ruling salvages the trial." The Washington Times (3/18, Seper, 90K) and the AP (3/18, Barakat, Sniffen) also covered this story.

Prosecution, Defense At Odds Over When Martin Will Testify. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Serrano) reports, "With the sentencing trial for Zacarias Moussaoui stumbling forward again, lawyers for the two sides were sharply at odds Saturday over when" TSA attorney Carla Martin "would testify about why she tried to influence witnesses." Prosecutors want her to appear at "the middle of the week and…testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment," but "defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said in court papers that he wanted Martin on the stand after he finished cross-examining FBI Special Agent Harry Samit on Monday morning."

Specter Introduces Bill For Oversight Of Warrantless Spying. The Washington Times (3/18, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter introduced a bill this week to increase congressional oversight of President Bush's warrantless spy program and require a court review of the program for its constitutionality," saying that "rule of law takes precedent even when the nation is at war with a new type of enemy capable of exploiting modern technology."

US Asks Judge To Reconsider Eavesdropping Order In 9/11 Detainee Civil Suit. The New York Times (3/18, Bernstein) reports that in the civil lawsuit by Muslims "swept up" in the post-9/11 US terrorism investigations, US Magistrate Judge Steven M. Gold "ordered the government on March 7 to guarantee in writing that neither the litigation team nor the potential witnesses — who include the F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III — were aware" of secret eavesdropping on plaintiffs and their lawyers, "and that no such evidence would be used in the case." But on Friday, asking Gold to reconsider the order, "Stephen E. Handler of the Justice Department wrote in a filing…that if knowledge of such activity were denied in one case, a refusal to confirm or deny it in another case 'could itself tend to reveal classified information.'" NYU law professor Stephen J. Schulhofer said the filing "'is a pretty clear red flag' that eavesdropping occurred in the detainees' case."

Pentagon Hired Company That Bribed Cunningham To Help Collect Data On US Sites. Knight Ridder (3/18, Landay) reports that the Pentagon's Joint Counter-Intelligence Field Activity, CIFA, which "kept files on American anti-war activists hired" MZM

Inc., "one of the contractors who bribed former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, R-Calif., to help it collect data on houses of worship, schools, power plants and other locations in the United States."

Foreign Firms Important Pentagon Contractors. The Washington Post (3/18, D1, Mccarthy, 744K) reports, "Foreign-owned companies already help manage some of the nation's most sensitive business, working on classified weapons and information programs and dealing daily with government secrets," and "with joint defense projects among allies common, and the need for the best technology ever more acute, contracting experts say they expect the trend" of granting more foreign companies classified access "to continue." Still, "foreign-owned or controlled companies that work with classified information are subject to a special set of rules."

US Port Operator May Find Selling Difficult After Ports Controversy. The Financial Times (3/18, Wright) reports, "SSA Marine, the largest US-based container terminal operator, has taken on Citigroup to advise on a possible sale in a move that could reignite controversy about the ownership of US port operations." However, the DP World controversy "is understood to be deterring some of the world's largest terminal operators from looking at SSA's US assets," so "it could prove harder to sell SSA's US assets than its international business since foreign buyers are likely to shy away from entering the market and few domestic operators are large enough to make the purchase."

FBI "Source" Reported Seeing Top Al Qaeda Figures At Lodi Mosque. The Lodi News-Sentinel (3/18, Bohm) reports, "Osama bin Laden's right-hand man isn't the only Taliban member alleged to have once visited Lodi. An FBI 'source who is in a position to testify' told agents that he had seen two wanted terrorists visiting the Lodi Muslim Mosque and raising funds in 1999, according to federal court documents filed late Thursday night. … On Nov. 15, 2001, the source told agents that al-Zawahri was seen" at the Lodi mosque with Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed Al-Nasser, charged in the Khobar Towers bombing, and Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali, charged in the bombings of US embassies in Africa. "Lodi Muslims deny that the Taliban members stayed in Lodi. FBI spokeswoman Karen Ernst said Friday that she could not comment because it's an ongoing investigation and the matter is in trial." The Stockton Record (3/18, Hood) notes that the "heavily censored FBI reports" filed Thursday do not identify the source as FBI informant Naseem Khan – who earlier testified to seeing al Zawahri at the mosque – "but prosecutors handed over the documents in response to defense attorneys' demands for information relating to Khan, who is expected to return to the witness stand Tuesday." Hamid Hayat's lawyer, Wazhma Mojaddidi, "wants those blacked-out portions revealed. U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. will hear arguments on the matter Monday."

Lodi Muslims Find Claims Dubious. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/18, Zamora, Martin) reports, "An FBI informant's claims that three of the world's most-wanted terrorism suspects passed through town in recent years are outrageous and could damage the federal government's case against two local men, residents and legal experts said Friday." Lodi mosque leader Mohammed Shoaib said, "I think the FBI should rely on more-reliable informants. I am an American citizen, and I love this country. They never talked to me." The Chronicle adds that although "the revelations could cause problems for the federal government if the jury feels that Khan's credibility is an issue," former US Attorney Kendall Coffey "and defense lawyer James Brosnahan said the government may be able to counter any credibility problems with Khan if corroborating evidence against the Hayats, including FBI interviews with them, is strong."

Toledo Terror Suspect's Lawyer Seeks Information On Recording Of Conversations. The Toledo Blade (3/18) reports, "An attorney for accused terrorist Mohammad Zaki Amawi has asked a federal judge for assurances that the government will not be recording his conversations with his client." On Friday, public defender Dennis Terez "filed a motion yesterday in U.S. District Court in Toledo asking for comprehensive information about federal agents' use of monitoring attorney-client communications." Attorneys for co-defendants Wassim I. Mazloum and Marwan Othman El-Hindi "said they plan to file similar motions on behalf of their clients very soon."

Bond Denied For Florida Doctor Accused Of Taking Al Qaeda Loyalty Oath. The Miami Herald (3/18, Benn) reports US District Judge Loretta Preska on Friday denied bond for Florida doctor Rafiq A. Sabir, who "will continue to be held in solitary confinement in a New York prison until his trial on charges of conspiring to support

Osama bin Laden's terrorist network. … Sabir was arrested at his Palm Beach County home last May, days after investigators claim he recited an oath of loyalty in front of an undercover FBI agent."

Summaries Of FBI Wiretaps Said To Contradict Hammoudeh Indictment. The St. Petersburg Times (3/18, Laughlin) reports the indictment of Sami al Arian codefendant Sameeh Hammoudeh "accused him of 'transferring monies and funds…for the purpose of promoting PIJ activities,'" but "summaries of the wiretapped conversations that the government used to justify this accusation seem to undercut the charges." The Times cites three FBI tech cuts and adds, "federal prosecutors declined to comment on repeated contradictions between information in the indictment and the tech cuts," but "former FBI agent and federal prosecutor Todd Foster didn't." Foster referred to the Aisenberg case in 1997, which also "was built on secret surveillance of the defendants' conversations," calling it "a shocking example of how wiretap information in an indictment can be full of missing statements, statements taken out of context and false statements."

Administration Seeks Dismissal Of Guantanamo Bay Suits. The AP (3/18) reports, "The Bush administration argued Friday that a newly enacted law wipes out hundreds of pending court cases by detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who are challenging their confinement." However, "lawyers for the detainees say the new law does not cover pre-existing cases filed in U.S. District Courts."

Judge Orders DOJ To Release New York Mosque Material. The Albany Times-Union (3/18, Lyons) reports, "A federal judge has ordered the Justice Department to turn over certain classified materials to attorneys for two members of an Albany mosque who were ensnared in an FBI counterterrorism sting." The Times-Union continues, "The judge's ruling allows prosecutors to withhold some of their top-secret files in the case, and it's not clear what information will be disclosed or how soon it might become public. … The information may provide more details on why the FBI launched a sting three years ago that targeted Yassin Aref, a 35-year-old Kurdish refugee who is being held in jail without bond while awaiting trial on terrorism-related charges." The Times-Union adds, "Federal prosecutors have the option of appealing the order issued late Thursday by U.S. District Court Judge Thomas J. McAvoy, but said they won't. … McAvoy's decision comes after more than 20 meetings between the judge and federal prosecutors in which they had haggled, in private, about what classified information the government must disclose so the men can defend themselves at trial. … 'The government intends to comply with the court's order,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak."

Pakistan's UN Spokesman Affirms Converging Interests. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M), Mansoor Suhail, press minister at Pakistan's UN mission, writes, "Mahnaz Ispahani's March 3 editorial-page commentary 'Our Man in Pakistan' is based on wrong assumptions and analysis, but, paradoxically, draws the right conclusion: The US must remain engaged with Pakistan. President Pervez Musharraf's government's cooperation with the US is based on the convergence of Pakistan-US interests both tactical and strategic." He continues, "Pakistan is in the frontline of the war on terrorism," and the "US also needs nuclear Pakistan's cooperation to prevent proliferation and ensure peace in South Asia, which is essential to realize US commercial and strategic goals in the region."

NYTimes Praises Bloomberg's Handling Imam's Comments. The New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) editorializes that New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg's response to chief chaplain for the New York City Corrections Department, Imam Umar Abdul-Jalil, saying "the greatest terrorists in the world occupy the White House," was "a Solomonic solution" that "also found his voice on an issue that has challenged his administration in the past: free speech." The Mayor "took wide-ranging swipes at the right and the left for stifling the airing of unpopular or offensive opinions" and "stood up for immigrants, the free press, fair elections and justice" by allowing the Imam to keep his job but adding a suspension "without pay for two weeks for his failure to disclose that he had been speaking as a private citizen, not as a city employee. It was a fair outcome."

Ahern Seeks Information On CIA Rendition Flights. Focusing on a more controversial angle, the AP (3/18, Riechmann) in an article titled "Ahern Asks Bush About CIA Flights Over EU" led its article on Bush's meeting with

Ahern reporting Ahern "asked the president for more 'transparency' about CIA flights over Europe." He "said that while Ireland facilitates U.S. troop movements, and is 'happy to do it,' there is public concern over the CIA flights." He said "that it would be easier for him to explain the flights in his country if he knew more about them. 'We are going to continue to look at, perhaps, how we might bring more transparency to that process, if that's possible.'" The Washington Post ran the AP article in its coverage of Bush's meeting with Ahern.

IRA Leader Adams Detained At Reagan National Airport. The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/18) reports, "Gerry Adams, leader of the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party in Northern Ireland, was detained at Reagan National Airport after attending a St. Patrick's Day event at the White House, according to" Rep. Brian Higgins. Higgins "had invited Adams to speak in Buffalo, N.Y., said Adams' name appeared on a terrorism watch list, triggering a lengthy inspection. Because of the delay, Adams missed his speaking engagement, Higgins said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Markey Criticizes TSA For Failure To Screen For Explosives. NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 6, 2:20, Myers, 9.87M) reported, "Four and a half years after 9/11, government investigators got materials for homemade bombs through security at 21 airports, every airport tested." Rep. Ed Markey "says this proves that the Transportation Security Administration has not improved safety nearly enough." Rep. Edward Markey: "TSA is way behind. TSA has put a beware-of-dogs sign on the lawn but not purchased a guard dog." Myers: "Analysts say detecting materials for homemade bombs is not easy because the ingredients themselves aren't dangerous, or explosive, until combined with other materials. TSA says it now considers explosives the number one threat. And today the top official argued that even though bomb materials got through the screeners, there are many other layers of security to keep terrorists with bombs off planes." TSA Director Kip Hawley: "Any one piece can be beatable, but it's the combination of many put together that we believe is very secure." TSA "argues that it needs more money to improve technology and hire more officers."

The Dallas Morning News (3/18, Mittelstadt) adds, "The head of the Transportation Security Administration, which oversees nearly 43,000 screeners at 429 commercial airports, didn't quarrel with the GAO analysis – and in fact termed it helpful as his agency focuses on its top mission: intercepting improvised explosive devices." However advocates note that "the GAO testing doesn't take into account the many layers of security that occur before passengers reach the screening checkpoint and once they're through."

White House To Host Smallpox Drill. The AP (3/18) reports, "Cabinet secretaries and other top officials are gathering at the White House complex Saturday to act out the roles they would play in a smallpox outbreak." White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the "four-hour drill, designed to test the federal government's smallpox response plans, won't be attended by the president."

WPost Calls For Changes In Real ID Act. The Washington Post (3/18, A20, 744K) editorializes, "When Congress passed the Real ID Act last year, it presumably did not intend to prevent human rights victims all over the world from entering the United States," but "its effects have been cruel to people already oppressed by vile regimes and terrorist groups. The law needs to be changed," as "the legal definitions of terrorism, terrorist organizations and material support are so broad that they include countless people who deserve the United States' protection, not exclusion." While "the problem could be alleviated if the administration would use" its waiver authority "aggressively," it "would address only some of the cases, and only by having the government forgiving 'terrorism' on the part of refugees whom it should not be labeling terrorists in the first place."

Silverstein Offer To Talk On WTC Rebuilding Rebuffed By Port Authority. The New York Times (3/18, Bagli, 1.19M) reports that although talks "abruptly broke off late Tuesday night, "it looked as if the stalled talks over financing and rebuilding at ground zero could resume next week." Developer Larry A. Silverstein, "eager to restart the talks," made a new offer, which the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey rejected. However it "said it would unveil its own proposal for the site next week." The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Frangos, 2.11M) adds that a person close to the talks said "Mr. Silverstein's revised proposal closes the gap between the two sides and contains some new ideas."

WSJournal Criticizes Government For Ground Zero Delays. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M) editorializes, "The failure to even begin rebuilding Ground Zero is a disgrace, but it's also a classic display of New York's dysfunctional political culture." New York Governor George Pataki is "the politician with the most responsibility here," and he "knows that when you're in trouble in politics, blame a rich old white guy." In contrast, "Silverstein has the most credibility here, not least because he's the only one who has actually built something downtown since 9/11." Leadership "has been in pathetic and short supply," and "the failure at Ground Zero is a case study in government incompetence and buck-passing. It's no way to revive the economy of Downtown Manhattan, and it's certainly no way to honor the men and women who perished there on September 11."

DOJ_NMG_0019151

FEMA To Try To Reclaim Wrongly Distributed Aid. The New York Times (3/18, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Acknowledging that it wrongly distributed tens of millions of dollars in hurricane relief last year, the Federal Emergency Management Agency said Friday that it would try to recoup aid from thousands of individuals or families who fraudulently or otherwise wrongly collected money." The "auditors examining the $6.8 billion in disaster assistance distributed last year to 1.7 million households after Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma said FEMA was to blame for much of the abuse because of a woefully inadequate accounting system that left it vulnerable to fraud," and "thousands of inappropriate payments were made because people were able to apply for and collect aid repeatedly."

Graft Investigations Growing In Louisiana. In a front page story, the New York Times (3/18, A1, Eaton, 1.19M) reports, "Growing numbers of subpoenas may soon be issued across Louisiana, where local politics remains a blood sport and corruption has been a bad habit," and "new hurricane fraud investigations are being opened 'sometimes by the day,' said Jim Letten, the United States attorney in New Orleans." In Keener, "federal prosecutors in New Orleans began bringing witnesses before a grand jury looking into possible fraud in…municipal contracts that were awarded immediately before and after the hurricane. The mayor and the entire City Council have been subpoenaed to testify, although the government has not made clear its target."

EPA Head Favors Coastal Restorations But Offers No Money Or Specifics. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/18, Brown, 257K) reports, "U.S. Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Stephen Johnson said Friday that the Bush administration is committed to rebuilding Louisiana's shattered coastline." However, he did not offer "new money for an effort expected to cost up to $14 billion" or "any specifics as to what role his agency would play." Johnson simply "indicated he wanted the EPA to 'get going' on at least a handful of the many coastal restoration projects under consideration."

Katrina Hurt Proctor & Gamble's Coffee Production, Spawned "Gentilly Village." The New York Times (3/18, Rich, 1.19M) reports, "Hurricane Katrina was making a mess of" Procter & Gamble's "coffee business, which got 50 percent of its supply from four sites in New Orleans," and "there are still, as Doug McGraw, the executive in charge of global coffee, put it, 'holes on the shelves' where Folgers and Millstone, Procter's brands, should be." Still after the storm, to help the employees whose homes were damaged, they "created what we call Gentilly Village, which was the trailers, some of which we bought and some of which we got from FEMA, on our parking lot, along with the generators, laundry facilities, a large kitchen and food-service operation, etc."

Blanco Spending Plan Advances In Legislature. The Baton Rouge Advocate (3/18) reports, "Legislators on Friday advanced the biggest part of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's hurricane recovery plan — totaling $6.2 billion — despite gripes about the lack of detail on how the money will be spent," as "the administration outlined the plan for legislators on two pages, not using more than a paragraph to describe each type of expense." Also, "the state must submit a spending plan to the federal government before the funds start flowing," and "the Louisiana Recovery Authority's executive director, Andy Kopplin, said the state is only ready to spend part of the money." The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/18, Scott, 257K) adds there was "a warning shot to the governor's administration that lawmakers need to be better informed and integrated into the process. In response, administration officials expressed concern that the flow of federal money for housing and other recovery programs could be unnecessarily delayed."

Congress Boosts Flood Insurance Program's Borrowing Authority. The AP (3/18, Abrams) reports Congress has "agreed to boost the borrowing power of the federal flood insurance agency, which is fast running out of money needed to meet some 225,000 claims from hurricanes Katrina and Rita." The legislation "allows the National Flood Insurance Program to borrow up to $20.8 billion from the Treasury, up from the current ceiling of $18.5 billion."

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Highlight Successes, Acknowledge Mistakes In Iraq Policy. President Bush will continue his campaign to boost public support for the war in Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/17, lead story, 2:40, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The Bush Administration says, given enough time, there is a plan that will work. It will also require enough money. A new report from the Congressional Research Service says US military spending in Iraq and Afghanistan will increase to $9.8 billion a month this year. On Monday, to mark the third anniversary of the war, President Bush will, once again, make his case that the mission can succeed." ABC (Karl) added the White House "says the President will mark the third anniversary of the invasion by touting success, but also acknowledging mistakes that have prompted changes in tactics. As one senior Administration official said today, 'We are learning as we go.' One success the White House is expected to cite is Tal Afar, a one-time insurgent stronghold believed to have been a base for al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi."

Dozens of local television stations reported on the third anniversary of the Iraq war. Major themes included President Bush restating his determination to succeed in Iraq and improving Iraqi military strength as a means to reduce U.S. troop levels. Examples include: WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (3/17, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "The White House calls Operation Swarmer a show of Iraqi military capability." And Thursday night President Bush, "reiterated that is the key to bringing U.S. troops home. As Iraqis stand up, we will stand down."

KING-TV Seattle-Tacoma (3.17, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush spotlighted the participation of trained Iraqi troops in this relatively complex military operation." The station continued, "Monday the President goes to Cleveland where he will highlight what the government calls concrete examples of real progress being made in Iraq." WTVD-TV Raleigh (3/17, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "President said Monday his aim is to have Iraqis control more territory than coalition forces by year's end." WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (3/17 11:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush continues to rally support for his strategy in Iraq."

Hadley Says US Making Progress In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 4, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) interviewed National Security Adviser, Stephen Hadley. Asked if it was "possible that Iraqi security forces could control 75% of the country by this summer," Hadley said, "Whether it's 75 by this summer, 75% by the end of the year, we'll have to see, but the point is, it is the objective. We are making progress. We are every month at this point been able to turn over more territory to the Iraqis." Asked when the US would begin drawing down troops in Iraq, Hadley said, "I think you're beginning to see that process occur now. Remember during the period of elections, we were up to over 160,000 troops. We've now come back down to something like over 130,000 troops. As we train Iraqi security forces, as they take greater responsibility for security, we will be able to step back to a training activity and to going after terrorists and we'll be able to both change the composition and reduce the number of those forces. That's clearly where we're headed."

US Aims To Turn Over 75% Of Country To Iraqi Security Forces. A top US military official in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, said yesterday that the US goal is to turn security responsibilities for over 75% of Iraq to Iraqi forces by the end of the summer. The story was reported in the lead on ABC and early in CBS' lineup. ABC World News Tonight (3/17, lead story, 2:40, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "Currently, Iraqi forces control less than 50% of the country." But "turning over so much area to the Iraqis would set the stage for a significant reduction of the 133,000 US troops in Iraq, but there are major obstacles. As General Chiarelli himself warned, sectarian violence could get much worse."

The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 2, 2:25, Martin, 7.66M) reported that "as evidence of progress in turning the fight over to Iraqi troops," Gen. Chiarelli cited Operation Swarmer "northeast of Samarra in which helicopters dropped 800 American and 700 Iraqi troops into what is believed to be an insurgent staging area." Gen. Chiarelli: "Had we tried to accomplish a mission like this 11 months ago, it would have been primarily US forces."

The AP (3/18, Burns) notes that the turn over "is more ambitious than President Bush's statement on Monday that his aim was to have Iraqis control more territory than the U.S.-led coalition by the end of 2006," and that Chiarelli "repeatedly stressed that he does not believe civil war will break out." In a later version of the article the AP (3/18, Burns) adds, "The Pentagon wants to pull increasing numbers of American troops out of the line of fire in Iraq." However, "three years after the invasion this latest evolution in the U.S. military's mission will depend largely on whether Iraqi security forces can handle it," and "it is not yet clear that the Iraqis will prove ready — politically or militarily — to take on the added responsibility."

US Will Remain In Charge Of Dangerous Convoy Duty. Contrasting with the announcements of Iraqis taking over US military duties, the New Orleans Times-Picayune/Newhouse News (3/18, Wood) reports, "The reality behind President Bush's assertion this week that Iraqi units are increasingly capable of standing on their own is that none can operate without heavy and sustained logistics support from the United States," when means that "no matter how many U.S. combat troops in Iraq eventually are replaced by Iraqis, an especially difficult and risky mission will remain an American responsibility: convoy duty." Thus, US troops "will be exposed to highly dangerous conditions there for the foreseeable future."

Allawi Warns Point Of "No Return" Approaches. In a status report on the approach of the third anniversary of the US invasion of Iraq, the CBS Evening News (3/17, story 3, 2:55, Logan, 7.66M) last night examined the state of security in the country. CBS reported that the current situation is a "long way from where many Americans expected to be after President Bush declared the end of major combat operations back in May 2003." Former Iraqi Prime Minister Iyad Allawi "remains a strong supporter of US involvement in his country. But he warned this week that militias are ruling the streets, and al Qaeda in Iraq has become less foreign and more Iraqi." Allawi: "I personally think that we now are approaching the no return point. If we get there, it's going to be very difficult to bring the country back." Logan: "What's normal, three years on for Iraqis in the capital, is waiting as long as two days for gas and struggling with only four hours of power on Iraqi officials talked about when and how to deceive international authorities about their weapons programs in the mid-1990s average per day. The picture, though, is not entirely dark." US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad: "There are some good things that are happening. The election was a very good thing. The constitution, it's a very good thing. There is freedom of speech. There is freedom of press. There is much more economic activities, interaction with the rest of the world." The Washington Times/AP (3/18, Hanley) also covered these deaths.

Concerns Raised Sectarian Strife Could Disrupt Region. The Dallas Morning News (3/18, Robberson) reports, "The U.S.-led invasion launched three years ago to oust Iraq's dictatorship and eliminate weapons of mass destruction has instead pushed it to the brink of civil war and escalated Iraqi fears of imminent doom at the hands of radical militiamen." While "this was hardly the outcome President Bush envisioned when he ordered the March 19, 2003, assault on Iraq, senior U.S. officials now acknowledge that their plans have gone awry. Iraqi leaders and clerics are urging restraint as they warn that their nation, already split along sectarian and ethnic lines, is close to imploding." Concerns are increasing that sectarian strife "could spark broader conflict around the region, and that Iraq's security void is tempting its neighbors to meddle militarily."

American Iraqis Impatient With Lack Of Progress In Homeland. American Iraqis, who were ecstatic at the fall of Saddam in 2003, are now growing impatient with the situation in Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/17, story 2, 2:25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Dearborn, Michigan is "home to tens of thousands of Iraqi-Americans. They were out in the street, cheering when US forces led the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein. Today, almost three years later, the mood is strikingly different." ABC (Reynolds) added that in Dearborn, it "is next to impossible to find anyone with anything good to say about the Bush Administration's handling of the war." Most are Shiites and are "deeply suspicious of the American ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalizad, who is a Sunni. They believe Khalilzad's efforts to draw Sunnis into a government dominated by Shiites is unfair and unwise." There are "calls to return power to the Iraqis, quickly. And they have grown from a request to a demand."

Senate Democrats To Attack Bush On National Security Issues. The Washington Times (3/18, A1, Scarborough, 90K) in a front page story reports, "Senate Democrats have mapped a political battle plan for the March congressional recess that calls on lawmakers to stage press events with active duty military personnel, veterans and emergency responders to bash President Bush on virtually every one of his national security policies." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's game plan titled "Real Security," calls "for staged town hall events at military bases, weapons factories, National Guard units, fire stations and veterans posts." The DoD "prohibits political events on military bases." Reid's spokesman Jim Manley "said yesterday the planned events are not part of a political campaign. They would involve only incumbent Democratic senators, some of whom are up for re-election, but not Democratic Senate challengers, he said." The Times notes, "In almost every issue in the Reid memo, Democratic lawmakers are called upon to criticize the president for not spending enough federal dollars."

Democrats Seen As Divided On How To Confront Bush Policies. In contrast to the Washington Times report on Reid's plan to target Bush on national security, CQ (3/18, Ota) reports that if Sen. Russ Feingold's "censure resolution (S Res 398) gained little traction, it nonetheless crystallized a long-simmering divide among congressional Democrats over whether to move to the center with party leaders on a range of issues or swing to the left to energize the party's liberal base heading into this fall's elections." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "and other top Democrats are urging rank-and-file members to take a safer legislative course, emphasizing their opposition to cuts in Medicare and Medicaid, and touting Democratic domestic initiatives." In contrast to former Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle, "Instead of tying the Senate in knots with parliamentary tactics…Reid let regular order prevail for the most part." But Sen. Tom Harkin said, "I don't know that it is getting us anything." An "evolving Democratic agenda includes increased funding for homeland security, stronger guarantees for veterans' benefits and efforts to close the so-called tax gap. … Reid also is likely to seek another vote in the Senate on a proposed increase in the $5.15 per hour federal minimum wage." Yet, "the agenda does not include -- for now -- any frontal attacks on Iraq War funding, a demand for troop withdrawals or resolutions aimed at embarrassing Bush."

Antiwar Activists Seek To Build Support For Referendum Against Iraq War In Wisconsin. The Washington Post (3/18, A3, Slevin, 744K) reports, "In an exercise that one side calls democracy and the other considers a disservice, voters in 30 Wisconsin towns will cast ballots next month on whether the Bush administration should withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq." In cities across Wisconsin, "antiwar activists invoked a 1911 state law to schedule a bring-the-troops-home referendum designed to send a message to Congress and the White House that the war is costing too many lives and too much money." Anti-war activists "have waged counter-recruitment drives at high schools and colleges across the country, pressing to provide information tables or teach-ins about alternatives to military service. Antiwar organizations have scheduled hundreds of protests and other events to mark the war's third anniversary this weekend, yet the national effort to end the war has proved fitful."

Anti-War Activists Struggle To Generate Public Opposition To War. Similarly noting the anti-war activists lack of success in generating public opposition to the war in Iraq, the San Francisco Chronicle (3/18, Garofoli, Writer) in a front page article reports, "Even though polls say a majority of Americans think President Bush has bungled the war in Iraq and now oppose it, anti-war organizers are struggling to get new converts to tell someone besides pollsters that the country needs to change course." Their "focus has shifted in the past couple of years from the street to online organizing and opposing military recruiting in high schools. But anti-war forces are still frustrated that more Americans -- and Congress -- haven't actively opposed the administration's policy."

Feingold Defends Call For Censure. Sen. Russ Feingold in a letter to the editor in the New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) defends his call for censuring President Bush writing, "The president broke the law, and Congress must hold the president accountable." Feingold applauds "Senator Harry Reid's effort to take the Senate into closed session to get answers on the intelligence and policy failures leading up to the Iraq war. But to suggest that such a maneuver is our only recourse now ignores the role the founders expected Congress to play when a president commits such a flagrant abuse of power."

But Eleanor Clift in her column in Newsweek (3/18) writes, "Democrats must have a death wish. Just when the momentum was going against the president, Feingold pops up to toss the GOP a life raft." Clift notes, "It's brilliant strategy for him, a dark horse presidential candidate carving out a niche to the left of Hillary Clinton." But only two other Democratic Senators have signed on "for good reason. The broader public sees it as political extremism."

Pew Poll Suggests Shift In Public Perception Of Bush From "Honest" To "Incompetent." Time (3/18, Cooper) in a short web exclusive article titled "Bush the 'Incompetent'" reports, "Over the last seven years, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press has played a game of word association as part of its regular presidential polling, asking, 'What one word best describes your impression of George W. Bush?" No options or suggestions are offered. The latest results -- from a sample of 710 people done in March -- aren't good for the President. Until this month, the word most associated with President Bush had always been 'honest.' Now the leading answer is 'incompetent' (given by 29 people), followed by 'good', 'idiot' and 'liar.' 'Honest' has slipped to 5th, tied with 'Christian.'" In 2003, "positive descriptions of Bush far outnumbered negative ones. In the past two years, the positive-negative ratio has been more nearly equal. This time, 48% of those polled used a negative word to describe Bush; just 28% picked a positive term; 10% chose neutral language. Six respondents chose a word that everyone could agree on: 'President.'"

Administration Officials Downplay Prospects Of Talks With Iran. The Administration is taking a cautious approach to possible negotiations with Iran over its intentions in Iraq. NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 4, 1:50, Gregory, 9.87M) reported US officials said any prospective meeting with Iran "would be only about the future of Iraq, particularly whether Iran is willing to help the US stabilize the country politically as it tries to come up with a unity government that's built around Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. Iran's foreign minister has indicated a willingness to sit down with the US Ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad." US officials "say this would be a chance for the US to confront Iran over what the President has called its meddling in Iraq. Charge one -- that Iran is supplying explosives, IEDs, improvised explosive devices to insurgents. Charge two -- that it's helping Shiite militias in their activities with financing and explosives." But "will such a meeting happen? Well, tonight, White House officials are increasingly skeptical. National Security Advisor Steve Hadley saying the White House now thinks this might be a ploy by Iran to divert attention from all the heat it's getting internationally because of its nuclear ambition."

Similarly stressing the Administration's cautious approach the AP (3/18, Loven) notes, "There was concern Friday in the Bush administration that the Iranian offer could increase the stature of Iran's government in its citizens' eyes, raise Tehran's status in the region and curry broader international sympathy that could undermine the U.N. Security Council efforts." In an interview US ambassador Khalilzad said "that any meeting should be held in Baghdad. He also made clear that discussions would be limited only to issues related to Iraq, not the standoff over Tehran's nuclear activities, and would represent merely a face-to-face forum for the United States to state concerns it has expressed publicly." The Washington Times (3/18, A1, 90K) in a front page reports similar details fro combined wire service dispatches.

The Washington Post (3/18, A15, Knickmeyer, Branigin, 744K) reports, "Khalilzad said he would not describe the proposed talks as 'negotiations' but as a chance to express concerns about what Washington and some in Iraq regard as Iran's alarming activities here." Khalilzad said, "Iraqis will decide their own future…but they have concerns about [Iranian] policy regarding Iraq." He "spoke after the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad issued a statement critical of Iran in response to remarks Thursday by the top Iranian national security official.

Focusing on opposition to the talks by Sunni leaders in Iraq, the New York Times (3/18, Semple, 1.19M) reports, "Sunni Arab political leaders on Friday denounced an agreement between the United States and Iran to hold face-to-face talks about solutions to the unrest in Iraq, saying the conversations would amount to meddling by foreign nations in Iraq's domestic affairs." Meanwhile, White House press secretary Scott McClellan "said the Bush administration would not meet with Iran to negotiate the future of Iraq but rather to voice its concerns about what he called Iran's 'unhelpful role' in Iraq. It remained unclear on Friday whether Iraqi leaders would be invited to the meetings."

Also taking a negative tone, the Los Angeles Times (3/18, Richter, 958K) reports, "A day after raising international hopes by agreeing to hold direct talks about stabilizing Iraq, U.S. and Iranian officials Friday took a decidedly sharper tone toward each other, differing markedly over the purpose of their planned discussions." The Times adds, "As differences between the two sides intensified, fears grew that the longtime adversaries were jeopardizing an opportunity to help stabilize Iraq, an effort in which they both have an important stake."

But the AP (3/18, Schweid) in an analysis titled "Talks With Iran Could Help Bush" reports, "Possible negotiations between the United States and Iran and the convening of the first session of a new Iraqi parliament could give the Bush administration a long-needed lift. The recent inaugural session of Iraq's parliament is a positive step toward the new Iraq that President Bush envisions as he pursues a war that's unpopular with many Americans. Progress toward forging a unity government representing all of Iraq's sects would be a boost for a country that has been veering close to civil war." For the President, "whose dive in the polls reflects Americans' eroding confidence in his Iraq strategy, progress on either front would be welcome relief -- especially with midterm elections for control of Congress just eight months away."

Columnist Says Public Tiring Of Bush Rhetoric On War Against Terrorism. Roger Cohen in his "Globalist" column in the New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) faults President Bush for characterizing the war against terrorism writing "to frame the confrontation with this danger as a 'war'…is a political decision, one of whose effects has been to cast Bush as a 'war president.'" And now "the epithet is tired; Americans have soured on their war president. It's partly the festering situation in Iraq. But the disillusionment runs deeper. With his approval rating at 33 percent, according to a new poll by the Pew Research Center, Bush is in Nixonian territory." Cohen comes to a similar conclusion as Schweid's AP analysis saying, "Bush has a program, but he's increasingly seen as unable to deliver. … Talking to Iran -- the country identified in the new strategy as presenting the greatest challenge to America -- may help more by delivering results in Iraq and elsewhere."

WPost Warns Of Iran's Ulterior Motives. Echoing the Administration's concerns about negotiations with Iran, the Washington Post (3/18, A20, 744K) editorializes, "By drawing the Bush administration into talks about Iraq, the Iranians give themselves a shot at splintering or distracting the fragile coalition that may be forming in New York. Already Iranian officials are speaking openly about the possibility that any discussions would expand into the broader security dialogue that Tehran has long coveted with the United States. In Iraq -- where American soldiers are dying from Iranian-supplied roadside bombs and sectarian violence by Iranian-supported militias is steadily mounting -- the Islamic regime has a tacit and sinister offer to make: Back down in New York, and the carnage in Baghdad might just drop off. Even the appearance that the Bush administration might be considering such a trade-off would worsen the situation in Iraq and wreck a year of careful and mostly effective anti-proliferation diplomacy."

Iraqi Leaders Discuss Creation Of National Security Council. The New York Times (3/18, Semple, 1.19M) in its article on possible US talks with Iran on Iraq also reports, "The Sunni criticism" of possible talks "came as leaders of Iraq's major political blocs, as well as the American ambassador, gathered…to discuss the formation of a new Iraqi government." Those talks "focused on the proposal to create a national security council composed of leaders of the executive, judicial and legislative branches, as well as representatives of the country's main political blocs. The council would be consulted on pivotal national issues, like the economy, oil policy, public services and security." The Times notes, "Some Sunni leaders wanted the council's decisions to have binding executive authority. But, several participants said, the Shiite leadership and others were insisting that the council have only advisory powers, thereby safeguarding the constitutional powers of the executive."

UN To Seek Higher Profile In Iraq. The Washington Times (3/18, A1, Pisik, 90K) reports in a front page story that Ashraf Qazi, the special representative of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, "said that the United Nations will soon be raising its profile" in Iraq, "acknowledging that its 'perceived absence' has been noticeable since a tragic suicide bombing after the U.S. invasion three years ago."

Iraqi Officials Believe Samarra Ringleader Is In Custody. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Johnson, 958K) reports, "Iraqi military officials said Friday that a continuing offensive targeting insurgents in the hardpan desert northeast of here has resulted in the capture of additional weapons and a man they believe is among those responsible for the recent bombing of a venerated Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra." They are "checking photos and other documents." While "a handful of suspects have been arrested,…authorities have not identified them."

Violence Continues In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 3, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported "though it's not clear whether it's connected to" Operation Swarmer, "the military says an American soldier in Samarra has been shot and killed." The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 2, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "There was scattered violence in Baghdad, and pilgrims headed to the holy city of Karbala for a religious holiday on Monday found themselves caught in a highway of bullets and bombs. 19 people killed or wounded by drive-by shootings, by roadside and bus bombs there, and US forces are now bracing for more bloodshed as the holiday gets closer."

Study Finds Overlap, Resistance In Counterterrorism Efforts. The New York Times (3/18, A1, Shanker, 1.19M) reports, "A classified Pentagon study" ordered by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and conducted by retired four-star Gen. Wayne A. Downing Jr. "analyzing the effectiveness of Special Operations forces has found that the military's counterterrorism effort is hampered by bureaucratic duplication," especially "particular an overlap between" the new Center for Special Operations and the new National Counterterrorism Center. It also found "broad resistance to the Special Operations Command's new counterterrorism role." The study is "viewed as so provocative that the classified report has not been distributed widely."

Documents Show Iraqis Misled Weapons Inspectors. The AP (3/18, Shrader) reports, "Several dozen documents made public Friday by the U.S. government as part of a program allowing researchers, the media and Iraqis comb through millions of pages of documents and audio recordings confiscated since the 2003 invasion," show "Iraqi officials talked about when and how to deceive international authorities about their weapons programs in the mid-1990s."

Documents Suggest Hussein Aware Of Bin Laden Activity. And ABC News (3/17) on its web sight reports that a summary analysis of some documents released shows one dated Sept. 15, 2001 reveals "An Iraqi intelligence service document saying that their Afghani informant, who's only identified by a number, told them that the Afghani Consul Ahmed Dahastani claimed the following in front of him: That OBL and the Taliban are in contact with Iraq and that a group of Taliban and bin Laden group members visited Iraq. That the U.S. has proof the Iraqi government and 'bin Laden's group' agreed to cooperate to attack targets inside America." But in an editor's note, ABC states, "While the assertions contained in this document clearly support the claim," that bin Laden was cooperating with Hussien, "the sourcing is questionable" and "this document is of limited evidentiary value."

Al Qaeda Recruits Eager For Attacks Against US. The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/18, Ghattas) reports, "Recruits at Osama bin Laden's terrorist training camps in Afghanistan were clamoring for suicide missions against the United States more than a year before the Sept. 11 attacks, according to al-Qaida documents declassified by the U.S. Defense Department. One document published on the Pentagon Web site this week contained rare criticism of bin Laden from an al-Qaida operative, who accused the terrorist leader of monopolizing decision-making and ignoring advice."

Abu Ghraib Detainee Admits He Isn't Man In Photo. In a front page article, the New York Times (3/18, A1, Zernike, 1.19M) reports that Ali Shalal Qaissi a former detainee of Abu Ghraib prison, "now acknowledges he is not the" hooded man hooked up to wires "in the specific photograph he printed and held up in a portrait that accompanied" a Times article about him. However, Qaissi "appears with a hood over his head in some photographs that Army investigators seized from the computer belonging to Specialist Charles Graner, and "he and his lawyers maintain that he was photographed in a similar position and shocked with wires and that he is the one on his business card." The Washington Post (3/18, C1, Kurtz, 744K) adds, "The Times was hardly the only news organization to name Qaissi as the hooded prisoner, although its profile…gave him considerable prominence."

Jury Deliberating On Guilt Of Abu Ghraib Dog Handler's Guilt. The AP (3/18, Dishneau) reports, "A military jury began deliberating Friday in the case against" Sgt. Michael Smith, "an Army dog handler accused of using his barking animal to torment prisoners at Abu Ghraib for his own amusement." His "defense argued that Smith believed he was following orders in a chaotic and confusing environment," and "testimony in the trial revealed conflicting notions among prison workers about how dogs were supposed to be used and what the approval process was."

Military To Investigate Marines For Death Of 15 Iraqis During Firefight. The AP (3/18, Baldor) reports, "The military will investigate allegations of potential misconduct by Marines during a bombing and firefight last November that left 15 Iraqi civilians dead." The criminal investigation "will try to determine whether the Marines followed the international law of armed conflict, including whether they positively identified or tried to identify the enemy and whether they determined there was hostile intent, as they are supposed to do." The Knight Ridder (3/18, Brown) adds, "One official said it's unclear whether the Marines killed the civilians accidentally or whether they fired indiscriminately. It's also unclear whether all the civilians died in the same house or in separate locations."

Brain Damage Said To be "Signature Injury" Of Iraq War. Newsweek (3/18, Riccitiello) reports, "More than 1,700 military personnel wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan in recent years, Marine Cpl. Samuel Reyes Jr. is suffering from traumatic brain injury, known in military jargon as TBI, which leaves survivors unable to perform the most basic cognitive functions." As "TBI affects more than 25 percent of bomb-blast survivors," it is "the signature injury of the Iraq war," and "the increasing number of TBI survivors and the vexing limitations they face has become an enormous challenge for both military medicine and for the Department of Veterans Affairs, which will treat these survivors for life."

Father Of Soldier Doesn't Want Son Redeployed. H. Barry Holt, father of an American soldier, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/18, A21, 744K), "I generally accepted the reasons we went to war and worried about terrorism and weapons of mass destruction." However, once his son deployed, lack of information was stressful. "I had persistent nightmares about improvised explosive devices, mortar rounds, snipers and accidents, knowing nothing but fearing the worst." Also, "we were confused and angry at the Army when he asked us to buy ammo pouches and other military accessories that weren't issued to him." U.S Army and Marine parents "have seen far too much for people so young, and I don't want any of them to die. My son is home and alive. He has done his duty and I don't want him to go back."

Experts Discuss Whether Iraq War Was "Worth It." Time (3/18) reports, Time magazine publishes people's opinions on if the Iraq war was worth it. David Kennedy, Professor of History, Stanford University said "No. From the outset the war was a colossally bold and breathtakingly risky gamble. Unfortunately, and unsurprisingly, the United States has failed to beat the odds" when it followed an "extravagant ambition to transform the political culture of the entire Middle East." Hisham Kassem, Egyptian democracy activist, said "it achieved something useful. Parallel to the chaos and bloodshed, there is a political process evolving in Iraq." Also, Lawrence B. Wilkerson, Colonel, U.S. Army (ret.); former chief of staff for Secretary of State Colin Powell, said, "No. I'm principally a strategist and from that perspective the war has been a disaster."

Taliban Allies With Drug Lords Against Opium Eradication. The Washington Times (3/18, Duparcq, 90K) reports, "Taliban rebels determined to keep southern Afghanistan in chaos have teamed up with drug barons against the government and its opium eradication campaign." While "in their final two years in power…the Taliban banned opium," today "the Taliban rebels are willing to protect opium crops and farmers against the new administration in Kabul."

DOJ:

Rosenberg Tapped As Northern Virginia US Attorney. The AP (3/18) reports, "Chuck Rosenberg, a veteran Justice Department lawyer serving as the top federal prosecutor in Houston, will take over the high-profile chief prosecutor's job in Alexandria, Va." The AP continues, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday named Rosenberg the interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. He replaces Paul McNulty, who was confirmed by the Senate late Thursday as deputy attorney general. … Rosenberg, 45, will be in charge of the office that is seeking the death penalty against Zacarias Moussaoui and has prosecuted other terrorism cases."

The Washington Post (3/18, B5, Markon) reports, "The Alexandria U.S. attorney's job has always been considered a law enforcement plum, and it grew increasingly visible after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as the Justice Department made McNulty's office a central front in terrorism prosecutions. The office won a guilty plea from Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person convicted in a U.S. courtroom on charges stemming from Sept. 11, and is now trying to convince a jury to execute him." The Post adds, "Other prominent cases in Alexandria have included the prosecutions of John Walker Lindh, a Californian convicted of fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan, and of a group of Muslim men convicted of training overseas for holy war against the United States. The office also has been known to handle highly publicized espionage cases such as the Aldrich H. Ames and Robert P. Hanssen cases. … Law enforcement sources have said Rosenberg was the favored candidate to replace McNulty in part because his selection would provide continuity in terrorism prosecutions and national security. A Justice Department news release yesterday said Rosenberg has focused on counterterrorism, counterintelligence and national security matters in recent years."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Pelosi, Other Democrats Praised For Call To Revisit Sarbane-Oxley. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (3/18), Mallory Factor, chairman of the Free Enterprise

DOJ_NMG_0019159

Fund, says, "Have America's entrepreneurs and corporate leaders found a new voice of regulatory sanity in, of all people, Nancy Pelosi? Apparently so, and that should be a wake-up call to Republicans -- because like everything else in the free market, the free enterprise agenda is up for grabs." In the recent "Innovation Agenda" that the House Minority Leader "and her party unveiled, Ms. Pelosi acknowledges specifically the need to 'ensure Sarbanes-Oxley requirements are not overly burdensome,' and endorses reform. Meanwhile, the scourge of Wall Street, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, is criticizing Sarbanes-Oxley's 'unbelievable burden on small companies' and its possible role in 'preventing some initial public offerings.'" Pelosi and "other Democrats have been quicker to recognize what many traditional champions of free enterprise have been slow to see: the law's disastrous consequences for our nation's ability to compete."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutor Disputes Libby Effort To Quash Indictment. The AP (3/18) reports Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald "disputed the claim" of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, that he "lacks legal authority to indict him in the CIA leak investigation." Fitzgerald "argued that being allowed to operate outside any control of the Justice Department is constitutional and in accordance with federal law."

Judge Drops Fraud Charges Against Virginia Executive. The Washington Post (3/18, D1, Kang) reports, "Charges have been dropped against Northern Virginia businessman Frank L. Cowles Jr., who was arrested in November on allegations of conspiring to defraud a hedge fund out of $25 million." The Post continues, "A U.S. District Court judge in Chicago dropped criminal charges against Cowles on March 1 after the U.S. attorney's office there filed a motion to dismiss. Cases continue against two men who were charged with Cowles for allegedly defrauding a Chicago-based fund. … Cowles's attorney, Robert D. Luskin of the law firm Patton Boggs in the District, said the complaint against Cowles was a mistake and that his client had been the victim of a scheme that cost him a great financial loss." The Post adds, "The two men still facing prosecution in the case are accused by prosecutors of wire fraud. Richard E. Warren of Fredericksburg, who has pleaded not guilty, was indicted and detained. A complaint against David L. Myatt of Los Banos, Calif., is pending."

Nearing Halfway Point, Enron Trial May Hinge On Defendants' Testimony. The AP (3/18, Hays) reports, "The fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling is reaching its halfway mark: Seven weeks, 15 prosecution witnesses and more to come. … Yet for all the government's methodical efforts to show through documents, video and audio tapes and those witnesses' memories of how the former corporate titans repeatedly lied about the disgraced company's financial health, the jury's conclusion may hinge on what the defendants say if they testify as expected." The AP continues, "The government has already brought on its highly anticipated witnesses. This past week started with former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow's fourth and last day on the stand. Fastow, an admitted liar and thief, hid none of his own culpability as he said he helped Lay and Skilling lie about Enron's financial health. … The week wrapped with Sherron Watkins, the former vice president hailed as a hero by Congress for warning Lay of impending financial disaster months before the company crashed, denting Lay's claim that he believed the company was strong at the time. … Yet a conviction is far from a foregone conclusion. … 'It's the difference between legitimate spinning and impermissible lying,' Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who has followed the trial, said of what will likely drive the outcome of the biggest fraud case to emerge from the recent era of corporate scandals. … 'In a case like this, if Lay or Skilling or both take the stand, it becomes almost a new trial in the sense that jurors will either believe them or disbelieve them,' Mintz said." The AP notes, "The government's 'brick by brick' approach is living up to expectations of putting together a puzzle without betting all on a single witness, said Michael Wynne, another former federal prosecutor in Houston who has observed much of the trial."

The Washington Post (3/18, D1, Johnson) reports, "Seven weeks into the blockbuster fraud trial of Lay and Skilling, defense lawyers have tried to wear down the government's witnesses with questions tailored to exploit personality quirks, large or small. Cross-examination, after all, is a high-stakes game of endurance and amateur psychology -- a matter of finding a witness's Achilles' heel, that trait most likely to undermine their performances on the witness stand. … And, in this case, the defense has plenty of weapons at its disposal. 'The fact is, the defense does have a somewhat unusual amount of material to cross-examine them with,' said Washington criminal defense lawyer E. Lawrence Barcella Jr. of the Enron investigation, which generated countless articles and voluminous written reports from Congress, a bankruptcy examiner, the company's board and federal regulators. … The defense came out of the gate in February determined to test the endurance of the government's witnesses, many of them former executives who pleaded guilty and agreed to testify in exchange for reduced prison terms. Former investor relations chief Mark E. Koenig, the fraud trial's first witness, remained on the stand for eight days -- including five of protracted cross-examination in which a tired Koenig sometimes appeared to agree with the defense on certain points, if only to shorten his ordeal."

9th Circuit Reverses Death Sentence Of Los Angeles Man. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Suarez) reports, "A federal appeals court on Friday overturned the death sentence of a Los Angeles man who avenged the loss of his therapist by murdering her husband." The Times continues, "The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld William Clark's conviction, which included murder, two counts of attempted murder, rape and arson. But the court said the judge had misled the jury about death penalty law. The court also said the California Supreme Court should have overturned the penalty during its review." The Times adds, "Ava Gawronski was counseling Clark, a 37-year-old Canoga Park underwriter, and his wife, but stopped treating him after he threatened to rape her in her office. … In January 1982, Clark set Gawronski's West Los Angeles house ablaze. His intent, Clark said during his trial, was to chase the family out so he could shoot and kill David Gawronski, a 35-year-old federal job trainer, in front of his wife and infant daughter. … Instead, David Gawronski perished in the fire."

US May Drop Capital Case Against Massachusetts Men. The Boston Herald (3/18, Sweet) reports, "Federal prosecutors may soon drop the controversial death-penalty case against two Dorchester men the federal government wanted to try for murder and gang activity." The Herald continues, "Pending a green light from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, murder and racketeering indictments against Darryl Green and Branden Morris could be dropped as early as next month. … Prosecutor Theodore Heinrich said in court documents 'the likelihood of dismissal is so great' after two co-defendants of Green and Morris who weren't facing capital punishment were acquitted, that it would be futile to go on." The Herald adds, "Green's defense counsel, Randolph Gioia, said, 'The only reason you bring a case like this to federal court is because you want to make an example of these kids.' … In order to successfully prosecute Green, 28, and Morris, 22, in federal court for the 2001 murder of Terrell Gethers, the government had to prove a racketeering case against them. But in January, Judge Nancy Gertner ordered acquittals in the companion case of Jonathan Hart, 24, and Edward Washington, 25, after a jury deadlocked on whether their street-corner crew operated on the same "criminal enterprise" level as the Mafia. … Green and Morris still face federal drug charges and may yet be tried for Gethers' homicide in state court."

Philadelphia Councilman Convicted Of Corruption. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/18, Shiffman, Schaffer) reports, "Rick Mariano, an electrician who rose from a tough corner of Northeast Philadelphia to become a city councilman, was convicted of corruption charges yesterday and led from a federal courtroom in handcuffs." The Inquirer continues, "Mariano's wife, son and staffers did not flinch at the guilty verdicts, but Susan Mariano and others gasped when U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel ordered the councilman imprisoned immediately. Stengel, citing Mariano's suicide scare at City Hall shortly before last year's indictment, revoked bail pending a psychiatric evaluation." The Inquirer adds, "Mariano, 50, became the first elected city official convicted in 15 years, and under state law he can remain on Council only until he is sentenced, probably by midsummer. Mayor Street, a longtime friend, called on Mariano yesterday to resign immediately. Mariano's top aide vowed the councilman would not step down. … The jury deliberated for about six hours before convicting Mariano of 18 counts, including conspiracy, bribery, money laundering, fraud and tax charges. He was acquitted of four fraud charges." The Philadelphia Daily News (3/18, Brennan, Hinkelman) adds Meehan said that Mariano "had turned his Council post into 'a branch office for businesses that will pay bribes to get things done.' … Mayor Street, in a statement, called on Mariano to resign from Council, saying that was in the 'best interests of the city.' Street, who often joked with Mariano that they were so close they called each other

'cousin,' said Mariano was a close friend but not above the law."

The AP (3/18, Dale) notes, "More than a dozen people have been convicted in the various probes, one of which became public when police discovered an FBI bug in Mayor John F. Street's office in October 2003." UPI (3/18) also briefly reports on the conviction.

Meanwhile, The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/19, Schaffer) reports on Mariano's conviction in light of his political career, noting, "Other crooked Philly pols have reached for the stars, conspiring with mobsters or taking bribes from purported Arab sheikhs. But Mariano, the ultimate neighborhood guy, was felled by just under $30,000 in ill-gotten gains - less than a third of his City Council salary."

Mariano Intends To Keep Council Seat Until Sentencing. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/18, Schaffer) reports Mariano's conviction "throws into question the future of the City Council seat he has held since 1996. Pennsylvania's constitution bars felons from elected office, meaning Mariano must step down. But moments after Mariano's bail was revoked and he was led away to detention, his chief of staff said Mariano intended to stay in office until sentencing, as the law allows. … By declining to step down until his sentencing, Mariano will keep drawing his $102,000 salary." The Philadelphia Daily News (3/18) adds, "Council President Anna Verna said…Mariano must resign when he is sentenced. Verna on Thursday asked City Solicitor Romulo Diaz to issue a legal opinion to back that up. But Verna stopped short of saying if she would call a special election to fill Mariano's post, calling that 'premature.'"

Philadelphia Inquirer Praises Verdict, Calls For Mariano To Resign. In an editorial, The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/18) hails the verdict, saying "this is a big city; crime and corruption are going to happen. You just want to feel that decent people can fight back, can stem the tide. This time, the courts offered hope." The Inquirer also calls for Mariano "to do the right thing, for once: resign his seat, instead of hanging on pointlessly until his sentencing forces the issue. His friends on Council, who vouched for his redeeming qualities at trial, should let him know it's best for him to go now."

Former Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The Chicago Tribune (3/18, O'Connor , Bush) reports, "Former Chicago City Clerk James Laski, the highest-ranking city official charged in the federal probe of the city's Hired Truck Program, pleaded guilty Friday to pocketing nearly $50,000 in bribes for steering city business to two trucking companies." Laski's friend and city employee Randy Aderman also pleaded guilty Friday to bribery charges. "According to court records, Frank Cannatello, another Hired Truck defendant who pleaded guilty this month to lying to FBI agents, asked Aderman to help obtain Hired Truck business after Cannatello and a relative started FRC Trucking. Friday's guilty pleas by Laski and Aderman bring to 34 the number of convictions in the Hired Truck probe." The Chicago Sun-Times (3/18, Korecki) adds, "When asked what Laski would tell others in City Hall who thought about taking bribes, his lawyer Jeffrey Steinback responded: 'Don't do it, don't do it.'" The Sun-Times notes, "44 people have been charged in the federal government's investigation of Chicago's Hired Truck Program, including 26 city workers." The AP (3/18, Robinson) and Los Angeles Times (3/18, Huffstutter) also report on Laski's and Aderman's guilty pleas.

Illinois Man Held In Isolation After Being Charged With Child Pornography. The Chicago Sun-Times (3/18, Korecki) reports, "A Bartlett (IL) man indicted this week on charges he molested an infant and broadcast it live over an Internet chatroom is being kept in isolation after his lawyer complained he was receiving threats from other inmates." The Sun-Times continues, "Brian Annoreno, 29, is being held in a Kankakee lockup, but his lawyer, Michael Falconer, said Annoreno also needs to be kept in isolation when he is taken to court appearances in Chicago for his own safety. … 'Regular street criminals hate people who are accused of being child molesters,' Falconer said." The Sun-Times adds, "Falconer said Annoreno was getting threats from inmates and harsh words from jail guards. … Annoreno and two others charged this week with being tied to a child pornography chatroom pleaded not guilty to the charges Friday. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales flew to Chicago on Wednesday to announce that the chatroom was shut down and a worldwide investigation had nabbed 47 people. … Falconer criticized the feds Friday for putting on a 'dog and pony show,' saying Gonzales' news conference was 'deplorable' and over the top. Gonzales said the crimes were particularly disturbing because the chatroom allegedly broadcast video showing young children being molested. But Falconer said the prosecution does not have evidence of those videos except for a witness' testimony."

Indiana County Launches Cyber Sex Crime Unit. The Indianapolis Star (3/18, Bird) reports, "Johnson County (IN) officials have formed a 'Cyber Sex Crimes Task Force' to protect children from Internet predators." The Star continues, "County Prosecutor Lance Hamner appointed Deputy Prosecutor Paul Felix to spearhead the effort. … Greenwood police Detective Erick Klinkowski, Franklin police Detective Brain Goldfarb and Johnson County Sheriff's Detective Bill Pfifer are the rest of the task force." The Star adds, "A month ago, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the Justice Department's Safe Child Initiative to stop sexual exploitation of children through the Internet. … The county team recently returned from Washington, D.C., after getting training on procedures and protocols to use during investigations and prosecutions of Internet predators. … Klinkowski already has conducted two stings that led to arrests and convictions, one a special deputy with the Genesee County (Mich.) Sheriff's Department who traveled to Greenwood to meet a 13-year-old girl, Hamner said."

Judge Sentences California ELF Members To Prison For Ecoterror Arsons. The Sacramento Bee (3/18, B1, Carreon) reports, "A follower of an eco-terrorism group and two other Newcastle residents were sentenced Friday in Sacramento federal court for their roles in attempted firebombings of buildings under construction. Ryan Daniel Lewis, the 22-year-old admitted adherent of the Earth Liberation Front…was sentenced to six years in federal prison for orchestrating arsons in Placer and Amador counties in late 2004 and early 2005." Sisters Lili Marie and Eva Rose Holland "were sentenced to two years each in prison." During the sentencing, US District Judge Edward J. Garcia "chided defense attorneys for misusing the term 'idealism' in explaining their clients' actions," saying, "I consider this type of terrorism most serious crime." The Los Angeles Times (3/18) briefly reports the story under the headline "6-Year Prison Sentence In Series of Arsons," as does the AP (3/18), under the headline "3 Eco-Terrorists Sentenced For Firebombs."

CIVIL LAW:

Google Won't Have To Disclose Web Search Data. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Delaney, 2.11M) reports US District Judge James Ware "ruled Friday that Google Inc. did not have to turn over data about consumer Web search queries that the Department of Justice had requested." Juge Ware "ordered Google to work with the government to provide 50,000 randomly selected addresses for Web sites from its databases. But he denied government lawyers' request for a sampling of 5,000 search queries entered by Google users, concluding that they essentially duplicated information the government could glean from the Web addresses."

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Gaither, 958K) reports Judge Ware's ruling "was a victory for Google, which argued that handing over the records would violate the privacy of people who might scour the Internet with terms as diverse as 'best-actor nominees,' 'third trimester abortion' or 'pipe bomb.'" Although Ware "required Google to reveal some information about the websites in its database, he ordered the government to reimburse the Mountain View, Calif., company for the time and expense required to comply." Privacy advocates "cheered the decision as a check on the Bush administration's efforts to collect information about people, but noted that the trove of personal data gathered and stored by sites like Google was irresistible to investigators."

The AP (3/18, Liedtke) and Bloomberg (3/18) also report this story.

WSJournal Says Google, Other Net Firms "Innocent Bystanders" In COPA Lawsuit. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "This outcome may seem Solomonic, but the precedent is still troubling. The subpoena that started it all emerged from a separate case being tried in Pennsylvania. In that case, the ACLU is challenging the constitutionality of the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, or COPA." The government "wants to use" the "search data" from Google, Yahoo, and MSN "as part of its effort to show that the law is necessary to protect minors from the Internet's seamier side. But these companies are innocent bystanders in the dispute over the constitutionality of COPA."

DOJ Forges Deal With North Carolina On Overseas Voting. The Charlotte Observer (3/18) reports, "The Justice Department said it had reached an agreement with North Carolina officials that will allow military and other overseas voters to participate in a second primary election, if one is needed this year. … The U.S. District Court in Raleigh still must approve the agreement." The Observer continues, "The agreement was filed at the same time as the Civil Rights Division filed a lawsuit because of the short amount of time between North Carolina's primary and runoff elections. Federal officials said in a news release Thursday that the four-week break doesn't provide enough time to get runoff ballots to and returned from absentee voters. … Besides other changes, the state and federal governments agreed that all military and overseas voters requesting an absentee ballot for the primary election also will receive a blank write-in ballot for a runoff. They also agreed to allow write-in ballots to be faxed and e-mailed, if necessary." The Observer notes, "The agreement also provides for reporting to the court on the status of the North Carolina Legislature's efforts to find a permanent solution to the timing problem. … 'These measures provide an immediate solution while the Legislature adopts permanent procedures, as we trust they will promptly,' Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general of the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement."

Group Sues Libraries For Blocking Access To Web Site. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (3/18, Shinkle) reports, "The Council of Conservative Citizens, a nationwide group that has been portrayed as racist, is suing four libraries in the St. Louis area for allegedly blocking patrons from viewing its Web site." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Gordon Baum, a lawyer from St. Charles who is the group's chief executive, said the U.S. Constitution protects the public's right to see his Web site. … 'We don't believe we're any more to the right than the NAACP is to the left,' he said, adding that his group does not advocate violence." The Post-Dispatch adds, "The site, cofcc.org, does not feature the racial epithets commonly used by racist groups. It does, however, provide a slate of news stories about crime by blacks or immigrants. It also offers for sale a T-shirt with the words, 'White Pride,' 'Deutschland' and 'Save Our Culture.'" The Post-Dispatch adds, "The Southern Poverty Law Center says that racism 'underlies' the group and that it has long had ties to politicians the law center considers racist. … Baum filed a suit in U.S. District Court on Monday claiming the Maplewood City Library, University City Public Library, Valley Park Community Library and Festus Public Library had violated his constitutional right to free speech by blocking access to the Web site. At least two of the libraries say they now permit patrons to view the site."

Whistleblower Who Allegedly Stole Papers About Voting Machines Faces Charges. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, So) reports, "A whistle-blower to some, a thief to others, Stephen Heller says he's a regular guy, not an activist or a member of any political group. … But charged last month in Los Angeles with three felonies for allegedly stealing damaging documents about voting machine manufacturer Diebold Election Systems, Heller has become a hero to digital rights and political activists who say he helped expose a threat to the election system." The Times continues, "Prosecutors say Heller, a 43-year-old actor and resident of Van Nuys, took more than 500 pages of Diebold-related documents, including memos from the company's attorneys at the Jones Day law firm. The memos suggested that the company might have broken state law by providing Alameda County with voting machines that had not been certified by the state. … 'This case is not about whistle-blowing. It's about theft of attorney-client privileged material from an attorney's office,' Los Angeles County district attorney spokeswoman Sandi Gibbons said. … But activists and bloggers — including the California Voter Foundation; Black Box Voting, an electronic voting group; and the liberal http://www.huffingtonpost.com website — say the purloined documents, some of which turned up on the Oakland Tribune website, helped spur a state crackdown on Diebold."

Alabama Bill Would Make Rights Activists Eligible For Pardon. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Fausset) reports, "Civil rights activists and others convicted under laws that enforced racial discrimination would be eligible for a pardon from the state of Alabama under a bill working its way through the Legislature, the bill's sponsor said Friday." The Times continues, "Rep. Thad McClammy said that his proposed 'Rosa Parks Act' would serve the symbolic purpose of bestowing posthumous pardons on activists like Parks, whose 1955 arrest sparked the 381-day Montgomery bus boycott. … But McClammy, a Democrat, said the pardons also could help living veterans of the segregated South, who still may have trouble explaining away their arrests when applying for jobs or loans." The Times adds, "Some of the most famous arrests of the civil rights era occurred in Alabama in the 1950s and '60s. Parks was convicted of violating Montgomery's municipal code for refusing to move to the back of a city bus. Dozens more were charged under anti-boycott and curfew statutes. … McClammy's bill unanimously passed the Democratic-controlled Alabama

Questions Remain After Second Autopsy In Teen Boot Camp Death. The New York Times (3/18, Goodnough) reports, "Martin Lee Anderson was buried a second time this week, more than two months after he died following a confrontation with guards at a boot camp for teenage offenders in the Florida Panhandle. But questions about his death, and whether the state should close all its boot camps in the aftermath, are very much alive." The Times continues, "After supervising a second autopsy of Martin's body on Monday, a special prosecutor appointed by Gov. Jeb Bush disputed the findings of the original pathologist in the case: that the youth had died from complications of sickle cell trait, an undiagnosed blood disorder. But the prosecutor, Mark Ober, would not say more until his broader investigation of the case was finished." The Times adds, "The guards at Bay Boot Camp in Panama City kneed, kicked and hit Martin, 14, after he stopped running during an orientation drill on Jan. 5. He had been sent to the camp for violating probation after stealing his grandmother's car. In a videotape, which the state released after news organizations sued for it, the boy appears limp throughout the encounter. … He died early on Jan. 6, and when the original autopsy report came out a month later, his parents, lawmakers and civil rights groups expressed outrage. Even after Mr. Ober said through a spokeswoman that Martin 'did not die of sickle cell trait, nor did he die of a natural cause,' the medical examiner who made those findings, Dr. Charles Siebert of Bay County, stood by them."

6th Circuit Panel Allows Tennessee To Issue "Choose Life" License Plates. The AP (3/18, Johnson) reports, "A federal appeals court Friday allowed Tennessee to offer anti-abortion license plates bearing the message 'Choose Life.'" The AP continues, "A three-judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati overturned a lower-court ruling that said the tag illegally promoted only one side of the abortion debate. … 'Although this exercise of government one-sidedness with respect to a very contentious political issue may be ill-advised, we are unable to conclude that the Tennessee statute contravenes the First Amendment,' Judge John M. Rogers said in a 2-1 ruling." The AP adds, "An anti-abortion group, Tennessee Right to Life, declared victory. … 'It's a validation of our position all along that the Legislature had the authority to authorize a plate that favors normal childbirth over the practice of abortion,' said Brian Harris, the group's president." The AP notes, "In a dissenting opinion, Judge Boyce F. Martin Jr. said the plates should be banned because they amount to unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination. … The plaintiffs, the American Civil Liberties Union of Tennessee and Planned Parenthood of Middle and East Tennessee, said they were still reviewing Friday's ruling."

Two New Deaths Linked To RU48. The New York Times (3/18, Harris, 1.19M) reports, "The FDA has now received reports that six women in the United States died after taking RU-486, or Mifeprex." The two recent deaths, "and two of the previous four underwent their procedures at Planned Parenthood clinics, a spokeswoman said. Federal officials do not yet know the cause of the latest two deaths."

The Washington Post (3/18, A6, Kaufman, 744K) reports, "Opponents of abortion quickly described the FDA advisory as another reason to ban the abortion pill, sold as Mifeprex. Sen. Jim DeMint said,"RU-486 is a deadly drug that is killing pregnant women. … This drug should never have been approved, and it must be suspended immediately." The Washington Times (3/18, Price, 90K) and The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Rockoff, 958K) reported a similar stories.

Wal Mart To Carry "Morning After Pill". The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Zimmerman, 2.11M) reports, "On Monday, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. is set to sell for the first time prescription emergency contraceptives commonly referred to as Plan B or the morning-after pill. The move comes after a short but vociferous activist campaign that labeled the world's largest retailer as antiwomen for being the only large pharmacy chain in the country that refused to stock the pills.

Courts Seen As Complicating Abortion Debate. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M) James Wilson, an author and professor writes, "Abortion has become the key test for selecting people for high-level judicial offices." But, "abortion is scarcely an issue in most European democracies, not because the people who live there have views radically different from American ones, but because legislatures, not courts, authorized abortions using language that tried to strike a reasonable balance among competing views."

FDA Reconsiders Ban On Gay Blood Donors. The Washington Post (3/18, A6, Stein, 744K)

reports the FDA, "is considering revising its policy that bars as a blood donor any man who has had sex with another man since 1977." The change was urged by, "the American Red Cross, the American Association of Blood Banks and America's Blood Centers." The groups recommend, "men be barred from donating for only a year after having had sex with another man, treating them the same as other groups at increased risk for spreading sexually transmitted virus through donated blood."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ May Oppose Maytag-Whirlpool Merger. The AP (3/18, Pitt) reports, "Shares of Maytag Corp. (the parent of North Canton's Hoover Co.) and Whirlpool Corp. fell Friday on speculation that the federal government may challenge their proposed merger." The AP continues, "Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., has proposed a $1.79 billion acquisition of Maytag. … The U.S. Department of Justice antitrust division sought an extension to review the merger last month. The companies have agreed not to close the transaction before March 30." The AP adds, "A leading antitrust lawyer said a decision is likely to come next week. … Steven C. Sunshine, a supervisor of the antitrust division's merger enforcement program from 1993 to 1995, said antitrust attorneys have expected the government to challenge the deal because it concentrates so much power in one company. … The merger would create a company that produces half of the dishwashers in the United States and more than 70 percent of its clothes washers and dryers. Under long-standing federal guidelines, a rise in market concentration of that magnitude would usually draw a court challenge. … Gina Talamona, spokeswoman for the Justice Department, declined to comment Friday, confirming only that the merger is still under review."

Bloomberg (3/18) reports, "Antitrust enforcers are worried the Whirlpool deal would let the combined company raise prices through control of more than two-thirds of the U.S. market for some appliances, said antitrust lawyers who spoke on condition of anonymity because they aren't authorized to talk about the case. They said the government has questioned such retailers as Lowe's Cos. and Home Depot Inc. and Whirlpool's manufacturing rivals. … The decision on whether to pursue the agency's first court challenge to a takeover in two years will be up to the Bush administration's new antitrust chief, Thomas O. Barnett, 44. It will be the first test of his approach to mergers since he won Senate confirmation Feb. 10 as assistant attorney general. … 'If they don't challenge this merger, Ford and General Motors is next,' said Steven M. Axinn, a New York antitrust lawyer not involved in the transaction. 'Unless someone can argue that Maytag is going out of business, I don't understand how the government can let this deal happen.'"

Four Firms Under DOJ Probe For Alleged Chemical Price-Fixing. The Beaumont (TX) Enterprise (3/18, Wallach) reports, "Four U.S. chemical companies, including two with a major Southeast Texas presence, received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice as part of an investigation into possible anti-competitive pricing in certain materials that are used in a variety of consumer goods. … The companies include Huntsman Corp., BASF Corp., Dow Chemical Co., and Lyondell Chemical Co." The Enterprise continues, "The justice department delivered the subpoenas for documents to the companies in mid-February, said publicists for three of the companies contacted Friday by The Enterprise. … A spokeswoman for the justice department acknowledged the investigation but offered little detail. … 'The anti-trust division is investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices in the polyurethanes industry,' said justice department spokeswoman Gina Talamona."

Experts See No Antitrust Violations In Airline Meetings. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (3/18, Cox) reports, "Officials from American Airlines and Southwest Airlines could negotiate a proposal to resolve the Wright Amendment controversy without running afoul of federal antitrust laws, legal experts said Friday." The Star-Telegram continues, "Legal precedent allows competing businesses 'to petition government' and propose legislation or regulation if they are not conspiring to fix prices or divide up market share, experts said. American says it is reluctant to enter talks with Southwest on Wright for fear of an antitrust inquiry or Justice Department lawsuit." The Star-Telegram adds, "What the legal community calls the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, named for two precedent-setting Supreme Court cases, allows competing companies to work together to influence the legislative or executive branch of government without violating the Sherman Antitrust Act. … 'No violation of the Sherman Act can be predicated upon mere attempts to influence the passage or enforcement of laws, and the Sherman Act, therefore, does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or monopoly,' the court ruled in the 1961 Noerr case. … In the cases, the court ruled that the constitutional guarantee of individuals' and corporations' right to petition government supersedes antitrust laws, designed to preserve competition among businesses."

Merger Mania Builds On Momentum Of Telecom Deal. The New York Times (3/18, Stein) reports, "March madness is not limited to college basketball. Billions of dollars in mergers were announced this week, building on the momentum created when AT&T offered to acquire BellSouth for $67 billion earlier in the month." The Times continues, "The trend even swept up entire stock exchanges, as the Nasdaq Stock Market offered to buy the London Stock Exchange (just as the New York Stock Exchange was weighing a bid of its own), and Euronext, the owner of the Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon stock markets, said it was interested in buying Deutsche Börse, the German exchange." The Times adds, "Eager to further diversify its business amid rising interest rates and slowing growth for credit card issuers, Capital One Financial, the big credit card company, agreed to buy the North Fork Bancorporation, a regional bank serving the Northeast, for about $14.6 billion in cash and stock. … After its acquisition last fall of the Hibernia National Bank in New Orleans, Capital One would have deposits of more than $84 billion when its North Fork acquisition is completed. It would have more than 50 million customer accounts and 655 branches from White Plains to Brownsville, Tex."

ENVIRONMENT:

DC Court Overturns Administration's New Source Review Policy. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit yesterday overturned the Environmental Protection Agency's New Source Review policy, ruling that the Bush Administration's implementation of the Clean Air Act provision failed to square with the statutory language. The story was widely covered by the major dailies this morning; the media consensus is that the ruling is a significant setback to the Administration's environmental policy.

The New York Times (3/18, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports the court "on Friday overturned a clean-air regulation issued by the Bush administration that would have let many power plants, refineries and factories avoid installing costly new pollution controls to help offset any increased emissions caused by repairs and replacements of equipment." Unlike its "ruling last summer, when the court largely upheld the E.P.A.'s approach against challenges from industry, state governments and environmental groups, the new ruling was a defeat for the agency and for industry, and a victory for the states and their environmentalist allies."

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Gerstenzang, 958K) the court's decision dealt "a sharp setback to the Bush administration," ruling that the EPA "had relied on 'Humpty Dumpty' reasoning in arriving at a rule that critics said would have eased enforcement of a law intended to reduce industrial air pollution."

The Washington Post (3/18, A1, Eilperin, 744K) reports in a front page story that the court's ruling blocks the Bush Administration's "four-year effort to loosen emission rules for aging coal-fired power plants, unanimously ruling yesterday that the changes violated the Clean Air Act and that only Congress could authorize such revisions." The court "sided with officials from 14 states, including New York, California and Maryland, who contended that the rule changes -- allowing older power plants, refineries and factories to upgrade their facilities without having to install the most advanced pollution controls -- were illegal and could increase the amount of health-threatening pollution in the atmosphere."

The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Dalton, 2.11M) reports the court "handed environmentalists a victory Friday." State officials "hailed the appeals-court ruling. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who led the states' action, called the ruling 'an enormous victory for clean air and for the enforcement of the law and an overwhelming rejection of the Bush administration's efforts to gut the law.'"

Bloomberg (3/18, Arthur) reported John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, "said the ruling was a 'significant setback to business efficiency and, for that matter, environmental quality.'"

Future Of ANWR Provision Uncertain. The Washington Post (3/18, A5, Weisman, 744K) reports a "last-minute deal to secure the vote of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) on a $2.8 trillion budget plan has given new life to the Republican drive to open Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling." The budget resolution "includes a $10 billion Gulf Coast restoration fund that would be financed from the leasing of arctic refuge drilling rights, revenue from new drilling in the Outer Continental Shelf of the Gulf of Mexico and further sales of the broadcast spectrum." But it is "not clear whether the political equation has shifted at all since December, when moderate Republicans -- led by Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) -- forced their leaders to take arctic drilling out of a 2006 budget-cutting measure to secure their votes."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico Tries To Re-Up Drug Interdiction Program. Knight Ridder (3/18, Root) reports, after the general in charge disappeared and a noticeable increase in border-region drug killings, "Mexican officials, recognizing that the Secure Mexico program had failed, announced a new program this week, dubbed Northern Border. Under the program, 600 to 800 more federal police agents were dispatched to this besieged border city. But few expect that to make much difference, and drug traffickers weren't intimidated: On Thursday, they gunned down four federal police intelligence agents in broad daylight outside a school here. At least 30 shots were fired into the agents' bodies."

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Sponsors Hard Line Immigration Bill. The AP (3/18, Gamboa) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "sidesteps President Bush's call for giving illegal immigrants temporary work permits in an election-year immigration bill the Tennessee Republican unveiled Friday." Frist "said the Senate will turn to his proposal to tighten borders, punish employers who hire illegal immigrants and provide more visas if the Senate Judiciary Committee doesn't complete a broader bill in the next 10 days." But a "clear majority on the 18-member committee has come out in favor of a 'guest worker' program that would let employed illegal immigrants remain in the U.S. — at least temporarily — rather than be deported."

NYTimes Praises Specter For Reaching Consensus On Immigration. The New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) says in an editorial that "a bipartisan consensus emerged" in the Senate Judiciary Committee last week as Chairman Arlen Specter "endorsed the principle behind an earlier bill sponsored by Senators John McCain and Edward Kennedy: that illegal immigrants who met strict criteria and paid fines and back taxes should have a path to permanent residency and citizenship." But the "blowback was instantaneous." Majority Leader Bill Frist "announced that he would be putting his own bill forward as an alternative to the committee's. Seventy-one House members signed a letter saying that the Judiciary Committee's actions were 'fundamentally incompatible' with the House's strident vision of immigration reform, which completely rejects the idea of providing illegal immigrants any path to legalization." Specter "often wilts under party pressure like lettuce in a broiler, but he has shown admirable resilience in working to get a comprehensive immigration bill to the Senate floor."

Ahearn Asks Bush To Support Citizenship Bill For Illegal Immigrants. The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 6, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "On this St. Patrick's Day, the visitor at the White House was, who else, the Prime Minister of Ireland, Bertie Ahearn. He told the President he is still committed to the 1998 Northern Ireland peace accord. And he asked the President to support a Senate bill that would allow illegal immigrants from Ireland to stay in this country. Like many people here illegally, thousands of Irish live in daily fear." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "The Irish are urging Washington legislators to open some doors. Senators John McCain and Ted Kennedy are sponsoring a bill that would make it easier for all immigrants in this country illegally to earn legal status."

The Washington Times (3/18, A1, Dinan, 90K) in a front page story notes Ahern "was just the latest in a line of foreign leaders to beg the president to relax immigration rules." The requests by foreign leaders have been common as "some nations, such as Ireland and Mexico, want citizenship for their illegal alien nationals," while "others want the United States to lift the caps for temporary student or worker visas." Speaking with Pakistani reporters before his recent trip to Southeast Asis, "Bush said he is working to loosen visa restrictions." Bush said, "We had a very restrictive visa policy right after 9/11. … Our visa policy was a natural reaction to a terrible event that took place, but it didn't take me long to realize that we were missing a great opportunity to have students from Pakistan see the real America."

US Claims $25 Million Lost By Fraudulent Tan Preparation In California. The San Bernardino County (CA) Sun (3/18, Wall) reports, "A firm accused of preparing thousands of fraudulent tax returns costing the government more than $25 million has been barred from doing business by a federal court order." The Sun continues, "N.C.K. Services and its three preparers - sisters Karen and Carla Berry of Rialto and Ivan Johnson of San Bernardino - are set to appear in court March 24 to respond to the civil complaint." The Sun adds, "The three defendants are accused of preparing thousands of tax returns containing false and fraudulent home-mortgage interest deductions since 2001, federal officials said. … The total loss to the government as a result of the understatements of tax on customers' returns exceeds $25 million, according to an IRS audit. … The government claims the defendants systematically claimed fictitious home-mortgage interest deductions for their customers, even in cases where the customers did not own homes. … Justice Department officials said the case is part of the federal government's increased effort to stop tax-fraud schemes. … 'Tax-preparation fraud costs the federal treasury hundreds of millions of dollars every year,' said Eileen O'Connor, the assistant attorney general for the department's tax division. … 'It's important to check the work on the return to make sure the numbers match your financial situation before you send in your return,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson. 'People ought to be very suspicious and should have a red light go off if you hear you can always get a return if you go to x or y return preparer.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Politics Seen As Reason Extra Spending In Senate Budget. The New York Times (3/18, A1, Hulse, 1.19M) reports the "largess demonstrated by the Senate in padding its budget with billions of dollars in additional spending this week showed that lawmakers are no different from many of their constituents: they don't mind pulling out the charge card when money is tight." Forced to "choose between calls for renewed austerity and demands for more money, many Republicans joined Democrats in reaching deeper into the Treasury, leaving the party's push for new fiscal restraint in tatters." Republicans in "some of this year's tightest races — Conrad Burns of Montana, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Jim Talent of Missouri and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island — all backed the chief budget-busting provision as they endorsed an extra $7 billion for medical research, education and worker safety."

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Havemann, Simon, 958K) reports that last weekend in Memphis, "four U.S. senators who hope to carry the Republican banner in the 2008 presidential election pledged allegiance to one of the GOP's most revered principles: fiscal responsibility — never spend taxpayers' money you don't have." Less than "a week later, the Senate's Republican majority overwhelmingly approved billions of dollars in deficit spending. Despite outcry from conservative groups that helped build the GOP majorities in both houses of Congress, the Republican spenders were undeterred, for one reason: They're convinced that voters now care less about big deficits than they do about the things that increased federal spending will buy."

SAT Errors Prompt Testing Critics To Call For Regulation. The New York Times (3/18, Arenson, 1.19M) reports that as the College Board "races to score the final 1,600 exams from its problem-ridden October SAT test, a string of recent testing errors around the country has college and high school officials, testing experts, students and parents asking with rising urgency, Who is watching the testing industry?" With the increase in testing since the passage of the No Child Left Behind law, the "volume is stretching the $2 billion-a-year education testing industry, educators say, taxing its ability to draw up enough tests and score them quickly and reliably. The states are struggling to find experienced officials to provide quality control. The resulting flurry of errors has educators and lawmakers calling for better disclosure and oversight."

Reliance On Testing For Standards Criticized. In a Washington Post op-ed (3/18, A21), Colman McCarthy, director of the Center for Teaching Peace, criticizes the current academic testing trend, saying, "Tests represent fear-based learning, the opposite of learning based on desire. Frightened and fretting with pre-test jitters, students stuff their minds with information they disgorge on exam sheets and sweat out the results. I know of no meaningful evidence that acing tests has anything to do with students' character development or whether their natural instincts for idealism or altruism are nurtured."

Critics Say More Medicare Drug Benefit Confusion Ahead. The AP (3/18, Freking) reports advocacy groups say "many elderly and disabled Americans enrolled for the Medicare drug benefit will face new difficulties in obtaining their medicines on April 1," when "insurers will have more latitude to tell pharmacists that they won't pay for a particular drug. Before that, insurers have been told that they should pay for a prescription even if it's not on the list of drugs they cover."

Leavitt Calls For Reforms To Cut Healthcare Costs. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/18, Snowbeck, 261K) reports Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael Leavitt says "the Pittsburgh region is contributing to health care innovations, but it also is the 13th costliest market in the country for people buying health care services." During a "breakfast talk yesterday with the Pittsburgh Technology Council at the Sheraton Station Square, Mr. Leavitt called for a variety of reforms to help tame health care costs." Leavitt said the "situation in Pittsburgh…exemplifies the broad challenge with health care in the country: No one wants to go without advanced treatments that people rightly regard as 'priceless,' yet health care comes a price -- one that's increasingly difficult for society to afford."

House GOP Seen As Backing Away From Lobbying Reform. Knight Ridder (3/18, Thomma) reports that with "the spotlight turned elsewhere, Republicans this week backed off their vow to crack down on the relationship between lobbyists and Washington politics." House Republicans on Thursday proposed a measure that "would suspend privately financed travel for members of Congress only until this year's congressional elections and would put off a decision on a permanent ban of travel, meals or other gifts until after the elections." All the "proposed new regulations stopped short of those offered weeks earlier when congressional leaders rushed to embrace reform in the wake of the political fallout from the scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff."

Study Says Boehner Frequently Traveled On Privately-Funded Trips. The Washington Post (3/18, A2, Birnbaum, 744K) reports a Center for Public Integrity study shows House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, "who rose to power in the wake of a congressional lobbying scandal, spent the equivalent of nearly six months on privately funded trips over the past six years." The report says Boehner "accepted 42 privately sponsored trips from January 2000 to December 2005. That put him on the road to other countries and 'golfing hotspots,' often with his wife, Debbie, for about half a year, 'only nine days of which he listed as being 'at personal expense,'' the center said." Boehner also "flew at least 45 times on corporate jets owned by companies 'with a financial stake in congressional affairs' from June 2001 through September 2005, the center reported."

Bill Would Preempt States On Credit Report Access. The New York Times (3/18, Darlin, 1.19M) reports legislatures in "a dozen states" have "set up procedures for residents afraid of identity theft to lock and unlock their credit reports." But "credit-reporting agencies are pushing Congress to override the state laws, which could make it harder for Americans to keep their credit information under wraps." Lobbyists for "the big agencies — Equifax, Experian and TransUnion, owned by the Marmon Group — are seeking to add an amendment to the Financial Data Protection Act, a bill being rewritten by the House of Representatives." Consumer groups "are upset that a federal law might supersede what has been done at the state level."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Have Banner Week. Positive news on the stock market was highlighted by the media. The CBS Evening News (3/17, lead story, 2:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Lower oil prices and a government report that industrial production is starting to grow again kept the stock market rally going and for the fourth day in a row now, the market set a few five-year high. All the major indexes were up about 2% for the week." CBS (Mason) added, "The stock market had its best week of the year, and suddenly, the Dow is up at levels we haven't seen it at since -- well, since the turn of the century. As the closing bell rang, the Dow was closing in on 11,300." With "red-hot real estate prices cooling, some investors are looking to put their money back in the market. Retail broker Charles Schwab took in over $10 billion in new money in February, nearly 70% more than a year ago."

NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 2, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Stocks were up today as they were for the week. The Dow was up more than 26 points in today's trading [to close at 11,279.65]. Nasdaq gained just under 7 [points to close at 2,306.48.] For the week, the blue chip stocks finished up more than 203 points. Nasdaq was up more than 44 points." CNBC's Jim Cramer added, "I think this is a first-class bull market. And I think a lot of it is because people are pulling money out of housing and going back into stocks, first time in six years."

Emphasizing that the positive news on the stock market was an indication of broad economic strength the Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones (3/18, Patterson) says, "Fueled by renewed expectations that the Federal Reserve will ease off the interest-rate brakes, the Dow Jones Industrial Average motored higher this week, nearing a six-year high." The increase "left the average less than 60 points shy of its highest level since January 2000, when the dot-com bubble was in full bloom -- and about to burst. It was also the same month the Dow industrials hit their all-time closing high of 11722.98." Dow Jones notes, "Those airy heights proved fleeting," but experts "say this move is different. Strong gains by financial, energy and basic materials companies -- more resilient than the dot-com babies of the late 1990s -- have driven the latest rally. Indeed, the move up has come from big, blue-chip companies, while the Nasdaq Composite Index, which rose 6.92 points to 2306.48 Friday, has been sluggish."

And the Washington Times/AP (3/18) reports, "Bullish data on inflation and the housing market sent stocks mostly higher yesterday." The stock market "welcomed the latest report from the Labor Department, which showed consumer prices rising just 0.1 percent in February, far less than the 0.7 percent jump in January. Core CPI, with food and fuel prices removed, also rose 0.1 percent, down from 0.2 percent the previous month." In addition to "better-than-expected housing construction in February, investors were reassured that the economy continues to grow while inflation remains in check."

Bloomberg (3/18) notes, "A drop in oil prices helped the Standard & Poor's 500 Index and the Dow Jones Industrial Average advance to their highest levels since May 2001. Boeing Co., the largest U.S. aircraft maker, led the advance on demand for its 787 jetliner."

But the Washington Post/AP (3/18, D2) in an article titled "Oil And Productivity Set A Positive Tone" also notes, "Stocks' gains were limited, however, as the day's news reports did little to address Wall Street's persistent worries about inflation and more interest-rate increases from the Fed, said Ken Tower, chief market strategist for Schwab's CyberTrader."

Industrial Production Report Suggests Economy Healthy. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Gerena-Morales, 2.11M) reports, "Industrial production expanded at a healthy pace last month, the latest sign that American industry is thriving." A Federal Reserve report showed "industrial production in February at the nation's factories, mines and utilities jumped 0.7% from January, boosted by a surge in production at utility plants. Compared with a year earlier, industrial production was up 3.3%." It "was slightly weaker than economists had expected," yet "economists found lots of positive news in the report, especially in the manufacturing sector, which is seeing year-over-year output expand at double-digit rates for some key sectors that reflect consumer spending and business investment. Overall, manufacturing output was flat last month, but was up 4.2% over the past 12 months."

The Bloomberg (3/18, Torres) notes, "The lack of untapped capacity may cause factories to raise prices, prompting Fed policy makers to boost interest rates one or two more times, economists forecast. Higher borrowing costs and gasoline prices limited consumer confidence this month, a University of Michigan survey showed today." It showed consumer confidence "held at 86.7, reflecting a rise in Americans' perceptions of current conditions and a decline in expectations."

Recent Gas Prices Up Sharply, But February Declines Help Rein In Inflation. Focusing on recent increases in gas prices, NBC Nightly News (3/17, lead story, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "At the end of a week that saw most of the top oil company executives in this country testify under oath in Washington, the price of gasoline in this country has suddenly spiked. It has gone up by just about the same amount, just about everywhere." NBC (Costello) added that in "the last day alone, gasoline has jumped four cents on average nationwide. And 15 cents in the last month." It's "all about supply and demand." Mary Thompson, CNBC: "Gasoline futures are up 23 cents in the last month because demand here in the US is strong, it's about 2% above last year's levels. And there are fears we could see some supply shortages this summer." NBC cited global instability, fallout from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and new ethanol mix requirements as reasons for the price increase.

But highlighting how a decline in energy prices in February helped slow inflation, the Washington Times/AP

(3/18) reports, "Inflation slowed sharply in February as food costs moderated and the price of gasoline, natural gas and other energy products posted big declines." The AP adds, "The Labor Department reported yesterday that its closely watched U.S. Consumer Price Index (CPI) posted a tiny 0.1 percent increase last month after having jumped 0.7 percent in January. The slowdown in price pressures was certain to be welcomed at the Federal Reserve, which has been boosting interest rates since June 2004 to make sure inflation does not get out of control."

Boehlert To Retire From Potentially Competitive Seat. The New York Times (3/18, Hulse, 1.19M) reports moderate Republican Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert, "who became a national advocate of science and a champion of environmental protection, announced Friday that he would not seek re-election." Boehlert, who "under party rules would have had to surrender his chairmanship of the Science Committee at the end of this session, said he believed he had recorded solid accomplishments in his current term and decided after 24 years on Capitol Hill that he was ready to step aside." Boehlert's "departure provides an added opportunity for Democrats who need 15 seats to gain control of the House of Representatives."

The Washington Post (3/18, A2, Babington, 744K) reports Democrats "hope Boehlert's retirement and President Bush's low approval ratings will give them a chance to win the seat, which the GOP has held for decades." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "It's a difficult opportunity for the Democrats, but nevertheless an opportunity. Democrats are going to need a wave there." The Post adds Democratic activists "expect Michael A. Arcuri, 46, the Oneida County district attorney since 1993, to win the Sept. 12 primary. Republicans are looking to five-term state Sen. Raymond A. Meier, 53, to be their nominee."

Despite Retirement, Sabo's District Seen As Safe For Democrats. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/18, Diaz, Hotakainen, Olson, 424K) reports Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo "is expected to announce his retirement today after 28 years in Congress." Sabo, who "turned 68 last month, has scheduled a noon news conference in his Minneapolis office. His departure is expected to set off a scramble within the DFL party for a replacement." Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer, "a professor of justice and peace studies at the University of St. Thomas, already has opened a campaign office and challenged Sabo at last week's precinct caucuses. And Michael Erlandson, Sabo's chief of staff and the former chair of the state DFL party, is expected to run." State Rep. Keith Ellison, DFL-Minneapolis, and DFL Minneapolis City Council Member Gary Schiff "also said Friday that they would run." Sabo's 5th CD is "one of the nation's safest Democratic seats. He won his 14th term in 2004 with 70 percent of the vote."

After UN Rights-Council Vote, Some Complain US "Failing To Engage." After losing a vote 170-4 on the creation of a UN Human Rights Council, the Los Angeles Times (3/18, Farley, 958K) reports, "The US is being criticized by many diplomats and human rights representatives here as having never fully engaged in negotiations over the matter and being unwilling to compromise. Some diplomats said that if US Ambassador John R. Bolton had spent as much time lobbying at the United Nations as he did in Washington, the US would have had a better result." An unnamed "diplomat closely involved in the talks" is quoted as saying, "It's not clear that they wanted to move. ... In fact I couldn't tell what they wanted. We offered ideas to Washington to achieve their goals, and nothing happened." Bolton, however, is quoted as saying, "We would rather have nothing than something that falls short of our standards. That was our view all along. ... What we found sad was that some of our central allies gave up on key points. I don't understand it to this day."

Rice Encourages Asian Powers To Improve Relations. The Washington Times (3/18, Kralev, 90K) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday expressed concern over tensions between Japan and China and urged the two Asian powers to find common ground and overcome their differences for the sake of stability in the region. 'We have encouraged good relations between China and Japan, and even though there are difficulties in that relationship, China and Japan also share a lot of interests and, indeed, a lot of trade and commerce and a lot of economic relations,' the secretary said."

China Appears Ready To Release Imprisoned Journalist. The New York Times (3/18, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "Chinese authorities on Friday withdrew at least part of the case against a Chinese researcher for The New York Times, in a surprise legal maneuver that left unclear whether he would soon be released as President Hu Jintao prepares to visit the United States next month. Zhao Yan, 44, a researcher in the Beijing office of The Times, has been imprisoned for 18 months on a charge that he disclosed state secrets to the newspaper, as well as a lesser charge of fraud. Mr. Zhao has denied both charges."

The Washington Post (3/18, A16, Pan, 744K) adds, "The move amounts to a rare admission of error by the Chinese government in a criminal prosecution involving national security, and it almost certainly required Hu's approval, because he had endorsed the investigation that led to Zhao's arrest and issued instructions to the officials running it, according to people familiar with the probe." Meanwhile, the Financial Times (3/18, Yeh) notes, "The decision by prosecutors to dismiss charges against Zhao Yan comes ahead of President Hu Jintao's visit to the US in April." The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Magnier, 958K) also covers the story.

German Trial Could Help Unpack Nuclear Black Market. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Fleishman, 958K) reports, "A German engineer accused of belonging to a worldwide nuclear smuggling network went on trial Friday for allegedly providing technology to Libya that could have been used to enrich uranium for weapons. The case, being heard in a Mannheim court, is expected to offer a glimpse of the nuclear black market once masterminded by Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan." According to the Times, "Gotthard Lerch, 63, is charged with violating Germany's weapons control and foreign trade acts. He allegedly was paid $34 million to provide Libya with gas centrifuges and other dual-use technologies." Goetz Neuneck of the Institute for Peace Research and Security Policy at the University of Hamburg, is quoted as saying, "The trial is hugely important in strengthening international attention to the problem of illegal proliferation. ... It would be very good for international nonproliferation if the trial were to provide more details and shine more light on dark corners."

Hamas Prepared To Announce Government. The AP (3/18, Barzak) reports, "Hamas said it is ready to announce the formation of its government Saturday, two weeks ahead of a deadline but apparently without coalition partners that might have softened the militants' image. In another possible setback, the Hamas government program is not expected to win the approval of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who is to meet with the group's leaders in Gaza Saturday. Abbas' aides said the Palestinian leader considers the Hamas platform too vague and wants it rewritten." According to the AP, "The new foreign minister will almost definitely be Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas firebrand, according to a preliminary list given to The Associated Press by officials in Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a smaller PLO faction that was considering joining the government. Said Siyam, a Hamas lawmaker from Gaza, has been tapped for the Interior and Civil Affairs Ministries, which control three of the five Palestinian security forces and is responsible for contacts with Israel's security services, said the officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because the list was not final."

In earlier coverage, the New York Times (3/18, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "Abbas may yet reject the new government's agenda, because it does not explicitly acknowledge the validity of past agreements between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, or support negotiations with Israel."

Fatah Officials Calls For Abbas's Resignation. The AP (3/18, Daraghmeh) reports, "Several Fatah officials called on President Mahmoud Abbas to resign and dissolve the Palestinian Authority to protest Israel's raid of a West Bank prison earlier this week, party activists said Friday. The raid...was seen as a humiliating blow to Abbas's prestige and raised new questions in his Fatah Party about their president's ability to govern." The AP goes on to report, "The call for Mr. Abbas' resignation and the dissolution of the Palestinian Authority at the Fatah Central Committee late Thursday was the first time such a demand was made. Analysts and Fatah officials said the demands -- raised both in a letter to Mr. Abbas signed by five midlevel Fatah activists and at Thursday's meeting by a senior party official -- are not serious at the moment."

Netanyahu Could Be Primed For A Comeback. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, King, 958K) reports, "Heading into a March 28 parliamentary election, the onetime boy wonder of Israeli politics leads a party that once dominated the electoral landscape, but now is lagging far behind." Still, "many observers believe it would be foolish to count out Netanyahu, a charismatic but divisive politician whose career has been marked by dramatic reversals of fortune." As Likud leader, having assumed the "leadership of Israel's hard right at a time when the country is embracing a more centrist view, Netanyahu now finds himself struggling to broaden his appeal." Political scientist Itzhak Galnoor of Hebrew University is quoted as saying, "Likud has not been able to follow the swing in Israeli public opinion. ... The public generally agrees with the partitioning of the biblical Land of Israel, and the Likud leadership remains stuck in its previous position."

Sharon's Wall Is Justified, Scholar Writes. In a New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) op-ed piece penned by scholar Irshad Manji writes that Israelis will soon elect a new prime minister, "but I'd bet my last shekel that I'll continue to hear the phrase 'Ariel Sharon's apartheid wall.' It's a phrase spoken — make that spewed — on almost every university campus I visit in North America and Europe." Manji continues, "This barrier, although built by Mr. Sharon, was birthed by "shaheeds," suicide bombers whom Palestinian leaders have glorified as martyrs. Qassam missiles can kill two or three people at a time. Suicide bombers lay waste to many more. Since the barrier went up, suicide attacks have plunged, which means innocent Arab lives have been spared along with Jewish ones. Does a concrete effort to save civilian lives justify the hardship posed by this structure? The humanitarian in me bristles, but ultimately answers yes."

Israeli Turkeys Now Afflicted With Deadly Flu. The Washington Post (3/18, A14, Wilson, 744K) reports, "Israeli health officials announced Friday that they believe more than 1,000 turkeys have died in recent days from bird flu, the first reported cases in the country. Initial test results appeared to confirm that birds being raised on four farms in southern Israel died after being infected by the H5N1 virus, avian influenza's deadly strain. Additional tests recommended by the World Health Organization are being conducted to confirm the findings, but Israeli officials are already taking precautions."

Georgia Gripped By Bird-Flu Fears. The New York Times (3/18, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "In the early morning hours, the cobblestone alleys that wander this city's slopes are normally crowded with schoolchildren, walking in groups with their backpacks and books. But such sights have lately become rare." As fears of avian influenza spread throughout this mountainous former-Soviet republic, "school attendance has dipped to half of normal levels, said Alexander Lomaia, the minister of education. Ambulance calls have soared, reaching 900 a day here, up from slightly more than 600, said Lado Chipashvili, the minister of labor, health and social affairs."

G-8 Energy Chiefs Back A Nuclear Future. The Washington Times/AP (3/18) reports, "Energy ministers from the world's leading industrialized nations called yesterday for major new investments and the development of nuclear power as high oil prices and uncertainty about supplies weigh on the global economy. The ministers from the Group of Eight nations, meeting in the Russian capital to discuss global energy security, said significant investments would be needed in the production, transportation and processing of resources and urged policies to encourage this." According to the G-8 statement, the ministers "recognize that to attract investment it is essential for countries to have open and favorable investment regimes...including stable and predictable regulations, clear tax laws and efficient administration procedures, as well as fair and reciprocal access to markets along the energy value chain."

Kremlin Moves To Shut Down Khodorkovsky NGO. The New York Times (3/18, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "The bank accounts of a foundation led by an imprisoned Russian businessman, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, were frozen Friday by court order, the foundation and its bank said, a move that strongly suggests the organization is about to be shut down. The group, the Open Russia Foundation, immediately announced that it was forced to suspend its activities promoting civil society and accused the government of extending its crackdown on private organizations." Open Russia vice chairwoman Irina Yasina is quoted as saying, "It seems that they are trying to stop all of our activities, because of course without money, we can do nothing."

New Belarus Sanctions Could Be In Offing, White House Says. As the people of Belarus prepare to cast their votes in presidential elections this weekend, the Washington Post (3/18, A18, Baker, 744K) reports, "The White House accused the authoritarian president of Belarus yesterday of being 'among the most corrupt leaders in the world,' and administration officials said they will consider new sanctions assuming tomorrow's elections are manipulated as expected. In a report sent to Congress on Thursday night and posted on the Web yesterday, the White House alleged that President Alexander Lukashenko 'has created a repressive dictatorship on the doorstep of the European Union,' sold arms to rogue states and enriched himself at the expense of his people." Press Secretary Scott McClellan is quoted as saying, "We are very concerned about the behavior of the leaders in Belarus. They are not pursuing a democratic course." The Post goes on to cite "two other administration officials who were not authorized to speak on the record [as saying] the US government is studying ways of applying more sanctions against Lukashenko's regime, targeted specifically against him and his cronies."

Pelosi Calls For End To Darfur Conflict. The Washington Times (3/18, Debose, 90K) reports, "House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi yesterday said the warring in the Darfur region of Sudan demands immediate attention, a day after privately urging President Bush to appoint a special envoy to help end what the White House calls a genocide." Pelosi is quoted as saying, "President Bush and I don't agree...well we disagree on almost everything, but on this we do, and he has told us 'not on his watch' and I believe him. ... To do this we must stop the violence, bring the parties to the negotiating table and get humanitarian relief to the people who need it."

New Liberia Leader Wants Taylor To Stand Trial. The New York Times (3/18, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, the president of Liberia, said Friday that she had asked Nigeria to extradite Charles Taylor, the former Liberian president and guerrilla leader, to face war crimes charges in Sierra Leone. Ms. Johnson Sirleaf told the Security Council that she had made a formal request to President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria, where Mr. Taylor lives in exile." According to the Times, "Even from exile, he has maintained influence in Liberia, with thousands of young combatants still loyal to him, Ms. Johnson Sirleaf said, making her plea 'courageous but risky.'" She is quoted as saying, "Please bear in mind that time is of the essence in this regard. ... Liberia's peace is fragile. There are many loyalists in our country to Mr. Taylor, there are many business interests he has. Whatever decision is taken by the African leadership must ensure that the safety of the Liberian people and the stability of our nation is not undermined.'"

In its coverage, the Washington Post (3/18, A17, Lynch, 744K) notes, "Obasanjo has previously resisted international pressure to hand Taylor over, citing the need for a request from a democratically elected Liberian leader. His office said Friday that he is considering sending Taylor back to Liberia, not Sierra Leone, where he is charged. A statement issued by Obasanjo's office cited his 'commitment to give due consideration to any formal request from a democratically elected government of Liberia for the return of former president Charles Taylor.'"

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Dixon, 958K) and the AP (3/18, Lederer) also cover the story.

Sirleaf Represents Rare New Start For Liberia, WSJ Says. In a staff editorial headlined, "African Hope," the Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M) opines, "Good news out of Africa has been all too rare in recent years. But a major exception was the election last year of Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, who stopped by our offices yesterday after addressing the United Nations." Mrs. Sirleaf "used her time with us to emphasize that Liberia is 'open for business.'" When asked "if she believed the US owes Liberia anything, she said flatly, 'no.' She just wants it to be treated like other countries."

IRAQ WAR-MARCH _ 9 a.m. Local peace activists hold a march to mark the three year anniversary of the war in Iraq and to call for an end to the war. TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge To Allow New Aviation Witnesses In Moussaoui Trial. Judge Leonie Brinkema yesterday ruled prosecutors in the death sentence trial of al Qaeda member Zacarias Moussaoui will be permitted to present new aviation witnesses in lieu of the witnesses whose testimony was tainted by the actions of a Transportation Security Administration lawyer.

NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 5, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This means the Justice Department can put on a more a or less complete case, arguing that if Moussaoui had not lied when he was arrested, the government could have beefed up airport security and might have blocked the hijackers. But all the preparation the prosecution has done on this point, Power Point presentations and charts, that is all tossed out, still considered tainted by the TSA lawyer. So it will be a nearly complete case, but just not as polished one." The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 5, Schieffer, 7.66M) also reported the story in a brief segment.

The New York Times (3/18, Lewis, 1.19M) adds, "The question remains as to whether it is possible to find new witnesses who are not only untainted, as the judge has required, but familiar enough with the state of aviation security in August 2001 to help support the government's case." In a front page story, the Washington Post (3/18, A1, Markon, 744K) calls it "an extraordinary week." Legal experts say "the week's events still leave prosecutors in a tough spot" as they "are left to scramble to find new witnesses."

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Serrano, 958K) reports that while "prosecutors will be working from a marked disadvantage, with much of the central part of their case stricken from the trial," they say they will "call one witness to explain" do not fly lists "and how they are used to keep suspected terrorists from boarding commercial aircraft.' This, they said, 'will allow us to present our complete theory of the case, albeit in imperfect form.'" The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/18, 424K) covered this story under the headline "Moussaoui ruling salvages the trial." The Washington Times (3/18, Seper, 90K) and the AP (3/18, Barakat, Sniffen) also covered this story.

Prosecution, Defense At Odds Over When Martin Will Testify. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Serrano) reports, "With the sentencing trial for Zacarias Moussaoui stumbling forward again, lawyers for the two sides were sharply at odds Saturday over when" TSA attorney Carla Martin "would testify about why she tried to influence witnesses." Prosecutors want her to appear at "the middle of the week and…testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment," but "defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said in court papers that he wanted Martin on the stand after he finished cross-examining FBI Special Agent Harry Samit on Monday morning."

Specter Introduces Bill For Oversight Of Warrantless Spying. The Washington Times (3/18, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter introduced a bill this week to increase congressional oversight of President Bush's warrantless spy program and require a court review of the program for its constitutionality," saying that "rule of law takes precedent even when the nation is at war with a new type of enemy capable of exploiting modern technology."
